CHAPTER XLI

Conquests of Justinian in the West Character and first Campaigns of Belisarius He invades and subdues the Vandal Kingdom of Africa His Triumph The Gothic War He recovers Sicily, Naples, and Rome Siege of Rome by the Goths Their Retreat and Losses Surrender of Ravenna Glory of Belisarius His domestic Shame and Misfortunes

When Justinian ascended the throne about fifty years after the fall of the Western Empire the kingdoms of the Goths and Vandals had obtained a solid and as it might seem, a legal establishment both in Europe and Africa. The titles which Roman victory had inscribed were erased with equal justice by the sword of the barbarians and their successful rapine derived a more venerable sanction from time, from treaties and from the oaths of fidelity already repeated by a second or third generation of obedient subjects Experience and Christianity had refuted the superstitious hope that Rome was founded by the gods to reign for ever over the nations of the earth. But the proud claim of perpetual and indefeasible dominion which her soldiers could no longer maintain was firmly asserted by her statesmen and lawyers whose opinions have been som times revived and propagated in the modern schools of jurisprudence After Rome herself had been stripped of the Imperial purple the princes of Constantinople assumed the sole and sacred sceptre of the monarchy demanded as their rightful inheritance, the provinces which had been subdued by the consuls or possessed by the Cæsars and feebly aspired to deliver their faithful subjects of the West from the usurpation of heretics and barbarians The execution of this splendid design was in some degree reserved for Justinian. During the five first years of his reign he reluctantly waged a costly and unprofitable war against the Persians till his pride submitted to his ambition, and he purchased at the price of four hundred and forty thousand pounds sterling the benefit of a precarious truce which in the language of both nations, was dignified with the appellation of the endless peace. The safety of the East enabled the emperor to employ his forces against the Vandals and the internal state of Africa afforded an honourable motive and promised a powerful support to the Roman arms[1]

According to the testament of the founder the African kingdom had lineally descended to Hilderic, the eldest of the Vandal princes A mild disposition inclined the son of a tyrant, the grandson of a conqueror to prefer the counsels of clemency and peace and his accession was marked by the salutary edict which restored two hundred bishops to their churches, and allowed the free profession of the Athanasian creed[2] But the catholics accepted with cold and transient gratitude a favour so inadequate to their pretensions and the virtues of Hilderic offended the prejudices of his countrymen. The Arian clergy presumed to insinuate that he had renounced the faith, and the soldiers more loudly complained that he had degenerated from the courage of his ancestors His ambassadors were suspected of a secret and disgraceful negotiation in the Byzantine court, and his general the Achilles[3] as he was named, of the Vandals lost a battle against the naked and disorderly Moors The public discontent was exasperated by Gelimer whose age descent and military fame gave him an apparent title to the succession he assumed with the consent of the nation the reins of government and his unfortunate sovereign sunk without a struggle from the throne to a dungeon where he was strictly guarded with a faithful counsellor and his unpopular nephew the Achilles of the Vandals But the indulgence which Hilderic had shown to his catholic subjects had powerfully recommended him to the favour of Justinian, who, for the benefit of his own sect, could acknowledge the use and justice of religious toleration their alliance while the nephew of Justin remained in a private station was cemented by the mutual exchange of gifts and letters and the emperor Justinian asserted the cause of royalty and friendship In two successive embassies he admonished the usurper to repent of his treason or to abstain, at least, from any further violence which might provoke the displeasure of God and of the Romans, to reverence the laws of kindred and succession, and to suffer an infirm old man peaceably to end his days either on the throne of Carthage or in the palace of Constantinople The passions or even the prudence of Gelimer compelled him to reject these requests which were urged in the haughty tone of menace and command and he justified his ambition in a language rarely spoken in the Byzantine court by alleging the right of a free people to remove or punish their chief magistrate who had failed in the execution of the kingly office After his fruitless expostulation, the captive monarch was more rigorously treated, his nephew was deprived of his eyes, and the cruel Vandal, confident in his strength and distance derided the vain threats and slow preparations of the emperor of the East Justinian resolved to deliver or revenge his friend, Gelimer to maintain his usurpation, and the war was preceded, according to the practice of civilised nations by the most solemn protestations that each party was sincerely desirous of peace

The report of an African war was grateful only to the vain and idle populace of Constantinople whose poverty exempted them from tribute and whose cowardice was seldom exposed to military service But the wiser citizens, who judged of the future by the past revolved in their memory the immense loss both of men and money which the empire had sustained in the expedition of Basiliscus The troops which after five laborious campaigns, had been recalled from the Persian frontier dreaded the sea the climate and the arms of an unknown enemy The ministers of the finances computed as far as they might compute, the demands of an African war the taxes which must be found and levied to supply those insatiate demands, and the danger lest their own lives or at least their lucrative employments should be made responsible for the deficiency of the supply Inspired by such selfish motives (for we may not suspect him of any zeal for the public good), John of Cappadocia ventured to oppose in full council the inclinations of his master He confessed that a victory of such importance could not be too dearly purchased but he represented in a grave discourse the certain difficulties and the uncertain event You undertake,' said the præfect, to besiege Carthage by land the distance is not less than one hundred and forty days' journey on the sea a whole year[4] must elapse before you can receive any intelligence from your fleet If Africa should be reduced, it cannot be preserved without the additional conquest of Sicily and Italy Success will impose the obligation of new labours a single misfortune will attract the barbarians into the heart of your exhausted empire Justinian felt the weight of this salutary advice he was confounded by the unwonted freedom of an obsequious servant, and the design of the war would perhaps have been relinquished, if his courage had not been revived by a voice which silenced the doubts of profane reason I have seen a vision,' cried an artful or fanatic bishop of the East It is the will of heaven, O emperor! that you should not abandon your holy enterprise for the deliverance of the African church The God of battles will march before your standard and disperse your enemies who are the enemies of his Son" The emperor might be tempted, and his counsellors were constrained to give credit to this seasonable revelation but they derived more rational hope from the revolt which the adherents of Hilderic of Athanasius had already excited on the borders of the Vandal monarchy Pudentius an African subject had privately signified his loyal intentions, and a small military aid restored the province of Tripoli to the obedience of the Romans The government of Sardinia had been intrusted to Godas, a valiant barbarian he suspended the payment of tribute, disclaimed his allegiance to the usurper, and gave audience to the emissaries of Justinian who found him master of that fruitful island at the head of his guards and proudly invested with the ensigns of royalty The forces of the Vandals were diminished by discord and suspicion the Roman armies were animated by the spirit of Belisarius one of those heroic names which are familiar to every age and to every nation

The Africanus of new Rome was born and perhaps educated among the Thracian peasants[5] without any of those advantages which had formed the virtues of the elder and younger Scipio—a noble origin liberal studies and the emulation of a free state The silence of a loquacious secretary may be admitted to prove that the youth of Belisarius could not afford any subject of praise he served most assuredly with valour and reputation among the private guards of Justinian and when his patron became emperor the domestic was promoted to military command After a bold inroad into Persarmenia in which his glory was shared by a colleague and his progress was checked by an enemy Belisarius repaired to the important station of Dara where he first accepted the service of Procopius the faithful companion and diligent historian of his exploits [8] The Mirranes of Persia advanced with forty thousand of her best troops to raze the fortifications of Dara and signified the day and the hour on which the citizens should prepare a bath for his refreshment after the toils of victory He encountered an adversary equal to himself by the new title of General of the East his superior in the science of war but much inferior in the number and quality of his troops which amounted only to twenty five thousand Romans and strangers relaxed in their discipline and humbled by recent disasters As the level plain of Dara refused all shelter to stratagem and ambush, Belisarius protected his front with a deep trench which was prolonged at first in perpendicular and afterwards in parallel lines to cover the wings of cavalry advantageously posted to command the flanks and rear of the enemy When the Roman centre was shaken, their well tim d and rapid charge decided the conflict the standard of Persia fell the immortals fled the infantry threw away their bucklers, and eight thou and of the vanquished were left on the fi ld of battle In the next campaign Syria was invaded on the side of the desert and Belisarius with twenty thousand men hastened from Dara to the relief of the province During the whole summer the designs of the enemy were baffled by his skilful dispositions he pressed th ir retreat occupied each night their camp of the preceding day and would have secured a bloodless victory if he could have resisted the impatience of his own troops Their valiant promise was faintly supported in the hour of battle the right wing was exposed by the treacherous or cowardly desertion of the Christian Arabs the Huns a veteran band of eight hundred warriors, were oppressed by superior numbers the flight of the Isaurians was intercepted but the Roman infantry stood firm on the left for Belisarius himself, dismounting from his horse showed them that intrepid despair was their only safety They turned their backs to the Euphrates and their faces to the enemy innumerable arrows glanced without effect from the compact and shelving order of their bucklers an impenetrable line of pikes was opposed to the repeated assaults of the Persian cavalry and after a resistance of many hours, the remaining troops were skilfully embarked under the shadow of the night The Persian commander retired with disorder and disgrace to answer a strict account of the lives of so many soldiers which he had consumed in a barren victory But the fame of Belisarius was not sullied by a defeat in which he alone had saved his army from the consequences of their own rashness the approach of peace relieved him from the guard of the eastern frontier and his conduct in the sedition of Constantinople amply discharged his obligations to the emperor When the African war became the topic of popular discourse and secret deliberation each of the Roman generals was apprehensive rather than ambitious of the dangerous honour but as soon as Justinian had declared his preference of superior merit their envy was rekindled by the unanimous applause which was given to the choice of Belisarius The temper of the Byzantine court may encourage a suspicion that the hero was darkly assisted by the intrigues of his wife the fair and subtle Antonina who alternately enjoyed the confidence and incurred the hatred of the empress Theodora The birth of Antonina was ignoble she descended from a f mily of charioteers and her chastity had been stained with the foulest reproach. Yet she reigned with long and absolute power over the mind of her illustrious hu band and if Antonina disdained the merit of conjugal fidelity she expressed a manly friendship to Belisarius whom she accompanied with undaunted resolution in all th hardships and dangers of a military life [9]

The preparations for the African war were not unworthy of the last contest between Rome and Carthage. The pride and flower of the army consisted of the guards of Belisarius who, according to the pernicious indulgence of the times devoted themselves by a particular oath of fidelity to the service of their patron. Their strength and stature for which they had been curiously selected the goodness of their horses and armour and the assiduous practice of all the exercises of war enabled them to act whatever their courage might prompt and their courage was exalted by the social honour of their rank and the personal ambition of favour and fortune Four hundred of the bravest of the Heruli marched under the banner of the faithful and active Pharas, their untractable valour was more highly prized than the tame submission of the Greeks and Syrians and of such importance was it deemed to procure a reinforcement of six hundred Massagetæ, or Huns, that they were allured by fraud and deceit to engage in a naval expedition Five thousand horse and ten thousand foot were embarked at Constantinople for the conquest of Africa but the infantry, for the most part levied in Thrace and Isauria, yielded to the more prevailing use and reputation of the cavalry and the Scythian bow was the weapon on which the armies of Rome were now reduced to place their principal dependence From a laudable desire to assert the dignity of his theme Procopius defends the soldiers of his own time against the morose critics, who confined that respectable name to the heavy armed warriors of antiquity, and maliciously observed that the word archer is introduced by Homer[8] as a term of contempt Such contempt might perhaps be due to the naked youths who appeared on foot in the fields of Troy, and, lurking behind a tombstone, or the shield of a friend, drew the bowstring to their breast[9] and dismissed a feeble and lifeless arrow But our archers (pursues the historian) are mounted on horses which they manage with admirable skill their head and shoulders are protected by a casque or buckler they wear greaves of iron on their legs and their bodies are guarded by a coat of mail On their right side hangs a quiver, *a sword on their left, and their hand is accus*tomed to wield a lance or javelin in closer combat Their bows are strong and weighty they shoot in every possible direction advancing, retreating to the front to the rear or to either flank and as they are taught to draw the bow string not to the breast but to the right ear, firm indeed must be the armour that can resist the rapid violence of their shaft Five hundred transports, navigated by twenty thousand mariners of Egypt Cilicia and Ionia were collected in the harbour of Constantinople The smallest of these vessels may be computed at thirty the largest at five hundred, tons and the fair average will supply an allowance, liberal but not profuse of about one hundred thousand tons[10] for the reception of thirty five thousand soldiers and sailors of five thousand horses of arms engines and military stores and of a sufficient stock of water and provisions for a voyage perhaps, of three months The proud galleys which in former ages swept the Mediterranean with so many hundred oars had long since disappeared, and the fleet of Justinian was escorted only by ninety two light brigantines covered from the missile weapons of the enemy, and rowed by two thousand of the brave and robust youth of Constantinople Twenty two generals are named most of whom were afterwards distinguished in the wars of Africa and Italy but the supreme command, both by land and sea was delegated to Belisarius alone, with a boundless power of acting according to his discretion, as if the emperor himself were present The separation of the naval and military professions is at once the effect and the cause of the modern improvements in the science of navigation and maritime war

In the seventh year of the reign of Justinian and about the time of the summer solstice, the whole fleet of six hundred ships was ranged in martial pomp before the gardens of the palace The patriarch pronounced his benediction, the emperor signified his last commands, the general s trumpet gave the signal of departure and every heart, according to its fears or wishes, explored with anxious curiosity the omens of misfortune and success The first halt was made at Perinthus or Heraclea where Belisarius waited five days to receive some Thracian horses, a military gift of his sovereign From thence the fleet pursued their course through the midst of the Propontis, but as they struggled to pass the Straits of the Hellespont an unfavourable wind detained them four days at Abydus where the general exhibited a memorable lesson of firm*ness and severity Two of the Huns*, who in a drunken quarrel had slain one of their fellow soldiers were instantly shown to the army suspended on a lofty gibbet The national indignity was resented by their countrymen who disclaimed the servile laws of the empire and asserted the free privilege of Scythia where a small fine was allowed to expiate the hasty sallies of intemperance and anger Their complaints were specious their clamours were loud, and the Romans were not averse to the example of disorder and impunity But the rising sedition was appeased by the authority and eloquence of the general and he represented to the assembled troops the obligation of justice the importance of discipline the rewards of piety and virtue, and the unpardonable guilt of murder, which in his apprehension was aggravated rather than excused by the vice of intoxication.[11] In the navigation from the Hellespont to Peloponnesus, which the Greeks after the siege of

Troy had performed in four days[11] the fleet of Belisarius was guided in their course by his master-galley conspicuous in the day by the redness of the sails, and in the night by the torches blazing from the mast head It was the duty of the pilots as they steered between the islands and turned the capes of Malea and Tænarium to preserve the just order and regular intervals of such a multitude of ships as the wind was fair and moderate their labours were not unsuccessful and the troops were safely disembarked at Methone on the Messenian coast, to repose themselves for awhile after the fatigues of the sea. In this place they experienced how avarice, invested with authority may sport with the lives of thousands which are bravely exposed for the public service. According to military practice the bread or biscuit of the Romans was twice prepared in the oven, and the diminution of one fourth was cheerfully allowed for the loss of weight To gain this miserable profit and to save the expence of wood the præfect, John of Cappadocia had given orders that the flour should be slightly baked by the same fire which warmed the baths of Constantinople and when the sacks were opened a soft and mouldy paste was distributed to the army Such unwholesome food assisted by the heat of the climate and season soon produced an epidemical disease which swept away five hundred soldiers Their health was restored by the diligence of Belisarius who provided fresh bread at Methone and boldly expressed his just and humane indignation the emperor heard his complaint the general was praised but the minister was not punished From the port of Methone the pilots steered along the western coast of Peloponnesus, as far as the isle of Zacynthus or Zante before they undertook the voyage (in their eyes a most arduous voyage) of one hundred leagues over the Ionian Sea As the fleet was surprised by a calm sixteen days were consumed in the slow navigation and even the general would have suffered the intolerable hardship of thirst if the ingenuity of Antonina had not preserved the water in glass bottles, which she buried deep in the sand in a part of the ship impervious to the rays of the sun. At length the harbour of Caucana[12] on the southern side of Sicily afforded a secure and hospitable shelter The Gothic officers who governed the island in the name of the daughter and grandson of Theodoric, obeyed their imprudent orders to receive the troops of Justinian like friends and allies provisions were liberally supplied the cavalry was remounted[14] and Procopius soon returned from Syracuse with correct information of the state and designs of the Vandals His intelligence determined Belisarius to hasten his operations and his wise impatience was seconded by the winds. The fleet lost sight of Sicily passed before the isle of Malta, discovered the capes of Africa, ran along the coast with a strong gale from the north-east and finally cast anchor at the promontory of Caput Vada about five days' journey to the south of Carthage.[15]

If Gelimer had been informed of the approach of the enemy he must have delayed the conquest of Sardinia for the immediate defence of his person and kingdom A detachment of five thousand soldiers and one hundred and twenty galleys would have joined the remaining forces of the Vandals and the descendant of Genseric might have surprised and oppressed a fleet of deep-laden transports incapable of action and of light brigantines that seem only qualified for flight Belisarius had secretly trembled when he overheard his soldiers in the passage emboldening each other to confess their apprehensions. If they were once on shore they hoped to maintain the honour of their arms but if they should be attacked at sea they did not blush to ac*knowledge* that they wanted courage to contend at the same time with the winds the waves, and the barbarians[16] The knowledge of their sentiments decided Belisarius to seize the first opportunity of landing them on the coast of Africa and he prudently rejected in a council of war the proposal of sailing with the fleet and army into the port of Carthage Three months after their departure from Constantinople, the men and horses the arms and military stores, were safely disembarked and five soldiers were left as a guard on board each of the ships which were disposed in the form of a semicircle The remainder of the troops occupied a camp on the sea-shore which they fortified according to ancient discipline, with a ditch and rampart and the discovery of a source of fresh water while it allayed the thirst, excited the superstitious confidence of the Romans The next morning some of the neighbouring gardens were pillaged and Belisarius after chastising the offenders embraced the slight occasion but the decisive moment of inculcating the maxims of justice moderation and genuine policy When I first accepted the commission of subduing Africa I depended much less said the general on the numbers or even the bravery of my troops than upon the friendly disposition of the natives, and their immortal hatred to the

Vandals You alone can deprive me of this hope if you continue to extort by rapine what might be purchased for a little money such acts of violence will reconcile these implacable enemies and unite them in a just and holy league against the invaders of their country ' These exhortations were enforced by a rigid discipline, of which the soldiers themselves soon felt and praised the salutary effects The inhabitants, instead of deserting their houses or hiding their corn supplied the Romans with a fair and liberal market the civil officers of the province continued to exercise their functions in the name of Justinian and the clergy from motives of conscience and interest, assiduously laboured to promote the cause of a catholic emperor The small town of Sullecte [17] one day's journey from the camp, had the honour of being foremost to open her gates and to resume her ancient allegiance the larger cities of Leptis and Adrumetum imitated the example of loyalty as soon as Belisarius appeared and he advanced without opposition as far as Grasse, a palace of the Vandal kings at the distance of fifty miles from Carthage. The weary Romans indulged themselves in the refreshment of shady groves cool fountains and delicious fruits and the preference which Procopius allows to these gardens over any that he had seen either in the East or West may be ascribed either to the taste or the fatigue of the historian In three generations prosperity and a warm climate had dissolved the hardy virtue of the Vandals who insensibly became the most luxurious of mankind In their villas and gardens, which might deserve the Persian name of Paradise [18] they enjoyed a cool and elegant repose, and, after the daily use of the bath the barbarians were seated at a table profusely spread with the delicacies of the land and sea Their silken robes loosely flowing after the fashion of the Medes, were embroidered with gold love and hunting were the labours of their life and their vacant hours were amused by pantomimes chariot races and the music and dances of the theatre

In a march of ten or twelve days the vigilance of Belisarius was constantly awake and active against his unseen enemies by whom in every place and at every hour he might be suddenly attacked An officer of confidence and merit John the Armenian led the vanguard of three hundred horse six hundred Massagetæ covered at a certain distance the left flank and the whole fleet steering along the coast seldom lost sight of the army, which moved each day about twelve miles and lodged in the evening in strong camps or in friendly towns The near approach of the Romans to Carthage filled the mind of Gelimer with anxiety and terror He prudently wished to protract the war till his brother with his veteran troops should return from the conquest of Sardinia and he now lamented the rash policy of his ancestors who by destroying the fortifications of Africa had left him only the dangerous resource of risking a battle in the neighbourhood of his capital The Vandal conquerors from their original number of fifty thousand were multiplied without including their women and children to one hundred and sixty thousand fighting men and such forces animated with valour and union might have crushed at their first landing the feeble and exhausted bands of the Roman general But the friends of the captive king were more inclined to accept the invitations than to resist the progress of Belisarius and many a proud barbarian disguised his aversion to war under the more specious name of his hatred to the usurper Yet the authority and promises of Gelimer collected a formidable army and his plans were concerted with some degree of military skill An order was despatched to his brother Ammatas to collect all the forces of Carthage and to encounter the van of the Roman army at the distance of ten miles from the city his nephew Gibamund with two thousand horse was destined to attack their left, when the monarch himself who silently followed should charge their rear in a situation which excluded them from the aid or even the view of their fleet But the rashness of Ammatas was fatal to himself and his country He anticipated the hour of the attack outstripped his tardy followers and was pierced with a mortal wound after he had slain with his own hand twelve of his boldest antagonists His Vandals fled to Carthage the highway almost ten miles was strewed with dead bodies and it seemed incredible that such multitudes could be slaughtered by the swords of three hundred Romans The nephew of Gelimer was defeated after a slight combat by the six hundred Massagetæ they did not equal the third part of his numbers but each Scythian was fired by the example of his chief who gloriously exercised the privilege of his family by riding foremost and alone to shoot the first arrow against the enemy In the meanwhile Gelimer himself ignorant of the event and misguided by the windings of the hills inadvertently passed the Roman army, and reached the scene of action where Ammatas had fallen He wept the fate of his brother and of Carthage charged with irresistible fury the advancing squadrons and might have pursued and perhaps decided the victory if he had not wasted those inestimable moments in the discharge of a vain though pious duty to the dead While his spirit was broken by this mournful office he heard the trumpet of Belisarius who leaving Antonina and his infantry in the camp pressed forwards with his guards and the remainder of the cavalry to rally his flying troops and to restore the fortune of the day Much room could not be found in this disorderly battle for the talents of a general but the king fled before the hero and the Vandals, accustomed only to a Moorish enemy were incapable of withstanding the arms and discipline of the Romans. Gelimer retired with hasty steps towards the desert of Numidia but he had soon the consolation of learning that his private orders for the execution of Hilderic and his captive friends had been faithfully obeyed. The tyrant s revenge was useful only to his enemies The death of a lawful prince excited the compassion of his people his life might have perplexed the victorious Romans and the lieutenant of Justinian by a crime of which he was innocent was relieved from the painful alternative of forfeiting his honour or relinquishing his conquests.

As soon as the tumult had subsided the several parts of the army informed each other of the accidents of the day and Belisarius pitched his camp on the field of victory to which the tenth mile-stone from Carthage had applied the Latin appellation of Decimus From a wise suspicion of the stratagems and resources of the Vandals he marched the next day in order of battle halted in the evening before the gates of Carthage and allowed a night of repose that he might not in darkness and disorder expose the city to the licence of the soldiers or the soldiers themselves to the secret ambush of the city But as the fears of Belisarius were the result of calm and intrepid reason, he was soon satisfied that he might confide without danger in the peaceful and friendly aspect of the capital. Carthage blazed with innumerable torches, the signals of the public joy the chain was removed that guarded the entrance of the port, the gates were thrown open and the people with acclamations of gratitude hailed and invited their Roman deliverers The defeat of the Vandals and the freedom of Africa were announced to the city on the eve of St Cyprian, when the churches were already adorned and illuminated for the festival of the martyr whom three centuries of superstition had almost raised to a local deity The Arians conscious that their reign had expired resigned the temple to the catholics who rescued their saint from profane hands, performed the holy rites and loudly proclaimed the creed of Athanasius and Justinian. One awful hour reversed the fortunes of the contending parties The suppliant Vandals who had so lately indulged the vices of conquerors, sought an humble refuge in the sanctuary of the church while the merchants of the East were delivered from the deepest dungeon of the palace by their affrighted keeper who implored the protection of his captives and showed them through an aperture in the wall the sails of the Roman fleet After their separation from the army the naval commanders had proceeded with slow caution along the coast till they reached the Hermaean promontory and obtained the first intelligence of the victory of Belisarius. Faithful to his instructions they would have cast anchor about twenty miles from Carthage if the more skilful seamen had not represented the perils of the shore and the signs of an impending tempest. Still ignorant of the revolution, they declined however the rash attempt of forcing the chain of the port and the adjacent harbour and suburb of Mandracium were insulted only by the rapine of a private officer who disobeyed and deserted his leaders But the imperial fleet advancing with a fair wind steered through the narrow entrance of the Goletta and occupied in the deep and capacious lake of Tunis a secure station about five miles from the capital[39] No sooner was Belisarius informed of their arrival than he despatched orders that the greatest part of the mariners should be immediately landed to join the triumph and to swell the apparent numbers of the Romans Before he allowed them to enter the gates of Carthage, he exhorted them in a discourse worthy of himself and the occasion not to disgrace the glory of their arms and to remember that the Vandals had been the tyrants but that they were the deliverers of the Africans, who must now be respected as the voluntary and affectionate subjects of their common sovereign The Romans marched through the streets in close ranks prepared for battle if an enemy had appeared the strict order maintained by the general imprinted on their minds the duty of obedience and in an age in which custom and impunity almost sanctified the abuse of conquest, the genius of one man repressed the passions of a victorious army The voice of

Vandals You alone can deprive me of this hope if you continue to extort by rapine what might be purchased for a little money such acts of violence will reconcile these implacable enemies and unite them in a just and holy league against the invaders of their country These exhortations were enforced by a rigid discipline of which the soldiers themselves soon felt and praised the salutary effects The inhabitants instead of deserting their houses or hiding their corn supplied the Romans with a fair and liberal market, the civil officers of the province continued to exercise their functions in the name of Justinian and the clergy, from motives of conscience and interest assiduously laboured to promote the cause of a catholic emperor The small town of Sullecte [17] one day s journey from the camp had the honour of being foremost to open her gates and to resume her ancient allegiance the larger cities of Leptis and Adrumetum imitated the example of loyalty as soon as Belisarius appeared, and he advanced without opposition as far as Grasse, a palace of the Vandal kings at the distance of fifty miles from Carthage. The weary Romans indulged themselves in the refreshment of shady groves cool fountains, and delicious fruits and the preference which Procopius allows to these gardens over any that he had seen either in the East or West may be ascribed either to the taste or the fatigue of the historian In three generations prosperity and a warm climate had dissolved the hardy virtue of the Vandals, who insensibly became the most luxurious of mankind In their villas and gardens which might deserve the Persian name of Paradise [18] they enjoyed a cool and elegant repose and after the daily use of the bath the barbarians were seated at a table profusely spread with the delicacies of the land and sea Their silken robes, loosely flowing after the fashion of the Medes were embroidered with gold love and hunting were the labours of their life and their vacant hours were amused by pantomimes chariot races and the music and dances of the theatre

In a march of ten or twelve days the vigilance of Belisarius was constantly awake and active against his unseen enemies by whom in every place and at every hour, he might be suddenly attacked An officer of confidence and merit, John the Armenian led the vanguard of three hundred horse six hundred Massagetæ covered at a certain distance the left flank and the whole fleet steering along the coast seldom lost sight of the army which moved each day about twelve miles and lodged in the evening in strong camps or in friendly towns The near approach of the Romans to Carthage filled the mind of Gelimer with anxiety and terror He prudently wished to protract the war till his brother with his veteran troops should return from the conquest of Sardinia, and he now lamented the rash policy of his ancestors who by destroying the fortifications of Africa had left him only the dangerous resource of risking a battle in the neighbourhood of his capital The Vandal conquerors from their original number of fifty thousand were multiplied without including their women and children to one hundred and sixty thousand fighting men and such forces animated with valour and union might have crushed at their first landing the feeble and exhausted bands of the Roman general But the friends of the captive king were more inclined to accept the invitations than to resist the progress of Belisarius, and many a proud barbarian disguised his aversion to war under the more specious name of his hatred to the usurper Yet the authority and promises of Gelimer collected a formidable army and his plans were concerted with some degree of military skill An order was despatched to his brother Ammatas to collect all the forces of Carthage and to encounter the van of the Roman army at the distance of ten miles from the city his nephew Gibamund with two thousand horse was destined to attack their left when the monarch himself, who silently followed, should charge their rear in a situation which excluded them from the aid or even the view of their fleet But the rashness of Ammatas was fatal to himself and his country He anticipated the hour of the attack outstripped his tardy followers and was pierced with a mortal wound after he had slain with his own hand twelve of his boldest antagonists His Vandals fled to Carthage the highway almost ten miles was strewed with dead bodies and it seemed incredible that such multitudes could be slaughtered by the swords of three hundred Romans The nephew of Gelimer was defeated after a slight combat by the six hundred Massagetæ they did not equal the third part of his numbers but each Scythian was fired by the example of his chief who gloriously exercised the privilege of his family by riding foremost and alone to shoot the first arrow against the enemy In the meanwhile Gelimer himself, ignorant of the event and misguided by the windings of the hills inadvertently passed the Roman army, and reached the scene of action where Ammatas had fallen He wept the fate of the first line which Belisarius supported in the centre at the head of five hundred guards the infantry at some distance, was posted in the second line and the vigilance of the general watched the separate station and ambiguous faith of the Massagetae, who secretly reserved their aid for the conquerors The historian has inserted and the reader may easily supply the speeches[illegible] of the commanders who by arguments the most opposite to their situation, inculcated the importance of victory and the contempt of life. Zano with the troops which had followed him to the conquest of Sardinia was placed in the centre, and the throne of Genseric might have stood, if the multitude of Vandals had imitated their intrepid resolution. Casting away their lances and missile weapons, they drew their swords and expected the charge the Roman cavalry thrice passed the rivulet they were thrice repulsed and the conflict was firmly maintained till Zano fell and the standard of Belisarius was displayed Gelimer retreated to his camp the Huns joined the pursuit, and the victors despoiled the bodies of the slain. Yet no more than fifty Romans and eight hundred Vandals were found on the field of battle so inconsiderable was the carnage of a day which extinguished a nation and transferred the empire of Africa In the evening Belisarius led his infantry to the attack of the camp and the pusillanimous flight of Gelimer exposed the vanity of his recent declarations that to the vanquished death was a relief life a burden, and infamy the only object of terror His departure was secret, but as soon as the Vandals discovered that their king had deserted them, they hastily dispersed anxious only for their personal safety and careless of every object that is dear or valuable to mankind. The Romans entered the camp without resistance and the wildest scenes of disorder were veiled in the darkness and confusion of the night Every barbarian who met their swords was inhumanly massacred their widows and daughters as rich heirs or beautiful concubines were embraced by the licentious soldiers and avarice itself was almost satiated with the treasures of gold and silver the accumulated fruits of conquest or economy in a long period of prosperity and peace. In this frantic search the troops even of Belisarius, forgot their caution and respect Intoxicated with lust and rapine, they explored in small parties or alone the adjacent fields the woods the rocks and the caverns that might possibly conceal any desirable prize laden with booty they deserted their ranks, and wandered, without a guide on the high road to Carthage, and if the flying enemies had dared to return very few of the conquerors would have escaped. Deeply sensible of the disgrace and danger Belisarius passed an apprehensive night on the field of victory at the dawn of day he planted his standard on a hill recalled his guards and veterans and gradually restored the modesty and obedience of the camp It was equally the concern of the Roman general to subdue the hostile and to save the prostrate barbarian and the suppliant Vandals who could be found only in churches were protected by his authority disarmed and separately confined that they might neither disturb the public peace nor become the victims of popular revenge. After despatching a light detachment to tread the footsteps of Gelimer he advanced with his whole army about ten days march, as far as Hippo Regius, which no longer possessed the relics of St. Augustin.[illegible] The season and the certain intelligence that the Vandal had fled to the inaccessible country of the Moors determined Belisarius to relinquish the vain pursuit, and to fix his winter quarters at Carthage From thence he despatched his principal lieutenant to inform the emperor that in the space of three months he had achieved the conquest of Africa.

Belisarius spoke the language of truth. The surviving Vandals yielded without resistance, their arms and their freedom the neighbourhood of Carthage submitted to his presence and the more distant provinces were successively subdued by the report of his victory Tripoli was confirmed in her voluntary allegiance Sardinia and Corsica surrendered to an officer who carried instead of a sword the head of the valiant Zano and the isles of Majorca Minorca, and Yvica consented to remain an humble appendage of the African kingdom Caesarea a royal city which in looser geography may be confounded with the modern Algiers was situate thirty days march to the westward of Carthage by land the road was infested by the Moors but the sea was open and the Romans were now masters of the sea An active and discreet tribune sailed as far as the Straits, where he occupied Septem or Ceuta[illegible] which rises opposite to Gibraltar on the African coast that remote place was afterwards adorned and fortified by Justinian and he seems to have indulged the vain ambition of extending his empire to the Columns of Hercules He received the messengers of victory at the time when he was preparing to publish the Pandects of the Roman law and the devout or jealous emperor menace and complaint was silent the trade of Carthage was not interrupted while Africa changed her master and her government, the shops continued open and busy and the soldiers after sufficient guards had been posted, modestly departed to the houses which were allotted for their reception Belisarius fixed his residence in the palace, seated himself on the throne of Genseric accepted and distributed the barbaric spoil granted their lives to the suppliant Vandals and laboured to repair the damage which the suburb of Mandracium had sustained in the preceding night At supper he entertained his principal officers with the form and magnificence of a royal banquet[20] The victor was respectfully served by the captive officers of the household, and in the moments of festivity, when the impartial spectators applauded the fortune and merit of Belisarius his envious flatterers secretly shed their venom on every word and gesture which might alarm the suspicions of a jealous monarch One day was given to these pompous scenes, which may not be despised as useless if they attracted the popular veneration but the active mind of Belisarius which in the pride of victory could suppose a defeat, had already resolved that the Roman empire in Africa should not depend on the chance of arms or the favour of the people The fortifications of Carthage had alone been exempted from the general proscription but in the reign of ninety five years they were suffered to decay by the thoughtless and indolent Vandals A wiser conqueror restored with incredible despatch the walls and ditches of the city His liberality encouraged the workmen the soldiers the mariners and the citizens vied with each other in the salutary labour, and Gelimer who had feared to trust his person in an open town, beheld with astonishment and despair the rising strength of an impregnable fortress

That unfortunate monarch after the loss of his capital, applied himself to collect the remains of an army scattered rather than destroyed, by the preceding battle and the hopes of pillage attracted some Moorish bands to the standard of Gelimer He encamped in the fields of Bulla four days journey from Carthage insulted the capital which he deprived of the use of an aqueduct proposed a high reward for the head of every Roman affected to spare the persons and property of his African subjects and secretly negotiated with the Arian sectaries and the confederate Huns Under these circumstances the conquest of Sardinia served only to aggravate his distress he reflected with the deepest anguish, that he had wasted in that useless enterprise five thousand of his bravest troops and he read with grief and shame, the victorious letters of his brother Zano, who expressed a sanguine confidence that the king after the example of their ancestors, had already chastised the rashness of the Roman invader Alas! my brother,' replied Gelimer, "Heaven has declared against our unhappy nation While you have subdued Sardinia we have lost Africa No sooner did Belisarius appear with a handful of soldiers than courage and prosperity deserted the cause of the Vandals Your nephew Gibamund your brother Ammatas, have been betrayed to death by the cowardice of their followers Our horses our ships Carthage itself, and all Africa are in the power of the enemy Yet the Vandals still prefer an ignominious repose, at the expense of their wives and children their wealth and liberty Nothing now remains except the field of Bulla and the hope of your valour Abandon Sardinia fly to our relief restore our empire, or perish by our side' On the receipt of this epistle Zano imparted his grief to the principal Vandals but the intelligence was prudently concealed from the natives of the island The troops embarked in one hundred and twenty galleys at the port of Cagliari cast anchor the third day on the confines of Mauritania and hastily pursued their march to join the royal standard in the camp of Bulla Mournful was the interview the two brothers embraced they wept in silence no questions were asked of the Sardinian victory no inquiries were made of the African misfortunes they saw before their eyes the whole extent of their calamities and the absence of their wives and children afforded a melancholy proof that either death or captivity had been their lot The languid spirit of the Vandals was at length awakened and united by the entreaties of their king the example of Zano and the instant danger which threatened their monarchy and religion The military strength of the nation advanced to battle, and such was the rapid increase that before their army reached Tricameron about twenty miles from Carthage they might boast perhaps with some exaggeration that they surpassed in a tenfold proportion the diminutive powers of the Romans But these powers were under the command of Belisarius and as he was conscious of their superior merit he permitted the barbarians to surprise him at an unseasonable hour The Romans were instantly under arms a rivulet covered their front the cavalry formed will you persist in hopeless obstinacy? Why will you ruin yourself your family and nation? The love of freedom and abhorrence of slavery? Alas! my dearest Gelimer are you not already the worst of slaves the slave of the vile nation of the Moors? Would it not be preferable to sustain at Constantinople a life of poverty and servitude rather than to reign the undoubted monarch of the mountain of Papua? Do you think it a disgrace to be the subject of Justinian? Belisarius is his subject and we ourselves whose birth is not inferior to your own are not ashamed of our obedience to the Roman emperor That generous prince will grant you a rich inheritance of lands a place in the senate and the dignity of patrician such are his gracious intentions, and you may depend with full assurance on the word of Belisarius So long as Heaven has condemned us to suffer patience is a virtue but if we reject the proffered deliverance it degenerates into blind and stupid despair I am not insensible replied the king of the Vandals how kind and rational is your advice But I cannot persuade myself to become the slave of an unjust enemy who has deserved my implacable hatred Him I had never injured either by word or deed yet he has sent against me I know not from whence a certain Belisarius, who has cast me headlong from the throne into this abyss of misery Justinian is a man he is a prince does he not dread for himself a similar reverse of fortune? I can write no more my grief oppresses me. Send me I beseech you my dear Pharas send me a lyre [40] a sponge and a loaf of bread From the Vandal messenger Pharas was informed of the motives of this singular request. It was long since the king of Africa had tasted bread a defluxion had fallen on his eyes the effect of fatigue or incessant weeping and he wished to solace the melancholy hours by singing to the lyre the sad story of his own misfortunes The humanity of Pharas was moved he sent the three extraordinary gifts but even his humanity prompted him to redouble the vigilance of his guard that he might sooner compel his prisoner to embrace a resolution advantageous to the Romans but salutary to himself. The obstinacy of Gelimer at length yielded to reason and necessity the solemn assurances of safety and honourable treatment were ratified in the emperor's name by the ambassador of Belisarius, and the king of the Vandals descended from the mountain. The first public interview was in one of the suburbs of Carthage and when the royal captive accosted his conqueror he burst into a fit of laughter The crowd might naturally believe that extreme grief had deprived Gelimer of his senses but in this mournful state unseasonable mirth insinuated to more intelligent observers that the vain and transitory scenes of human greatness are unworthy of a serious thought [41]

Their contempt was soon justified by a new example of a vulgar truth—that flattery adheres to power and envy to superior merit The chiefs of the Roman army presumed to think themselves the rivals of an hero Their private despatches maliciously affirmed that the conqueror of Africa strong in his reputation and the public love conspired to seat himself on the throne of the Vandals Justinian listened with too patient an ear and his silence was the result of jealousy rather than of confidence. An honourable alternative of remaining in the province or of returning to the capital was indeed submitted to the discretion of Belisarius but he wisely concluded from intercepted letters and the knowledge of his sovereign's temper that he must either resign his head erect his standard or confound his enemies by his presence and submission. Innocence and courage decided his choice his guards captives, and treasures were diligently embarked and so prosperous was the navigation that his arrival at Constantinople preceded any certain account of his departure from the port of Carthage. Such unsuspecting loyalty removed the apprehensions of Justinian envy was silenced and inflamed by the public gratitude and the third Africanus obtained the honours of a triumph, a ceremony which the city of Constantine had never seen and which ancient Rome since the reign of Tiberius had reserved for the auspicious arms of the Cæsars.[42] From the palace of Belisarius the procession was conducted through the principal streets to the hippodrome and this memorable day seemed to avenge the injuries of Genseric and to expiate the shame of the Romans The wealth of nations was displayed the trophies of martial or effeminate luxury rich armour golden thrones and the chariots of state which had been used by the Vandal queen the massy furniture of the royal banquet the splendour of precious stones, the elegant forms of statues and vases the more substantial treasure of gold and the holy vessels of the Jewish temple, which after their long peregrination were respectfully deposited in the Christian church of Jerusalem A long train of the noblest Vandals reluctantly exposed their lofty stature and manly counte

celebrated the divine goodness and confessed in silence the merit of his successful general [24] Impatient to abolish the temporal and spiritual tyranny of the Vandals he proceeded without delay to the full establishment of the catholic church Her jurisdiction, wealth, and immunities, perhaps the most essential part of episcopal religion were restored and amplified with a liberal hand the Arian worship was suppressed the Donatist meetings were proscribed [25] and the synod of Carthage by the voice of two hundred and seventeen bishops [26] applauded the just measure of pious retaliation On such an occasion it may not be presumed that many orthodox prelates were absent, but the comparative smallness of their number which in ancient councils had been twice or even thrice multiplied, most clearly indicates the decay both of the church and state While Justinian approved himself the defender of the faith he entertained an ambitious hope that his victorious lieutenant would speedily enlarge the narrow limits of his dominion to the space which they occupied before the invasion of the Moors and Vandals and Belisarius was instructed to establish five dukes or commanders in the convenient stations of Tripoli Leptis Cirta Cæsarea, and Sardinia and to compute the military force of palatines or borderers that might be sufficient for the defence of Africa The kingdom of the Vandals was not unworthy of the presence of a Prætorian præfect and four consulars three presidents were appointed to administer the seven provinces under his civil jurisdiction The number of their subordinate officers clerks messengers or assistants was minutely expressed three hundred and ninety six for the præfect himself fifty for each of his vicegerents, and the rigid definition of their fees and salaries was more effectual to confirm the right than to prevent the abuse These magistrates might be oppressive, but they were not idle and the subtle questions of justice and revenue were infinitely propagated under the new government which professed to revive the freedom and equity of the Roman republic The conqueror was solicitous to extract a prompt and plentiful supply from his African subjects and he allowed them to claim even in the third degree and from the collateral line the houses and lands of which their families had been unjustly despoiled by the Vandals After the departure of Belisarius who acted by a high and special commission no ordinary provision was made for a master general of the forces but the office of Prætorian præfect was intrusted to a soldier the civil and military powers were united, according to the practice of Justinian, in the chief governor and the representative of the emperor in Africa, as well as in Italy, was soon distinguished by the appellation of Exarch [27]

Yet the conquest of Africa was imperfect till her former sovereign was delivered either alive or dead into the hands of the Romans Doubtful of the event, Gelimer had given secret orders that a part of his treasure should be transported to Spain, where he hoped to find a secure refuge at the court of the king of the Visigoths But these intentions were disappointed by accident, treachery and the indefatigable pursuit of his enemies, who intercepted his flight from the sea shore and chased the unfortunate monarch, with some faithful followers to the inaccessible mountain of Papua [28] in the inland country of Numidia He was immediately besieged by Pharas an officer whose truth and sobriety were the more applauded, as such qualities could seldom be found among the Heruli, the most corrupt of the barbarian tribes To his vigilance Belisarius had intrusted this important charge and after a bold attempt to scale the mountain in which he lost an hundred and ten soldiers Pharas expected during a winter siege the operation of distress and famine on the mind of the Vandal king From the softest habits of pleasure from the unbounded command of industry and wealth he was reduced to share the poverty of the Moors [29] supportable only to themselves by their ignorance of a happier condition In their rude hovels of mud and hurdles which confined the smoke and excluded the light they promiscuously slept on the ground perhaps on a sheepskin with their wives their children and their cattle Sordid and scanty were their garments the use of bread and wine was unknown and their oaten or barley cakes imperfectly baked in the ashes, were devoured almost in a crude state by the hungry savages The health of Gelimer must have sunk under these strange and unwonted hardships from whatsoever cause they had been endured but his actual misery was embittered by the recollection of past greatness the daily insolence of his protectors and the just apprehension that the light and venal Moors might be tempted to betray the rights of hospitality The knowledge of his situation dictated the humane and friendly epistle of Pharas Like yourself said the chief of the Heruli I am an illiterate barbarian but I speak the language of plain sense and an honest heart Why transported with the same ease as their arms their families and their cattle which consisted of sheep oxen and camels [a] During the vigour of the Roman power they observed a respectful distance from Carthage and the sea shore under the feeble reign of the Vandals they invaded the cities of Numidia occupied the sea coast from Tangier to Cæsarea and pitched their camps with impunity in the fertile province of Pyzatium. The formidable strength and artful conduct of Belisarius secured the neutrality of the Moorish princes whose vanity aspired to receive in the emperor's name the ensigns of their regal dignity [a] They were astonished by the rapid event and trembled in the presence of their conqueror But his approaching departure soon relieved the apprehensions of a savage and superstitious people the number of their wives allowed them to disregard the safety of their infant hostages and when the Roman general hoisted sail in the port of Carthage he heard the cries and almost beheld the flames of the desolated province Yet he persisted in his resolution and leaving only a part of his guards to reinforce the feeble garrisons he intrusted the command of Africa to the eunuch Solomon [a] who proved himself not unworthy to be the successor of Belisarius. In the first invasion some detachments with two officers of merit, were surprised and intercepted but Solomon speedily assembled his troops marched from Carthage into the heart of the country and in two great battles destroyed sixty thousand of the barbarians The Moors depended on their multitude their swiftness, and their inaccessible mountains and the aspect and smell of their camels are said to have produced some confusion in the Roman cavalry [a] But as soon as they were commanded to dismount they derided this contemptible obstacle as soon as the columns ascended the hills the naked and disorderly crowd was dazzled by glittering arms and regular evolutions and the menace of their female prophets was repeatedly fulfilled that the Moors should be discomfited by a beardless antagonist The victorious eunuch advanced thirteen days journey from Carthage to besiege Mount Aurasius [a] the citadel and at the same time the garden, of Numidia That range of hills a branch of the great Atlas contains within a circumference of one hundred and twenty miles a rare variety of soil and climate the intermediate valleys and elevated plains abound with rich pastures perpetual streams and fruits of a delicious taste and uncommon magnitude This fair solitude is decorated with the ruins of Lambesa a Roman city once the seat of a legion and the residence of forty thousand inhabitants The Ionic temple of Æsculapius is encompassed with Moorish huts and the cattle now graze in the midst of an amphitheatre, under the shade of Corinthian columns A sharp perpendicular rock rises above the level of the mountain where the African princes deposited their wives and treasure, and a proverb is familiar to the Arabs that the man may eat fire who dares to attack the craggy cliffs and inhospitable natives of Mount Aurasius This hardy enterprise was twice attempted by the eunuch Solomon from the first he retreated with some disgrace and in the second his patience and provisions were almost exhausted and he must again have retired if he had not yielded to the impetuous courage of his troops who audaciously scaled, to the astonishment of the Moors the mountain the hostile camp and the summit of the Geminian rock. A citadel was erected to secure this important conquest, and to remind the barbarians of their defeat and as Solomon pursued his march to the west the long lost province of Mauritanian Sitifi was again annexed to the Roman empire The Moorish war continued several years after the departure of Belisarius but the laurels which he resigned to a faithful lieutenant may be justly ascribed to his own triumph.

The experience of past faults which may sometimes correct the mature age of an individual is seldom profitable to the successive generations of mankind The nations of antiquity careless of each other's safety were separately vanquished and enslaved by the Romans This awful lesson might have instructed the barbarians of the West to oppose with timely counsels and confederate arms the unbounded ambition of Justinian Yet the same error was repeated, the same consequences were felt and the Goths both of Italy and Spain insensible of their approaching danger beheld with indifference and even with joy the rapid downfall of the Vandals After the failure of the royal line Theudes a valiant and powerful chief ascended the throne of Spain, which he had formerly administered in the name of Theodoric and his infant grandson Under his command the Visigoths besieged the fortress of Ceuta on the African coast but, while they spent the Sabbath-day in peace and devotion the pious security of their camp was invaded by a sally from the town and the king himself with some difficulty and danger escaped from

nance Gelimer slowly advanced he was clad in a purple robe and still maintained the majesty of a king Not a tear escaped from his eyes not a sigh was heard but his pride or piety derived some secret consolation from the words of Solomon [33] which he repeatedly pronounced, VANITY! VANITY! ALL IS VANITY! Instead of ascending a triumphal car drawn by four horses or elephants the modest conqueror marched on foot at the head of his brave companions his prudence might decline an honour too conspicuous for a subject and his magnanimity might justly disdain what had been so often sullied by the vilest of tyrants The glorious procession entered the gate of the hippodrome, was saluted by the acclamations of the senate and people and halted before the throne where Justinian and Theodora were seated to receive the homage of the captive monarch and the victorious hero They both performed the customary adoration and falling prostrate on the ground respectfully touched the footstool of a prince who had not unsheathed his sword and of a prostitute who had danced on the theatre some gentle violence was used to bend the stubborn spirit of the grandson of Genseric, and however trained to servitude the genius of Belisarius must have secretly rebelled He was immediately declared consul for the ensuing year and the day of his inauguration resembled the pomp of a second triumph his curule chair was borne aloft on the shoulders of captive Vandals and the spoils of war, gold cups and rich girdles were profusely scattered among the populace

But the purest reward of Belisarius was in the faithful execution of a treaty for which his honour had been pledged to the king of the Vandals The religious scruples of Gelimer who adhered to the Arian heresy were incompatible with the dignity of senator or patrician but he received from the emperor an ample estate in the province of Galatia where the abdicated monarch retired with his family and friends to a life of peace, of affluence and perhaps of content [34] The daughters of Hilderic were entertained with the respectful tenderness due to their age and misfortune and Justinian and Theodora accepted the honour of educating and enriching the female descendants of the great Theodosius The bravest of the Vandal youth were distributed into five squadrons of cavalry, which adopted the name of their benefactor, and supported in the Persian wars the glory of their ancestors But these rare exceptions the reward of birth or valour, are insufficient to explain the fate of a nation whose numbers, before a short and bloodless war, amounted to more than six hundred thousand persons After the exile of their king and nobles the servile crowd might purchase their safety by abjuring their character, religion and language and their degenerate posterity would be insensibly mingled with the common herd of African subjects Yet even in the present age and in the heart of the Moorish tribes a curious traveller has discovered the white complexion and long flaxen hair of a northern race [35] and it was formerly believed that the boldest of the Vandals fled beyond the power or even the knowledge of the Romans to enjoy their solitary freedom on the shores of the Atlantic ocean [36] Africa had been their empire, it became their prison nor could they entertain a hope or even a wish, of returning to the banks of the Elbe, where their brethren, of a spirit less adventurous still wandered in their native forests It was impossible for cowards to surmount the barriers of unknown seas and hostile barbarians it was impossible for brave men to expose their nakedness and defeat before the eyes of their countrymen to describe the kingdoms which they had lost, and to claim a share of the humble inheritance which in a happier hour, they had almost unanimously renounced [37] In the country between the Elbe and the Oder several populous villages of Lusatia are inhabited by the Vandals they still preserve their language their customs and the purity of their blood support with some impatience, the Saxon or Prussian yoke, and serve with secret and voluntary allegiance, the descendant of their ancient kings who in his garb and present fortune is confounded with the meanest of his vassals [38] The name and situation of this unhappy people might indicate their descent from one common stock with the conquerors of Africa But the use of a Sclavonian dialect more clearly represents them as the last remnant of the new colonies who succeeded to the genuine Vandals already scattered or destroyed in the age of Procopius [39]

If Belisarius had been tempted to hesitate in his allegiance he might have urged even against the emperor himself the indispensable duty of saving Africa from an enemy more barbarous than the Vandals The origin of the Moors is involved in darkness they were ignorant of the use of letters [40] Their limits cannot be precisely defined a boundless continent was open to the Libyan shepherds the change of seasons and pastures regulated their motions, and their rude huts and slender furniture were

VANITY! ALL IS VANITY! Instead of ascending a triumphal car drawn by four horses or elephants, the modest conqueror marched on foot at the head of his brave companions his prudence might decline an honour too conspicuous for a subject and his magnanimity might justly disdain what had been so often sullied by the vilest of tyrants The glorious procession entered the gate of the hippodrome was saluted by the acclamations of the senate and people and halted before the throne where Justinian and Theodora were seated to receive the homage of the captive monarch and the victorious hero They both performed the customary adoration and falling prostrate on the ground respectfully touched the footstool of a prince who had not unsheathed his sword, and of a prostitute who had danced on the theatre some gentle violence was used to bend the stubborn spirit of the grandson of Genseric and however trained to servitude the genius of Belisarius must have secretly rebelled He was immediately declared consul for the ensuing year, and the day of his inauguration resembled the pomp of a second triumph his curule chair was borne aloft on the shoulders of captive Vandals and the spoils of war, gold cups, and rich girdles, were profusely scattered among the populace

But the purest reward of Belisarius was in the faithful execution of a treaty for which his honour had been pledged to the king of the Vandals The religious scruples of Gelimer, who adhered to the Arian heresy, were incompatible with the dignity of senator or patrician but he received from the emperor an ample estate in the province of Galatia where the abdicated monarch retired with his family and friends, to a life of peace, of affluence and perhaps of content [34] The daughters of Hilderic were entertained with the respectful tenderness due to their age and misfortune and Justinian and Theodora accepted the honour of educating and enriching the female descendants of the great Theodosius The bravest of the Vandal youth were distributed into five squadrons of cavalry, which adopted the name of their benefactor, and supported in the Persian wars the glory of their ancestors But these rare exceptions the reward of birth or valour, are insufficient to explain the fate of a nation whose numbers, before a short and bloodless war, amounted to more than six hundred thousand persons After the exile of their king and nobles the servile crowd might purchase their safety by abjuring their character, religion and language and their degenerate posterity would be insensibly mingled with the common herd of African subjects Yet even in the present age and in the heart of the Moorish tribes a curious traveller has discovered the white complexion and long flaxen hair of a northern race [35] and it was formerly believed that the boldest of the Vandals fled beyond the power or even the knowledge, of the Romans, to enjoy their solitary freedom on the shores of the Atlantic ocean [36] Africa had been their empire, it became their prison, nor could they entertain a hope, or even a wish, of returning to the banks of the Elbe where their brethren of a spirit less adventurous still wandered in their native forests It was impossible for cowards to surmount the barriers of unknown seas and hostile barbarians, it was impossible for brave men to expose their nakedness and defeat before the eyes of their countrymen to describe the kingdoms which they had lost, and to claim a share of the humble inheritance which in a happier hour, they had almost unanimously renounced [37] In the country between the Elbe and the Oder several populous villages of Lusatia are inhabited by the Vandals they still preserve their language their customs and the purity of their blood support, with some impatience the Saxon or Prussian yoke, and serve with secret and voluntary allegiance the descendant of their ancient kings who in his garb and present fortune is confounded with the meanest of his vassals [38] The name and situation of this unhappy people might indicate their descent from one common stock with the conquerors of Africa But the use of a Sclavonian dialect more clearly represents them as the last remnant of the new colonies who succeeded to the genuine Vandals already scattered or destroyed in the age of Procopius [39]

If Belisarius had been tempted to hesitate in his allegiance he might have urged even against the emperor himself the indispensable duty of saving Africa from an enemy more barbarous than the Vandals The origin of the Moors is involved in darkness they were ignorant of the use of letters [40] Their limits cannot be precisely defined a boundless continent was open to the Libyan shepherds the change of seasons and pastures regulated their motions, and their rude huts and slender furniture were

a short time the charms of Amalasontha and the hopes of the succession and his widow after the death of her husband and father was left the guardian of her son Athalaric and the king dom of Italy At the age of about twenty-eight years the endowments of her mind and person had attained their perfect maturity Her beauty which in the apprehension of Theodora her self might have disputed the conquest of an emperor was animated by manly sense activ ity and resolution Education and experience had cultiva ed her talents her philosophic studies were exempt from vanity and though she expressed herself with equal elegance and ease in the Greek, the Latin and the Gothic tongue the daughter of Theodoric maintained in her counsels a discreet and impenetrable silence By a faithful imitation of the virtues, she revived the prosperity of his reign while she strove, with pious care to expiate the faults and to obliterate the darker memory of his declining age The children of Boethius and Symmachus were res ored to their paternal in heritance her extreme lenity never consented to inflict any corporal or pecuniary penalties on her Roman subjects and she generously de spised the clamours of the Goths who at the end of forty years still considered the people of Italy as their slaves or their enemies Her salu tary measures were directed by the wisdom and celebrated by the eloquence of Cassiodorus she solicited and deserved the friendship of the emperor and the kingdoms of Europe re spected both in peace and war the majesty of the Gothic throne But the future happiness of the queen of Italy depended on the education of her son, who was destined by his birth, to support the different and almost incompatible characters of the chief of a barbarian camp and the first magistrate of a civilised nation From the age of ten years[34] Athalaric was diligently instructed in the arts and sciences either useful or ornamental for a Roman prince, and three venerable Goths were chosen to instil the prin ciples of honour and virtue into the mind of th ir young king But the p pil who is insensible of the benefits must abhor the restraints of education and the solicitude of the queen wh ch affection rendered anxious and severe offended the untractable nature of her son and his subjects On a solemn festival when the Goths were assembled in the palace of Ravenna the royal youth escaped from his mother's apartment, and with tears of pride and anger complained of a blow which his stubborn dis-obedience had provoked her to inflict. The barbarians resented the indignity which had been offered to their king accused the regent of conspiring against his life and crown and imperiou ly demanded that the grandson of Theodoric should be rescued from the dastardly discipline of women and pedants and educated like a valiant Goth, in the society of his equals and the glorious ignorance of his ancestors To this rude clamour importunately urged as the voice of the nation, Amalasontha was com pelled to yield her reason and the dearest wishes of her heart The king of Italy was abandoned to wine, to women and to rustic sports and the indiscreet contempt of the ungrateful youth be trayed the mischievous designs of his favourites and her enemies Encompassed with domestic foes she entered into a secret negotiation with the emperor Justinian, obtained the assurance of a friendly reception and had actually de posited at Dyrrachium in Epirus a treasure of forty thousand pounds of gold Happy would it have been for her fame and safety if she had calmly retired from barbarous faction to the peace and splendour of Constantinople. But the mind of Amalasontha was inflamed by ambition and revenge and while her ships lay at anchor in the port she waited for the success of a crime which her passions excused or ap-plauded as an act of justice Three of the most dangerous malcontents had been separately removed under the pretence of trust and com mand to the frontiers of Italy they were assas-sinated by her private emissaries and the blood of these noble Goths rendered the queen-mother absolute in the court of Ravenna and justly odious to a free people. But if she had lamented the disorders of her son she soon wept his irreparable loss and the death of Athalaric, who at the age of sixteen was con sumed by premature intemperance left her destitute of any firm support or legal authority Instead of submitting to the laws of her country which held as a fundamental maxim that the succession could never pass from the lance to the distaff the daughter of Theodoric con ceived the impracticable design of sharing with one of her cousins the regal title and of re serving in her own hands the substance of supreme power He received the proposal with profound respect and affected gratitude and the eloquent Cassiodorus announced to the senate and the emperor that Amalasontha and Theodatus had ascended the throne of Italy His birth (for his mother was the sister of The odoric) might be considered as an imperfect title and the choice of Amalasontha was more

the hands of a sacrilegious enemy [46] It was not long before his pride and resentment were gratified by a suppliant embassy from the unfortunate Gelimer, who implored, in his distress, the aid of the Spanish monarch But instead of sacrificing these unworthy passions to the dictates of generosity and prudence, Theudes amused the ambassadors till he was secretly informed of the loss of Carthage, and then dismissed them with obscure and contemptuous advice to seek in their native country a true knowledge of the state of the Vandals [47] The long continuance of the Italian war delayed the punishment of the Visigoths and the eyes of Theudes were closed before they tasted the fruits of his mistaken policy After his death the sceptre of Spain was disputed by a civil war The weaker candidate solicited the protection of Justinian and ambitiously subscribed a treaty of alliance which deeply wounded the independence and happiness of his country Several cities both on the ocean and the Mediterranean were ceded to the Roman troops who afterwards refused to evacuate those pledges, as it should seem either of safety or payment and as they were fortified by perpetual supplies from Africa, they maintained their impregnable stations for the mischievous purpose of inflaming the civil and religious factions of the barbarians Seventy years elapsed before this painful thorn could be extirpated from the bosom of the monarchy and as long as the emperors retained any share of these remote and useless possessions their vanity might number Spain in the list of their provinces and the successors of Alaric in the rank of their vassals [48]

The error of the Goths who reigned in Italy was less excusable than that of their Spanish brethren, and their punishment was still more immediate and terrible From a motive of private revenge they enabled their most dangerous enemy to destroy their most valuable ally A sister of the great Theodoric had been given in marriage to Thrasimond the African king [49] on this occasion the fortress of Lilybæum [50] in Sicily, was resigned to the Vandals and the princess Amalafrida was attended by a martial train of one thousand nobles and five thousand Gothic soldiers, who signalised their valour in the Moorish wars Their merit was over rated by themselves and perhaps neglected by the Vandals they viewed the country with envy and the conquerors with disdain but their real or fictitious conspiracy was prevented by a massacre, the Goths were oppressed and the captivity of Amalafrida was soon followed by her secret and suspicious death The eloquent pen of Cassiodorus was employed to reproach the Vandal court with the cruel violation of every social and public duty, but the vengeance which he threatened in the name of his sovereign might be derided with impunity as long as Africa was protected by the sea and the Goths were destitute of a navy In the blind impotence of grief and indignation they joyfully saluted the approach of the Romans entertained the fleet of Belisarius in the ports of Sicily, and were speedily delighted or alarmed by the surprising intelligence that their revenge was executed beyond the measure of their hopes, or perhaps of their wishes To their friendship the emperor was indebted for the kingdom of Africa and the Goths might reasonably think that they were entitled to resume the possession of a barren rock so recently separated as a nuptial gift from the island of Sicily They were soon undeceived by the haughty mandate of Belisarius which excited their tardy and unavailing repentance 'The city and promontory of Lilybæum ' said the Roman general belonged to the Vandals and I claim them by the right of conquest Your submission may deserve the favour of the emperor your obstinacy will provoke his displeasure and must kindle a war that can terminate only in your utter ruin If you compel us to take up arms we shall contend not to regain the possession of a single city but to deprive you of all the provinces which you unjustly withhold from their lawful sovereign ' A nation of two hundred thousand soldiers might have smiled at the vain menace of Justinian and his lieutenant but a spirit of discord and disaffection prevailed in Italy and the Goths supported with reluctance the indignity of a female reign [51]

The birth of Amalasontha the regent and queen of Italy [52] united the two most illustrious families of the barbarians Her mother the sister of Clovis was descended from the long haired kings of the Merovingian race,[53] and the regal succession of the Amali was illustrated in the eleventh generation by her father the great Theodoric whose merit might have ennobled a plebeian origin The sex of his daughter excluded her from the Gothic throne but his vigilant tenderness for his family and his people discovered the last heir of the royal line whose ancestors had taken refuge in Spain and the fortunate Eutharic was suddenly exalted to the rank of a consul and a prince He enjoyed only a short time the charms of Amalasontha and the hopes of the succession and his widow after the death of her husband and father was left the guardian of her son Athalaric and the kingdom of Italy At the age of about twenty-eight years the endowments of her mind and person had attained their perfect maturity Her beauty which in the apprehension of Theodora herself might have disputed the conquest of an emperor was animated by manly sense, activity and resolution. Education and experience had cultivated her talents her philosophic studies were exempt from vanity and though she expressed herself with equal elegance and ease in the Greek, the Latin and the Gothic tongue the daughter of Theodoric maintained in her counsels a discreet and impenetrable silence By a faithful imitation of the virtues she revived the prosperity of his reign while she strove with pious care to expiate the faults and to obliterate the darker memory of his declining age The children of Boethius and Symmachus were restored to their paternal inheritance her extreme lenity never consented to inflict any corporal or pecuniary penalties on her Roman subjects and she generously despised the clamours of the Goths who at the end of forty years still considered the people of Italy as their slaves or their enemies Her salutary measures were directed by the wisdom and celebrated by the eloquence of Cassiodorus she solicited and deserved the friendship of the emperor and the kingdoms of Europe respected both in peace and war the majesty of the Gothic throne But the future happiness of the queen of Italy depended on the education of her son who was destined by his birth to support the different and almost incompatible characters of the chief of a barbarian camp and the first magistrate of a civilised nation. From the age of ten years[14] Athalaric was diligently instructed in the arts and sciences either useful or ornamental for a Roman prince and three venerable Goths were chosen to instil the principles of honour and virtue into the mind of their young king But the pupil who is insensible of the benefits must abhor the restraints of education and the solicitude of the queen which affection rendered anxious and severe offended the untractable nature of her son and his subjects On a solemn festival when the Goths were assembled in the palace of Ravenna the royal youth escaped from his mother's apartment, and with tears of pride and anger complained of a blow which his stubborn disobedience had provoked her to inflict The barbarians resented the indignity which had been offered to their king accused the regent of conspiring against his life and crown and imperiously demanded that the grandson of Theodoric should be rescued from the dastardly discipline of women and pedants, and educated like a valiant Goth in the society of his equals and the glorious ignorance of his ancestors To this rude clamour importunately urged as the voice of the nation, Amalasontha was compelled to yield her reason and the dearest wishes of her heart The king of Italy was abandoned to wine to women, and to rustic sports and the indiscreet contempt of the ungrateful youth betrayed the mischievous designs of his favourites and her enemies Encompassed with domestic foes she entered into a secret negotiation with the emperor Justinian, obtained the assurance of a friendly reception and had actually deposited at Dyrrachium, in Epirus a treasure of forty thousand pounds of gold Happy would it have been for her fame and safety if she had calmly retired from barbarous faction to the peace and splendour of Constantinople. But the mind of Amalasontha was inflamed by ambition and revenge and while her ships lay at anchor in the port she waited for the success of a crime which her passions excused or applauded as an act of justice Three of the most dangerous malcontents had been separately removed under the pretence of trust and command to the frontiers of Italy they were assassinated by her private emissaries and the blood of these noble Goths rendered the queen mother absolute in the court of Ravenna and justly odious to a free people But if she had lamented the disorders of her son she soon wept his irreparable loss and the death of Athalaric, who at the age of sixteen was consumed by premature intemperance left her destitute of any firm support or legal authority Instead of submitting to the laws of her country which held as a fundamental maxim that the succession could never pass from the lance to the distaff the daughter of Theodoric conceived the impracticable design of sharing with one of her cousins the regal title and of reserving in her own hands the substance of supreme power He received the proposal with profound respect and affected gratitude and the eloquent Cassiodorus announced to the senate and the emperor that Amalasontha and Theodatus had ascended the throne of Italy His birth (for his mother was the sister of Theodoric) might be considered as an imperfect title and the choice of Amalasontha was more strongly directed by her contempt of his avarice and pusillanimity, which had deprived him of the love of the Italians and the esteem of the barbarians But Theodatus was exasperated by the contempt which he deserved her justice had repres ed and reproached the oppression which he exercised against his Tuscan neighbours and the principal Goths united by common guilt and resentment, conspired to instigate his slow and timid disposition The letters of congratulation were scarcely dispatched before the queen of Italy was imprisoned in a small island of the lake of Bolsena [55] where, after a short confinement, she was strangled in the bath, by the order or with the connivance of the new king who instructed his turbulent subjects to shed the blood of their sovereigns

Justinian beheld with joy the dissensions of the Goths and the mediation of an ally concealed and promoted the ambitious views of the conqueror His ambassadors in their public audience demanded the fortress of Lilybæum ten barbarian fugitives, and a just compensation for the pillage of a small town on the Illyrian borders but they secretly negotiated with Theodatus to betray the province of Tuscany, and tempted Amalasontha to extricate herself from danger and perplexity by a free surrender of the kingdom of Italy A false and servile epistle was subscribed by the reluctant hand of the captive queen but the confession of the Roman senators who were sent to Constantinople revealed the truth of her deplorable situation and Justinian by the voice of a new ambassador most powerfully interceded for her life and liberty Yet the secret instructions of the same minister were adapted to serve the cruel jealousy of Theodora who dreaded the presence and superior charms of a rival he prompted with artful and ambiguous hints the execution of a crime so useful to the Romans [56] received the intelligence of her death with grief and indignation and denounced, in his master s name, immortal war against the perfidious assassin In Italy as well as in Africa the guilt of a usurper appeared to justify the arms of Justinian but the forces which he prepared were insufficient for the subversion of a mighty kingdom if their feeble numbers had not been multiplied by the name, the spirit, and the conduct of a hero A chosen troop of guards who served on horseback and were armed with lances and bucklers attended the person of Belisarius his cavalry was composed of two hundred Huns three hundred Moors and four thousand confederates, and the infantry consisted only of three thousand Isaurians Steering the same course as in his former expedition the Roman consul cast anchor before Catana in Sicily, to survey the strength of the island, and to decide whether he should attempt the conquest or peaceably pursue his voyage for the African coast He found a fruitful land and a friendly people. Notwithstanding the decay of agriculture, Sicily still supplied the granaries of Rome the farmers were graciously exempted from the oppression of military quarters and the Goths who trusted the defence of the island to the inhabitants, had some reason to complain that their confidence was ungratefully betrayed Instead of soliciting and expecting the aid of the king of Italy, they yielded to the first summons a cheerful obedience and this province the first fruits of the Punic wars, was again after a long separation, united to the Roman empire [57] The Gothic garrison of Palermo which alone attempted to resist was reduced after a short siege by a singular stratagem Belisarius introduced his ships into the deepest recess of the harbour, their boats were laboriously hoisted with ropes and pulleys to the top mast head, and he filled them with archers who, from that superior station commanded the ramparts of the city After this easy though successful campaign the conqueror entered Syracuse in triumph, at the head of his victorious bands distributing gold medals to the people, on the day which so gloriously terminated the year of the consulship He passed the winter season in the palace of ancient kings, amidst the ruins of a Grecian colony which once extended to a circumference of two-and twenty miles [58] but in the spring, about the festival of Easter, the prosecution of his designs was interrupted by a dangerous revolt of the African forces Carthage was saved by the presence of Belisarius, who suddenly landed with a thousand guards Two thousand soldiers of doubtful faith returned to the standard of their old commander and he marched without hesitation above fifty miles to seek an enemy whom he affected to pity and despise Eight thousand rebels trembled at his approach they were routed at the first onset by the dexterity of their master, and this ignoble victory would have restored the peace of Africa if the conqueror had not been hastily recalled to Sicily to appease a sedition which was kindled during his absence in his own camp [59] Disorder and disobedience were the common malady of the times the genius to command and the virtue to obey resided only in the mind of Belisarius.

Although Theodatus descended from a race of heroes he was ignorant of the art and averse to the dangers of war Although he had studied the writings of Plato and Tully philosophy was incapable of purifying his mind from the basest passions avarice and fear He had purchased a sceptre by ingratitude and murder at the first menace of an enemy he degraded his own majesty and that of a nation which already disdained their unworthy sovereign. Astonished by the recent example of Gelimer he saw himself dragged in chains through the streets of Constantinople the terrors which Belisarius inspired were heightened by the eloquence of Peter the Byzantine ambassador and that bold and subtle advocate persuaded him to sign a treaty too ignominious to become the foundation of a lasting peace. It was stipulated that in the acclamations of the Roman people the name of the emperor should be always proclaimed before that of the Gothic king and that as often as the statue of Theodatus was erected in brass or marble the divine image of Justinian should be placed on its right hand. Instead of conferring the king of Italy was reduced to solicit, the honours of the senate and the consent of the emperor was made indispensable before he could execute against a priest or senator the sentence either of death or confiscation. The feeble monarch resigned the possession of Sicily offered as the annual mark of his dependence, a crown of gold of the weight of three hundred pounds and promised to supply at the requisition of his sovereign three thousand Gothic auxiliaries for the service of the empire. Satisfied with these extraordinary concessions the successful agent of Justinian hastened his journey to Constantinople but no sooner had he reached the Alban villa[60] than he was recalled by the anxiety of Theodatus and the dialogue which passed between the king and the ambassador deserves to be represented in its original simplicity Are you of opinion that the emperor will ratify this treaty? Perhaps If he refuses, what consequence will ensue? War Will such a war be just or reasonable? Most assuredly every one should act according to his character What is your meaning? You are a philosopher —Justinian is emperor of the Romans it would ill become the disciple of Plato to shed the blood of thousands in his private quarrel the successor of Augustus should vindicate his rights and recover by arms the ancient provinces of his empire This reasoning might not convince, but it was sufficient to alarm and subdue the weakness of Theodatus and he soon descended to his last offer that for the poor equivalent of a pension of forty-eight thousand pounds sterling he would resign the kingdom of the Goths and Italians and spend the remainder of his days in the innocent pleasures of philosophy and agriculture. Both treaties were intrusted to the hands of the ambassador, on the frail security of an oath not to produce the second till the first had been positively rejected The event may be easily foreseen Justinian required and accepted the abdication of the Gothic king His indefatigable agent returned from Constantinople to Ravenna with ample instructions, and a fair epistle which praised the wisdom and generosity of the royal philosopher granted his pension with the assurance of such honours as a subject and a catholic might enjoy and wisely referred the final execution of the treaty to the presence and authority of Belisarius But in the interval of suspense two Roman generals, who had entered the province of Dalmatia were defeated and slain by the Gothic troops From blind and abject despair Theodatus capriciously rose to groundless and fatal presumption[61] and dared to receive with menace and contempt the ambassador of Justinian who claimed his promise solicited the allegiance of his subjects and boldly asserted the inviolable privilege of his own character The march of Belisarius dispelled this visionary pride and as the first campaign[62] was employed in the reduction of Sicily the invasion of Italy is applied by Procopius to the second year of the GOTHIC WAR[63]

After Belisarius had left sufficient garrisons in Palermo and Syracuse he embarked his troops at Messina and landed them, without resistance on the opposite shores of Rhegium. A Gothic prince who had married the daughter of Theodatus was stationed with an army to guard the entrance of Italy but he imitated without scruple the example of a sovereign faithless to his public and private duties The perfidious Ebermor deserted with his followers to the Roman camp and was dismissed to enjoy the servile honours of the Byzantine court[64] From Rhegium to Naples the fleet and army of Belisarius almost always in view of each other advanced near three hundred miles along the sea-coast The people of Bruttium Lucania and Campania who abhorred the name and religion of the Goths embraced the specious excuse that their ruined walls were incapable of defence the soldiers paid a just equivalent for a plentiful market and curiosity alone interrupted the peaceful occupations of the husbandman or

artificer Naples which has swelled to a great and populous capital long cherished the language and manners of a Grecian colony [65] and the choice of Virgil had ennobled this elegant retreat which attracted the lovers of repose and study from the noise the smoke and the laborious opulence of Rome [66] As soon as the place was invested by sea and land Belisarius gave audience to the deputies of the people who exhorted him to disregard a conquest unworthy of his arms to seek the Gothic king in a field of battle, and, after his victory to claim, as the sovereign of Rome the allegiance of the dependent cities When I treat with my enemies" replied the Roman chief with a haughty smile I am more accustomed to give than to receive counsel but I hold in one hand inevitable ruin and in the other peace and freedom, such as Sicily now enjoys' The impatience of delay urged him to grant the most liberal terms his honour secured their performance but Naples was divided into two factions and the Greek democracy was inflamed by their orators who with much spirit and some truth represented to the multitude that the Goths would punish their defection and that Belisarius himself must esteem their loyalty and valour Their deliberations however, were not perfectly free the city was commanded by eight hundred barbarians, whose wives and children were detained at Ravenna as the pledge of their fidelity and even the Jews who were rich and numerous, resisted, with desperate enthusiasm the intolerant laws of Justinian In a much later period the circumference of Naples[67] measured only two thousand three hundred and sixty three paces [68] the fortifications were defended by precipices or the sea when the aqueducts were intercepted a supply of water might be drawn from wells and fountains and the stock of provisions was sufficient to consume the patience of the besiegers At the end of twenty days that of Belisarius was almost exhausted, and he had reconciled himself to the disgrace of abandoning the siege that he might march before the winter season against Rome and the Gothic king But his anxiety was relieved by the bold curiosity of an Isaurian who explored the dry channel of an aqueduct, and secretly reported that a passage might be perforated to introduce a file of armed soldiers into the heart of the city When the work had been silently executed the humane general risked the discovery of his secret by a last and fruitless admonition of the impending danger In the darkness of the night four hundred Romans entered the aqueduct raised themselves by a rope which they fastened to an olive tree into the house or garden of a solitary matron, sounded their trumpets surprised the sentinels and gave admittance to their companions, who on all sides scaled the walls and burst open the gates of the city Every crime which is punished by social justice was practised as the rights of war the Huns were distinguished by cruelty and sacrilege and Belisarius alone appeared in the streets and churches of Naples to moderate the calamities which he predicted The gold and silver,' he repeatedly exclaimed "are the just rewards of your valour But spare the inhabitants they are Christians, they are suppliants, they are now your fellow subjects Restore the children to their parents, the wives to their husbands and show them by your generosity of what friends they have obstinately deprived themselves' The city was saved by the virtue and authority of its conqueror [69] and when the Neapolitans returned to their houses they found some consolation in the secret enjoyment of their hidden treasures The barbarian garrison enlisted in the service of the emperor, Apulia and Calabria, delivered from the odious presence of the Goths acknowledged his dominion, and the tusks of the Calydonian boar, which were still shown at Beneventum are curiously described by the historian of Belisarius [70]

The faithful soldiers and citizens of Naples had expected their deliverance from a prince who remained the inactive and almost indifferent spectator of their ruin Theodatus secured his person within the walls of Rome, while his cavalry advanced forty miles on the Appian way, and encamped in the Pomptine marshes, which by a canal of nineteen miles in length had been recently drained and converted into excellent pastures [71] But the principal forces of the Goths were dispersed in Dalmatia Venetia and Gaul and the feeble mind of their king was confounded by the unsuccessful event of a divination which seemed to presage the downfall of his empire[72] The most abject slaves have arraigned the guilt or weakness of an unfortunate master The character of Theodatus was rigorously scrutinised by a free and idle camp of barbarians conscious of their privilege and power he was declared unworthy of his race his nation and his throne, and their general Vitiges whose valour had been signalised in the Illyrian war was raised with unanimous applause on the bucklers of his companions On the first rumour the abdicated monarch fled from the justice of his country but he was pur sued by private revenge A Goth whom he had injured in his love overtook Theodatus on the Flaminian way and regardless of his unmanly cries slaughtered him as he lay prostrate on the ground like a victim (says the historian) at the foot of the al ar The choice of the people is the best and purest title to reign over them yet such is the prejudice of every age, that Vitiges impatiently wished to return to Ravenna where he might seize with the reluctant hand of the daughter of Amalasontha, some faint shadow of hereditary right. A national council was im mediately held and the new monarch recon ciled the impatient spirit of the barbarians to a measure of disgrace which the misconduct of his predecessor tendered wise and indispensable. The Goths consented to retreat in the presence of a victorious enemy to delay till the next spring the operations of offensive war to sum mon their scattered forces to relinquish their distant possessions and to trust even Rome itself to the faith of its inhabitants Leuderis an aged warrior was left in the capital with four thousand soldiers a feeble garrison which might have seconded the zeal though it was incapable of opposing the wishes, of the Ro mans But a momentary enthusiasm of religion and patriotism was kindled in their mir ds They furiously exclaimed that th apostolic throne should no longer b profaned by the triumph or toleration of Arianism that the tombs of the Caesars should no longer be trampled by the savages of the North and without re flecting that Italy must sink into a province of Constantinople they fondly hailed the restora tion of a Roman emperor as a new era of freedom and prosperity The d puties of the pope and clergy, of the senate and people, invited the lieutenant of Justinian to accept their voluntary allegiance and to enter the city whose gates would be thrown open for his reception. As soon as Belisarius had fortified his new con quests Naples and Cumae he advanced about twenty miles to the banks of the Vulturnus, contemplated the decayed grandeur of Capua, and halted at the separation of the Latin and Appian ways The work of the censor al he incessant use of nine centu ies, still preserved its primaeval beauty and not a flaw could be discovered in the large polished stones of which that solid though narrow road was so firmly compacted.[13] Belisarius however preferred the Latin way which, at a distance from the sea and the marshes skirted in a space of one hun dred and twenty miles along the foot of the mountains His enemies had disappeared when he made his entrance through the Asinarian gate the garrison departed without molestation along the Flaminian way and the city after sixty years servitude was delivered from the yoke of the barbarians Leuderis alone from a motive of pride or discontent refused to ac company the fugitives and the Goth c chief himself a trophy of the victory was sent with the keys of Rome to the throne of the emperor Justinian.[14]

The first days which coincided with the old Saturnalia, were devoted to mutual congratu lations and the public joy and the catholics prepared to celebrate without a rival the ap proaching festival of the na ivity of Christ In the familiar conversation of a hero the Romans acquired some notion of the virtues which history ascribed to their ancestors they were edified by the apparent respect of Belisarius for the successor of St Peter and his rigid discipline secured in the midst of war the blessings of tranquillity and justice. They applauded the rapid success of his arms which overran the adjacent country as far as Narni Perusia, and Spoleto but they trembled the senate, the clergy and the unwarlike people as soon as they understood that he had resolved and would speedily be reduced to sustain a siege against the powers of the Gothic monarchy The designs of Vitiges were executed during the winter season with diligence and effect From their rustic habitations from their distant gar risons the Goths assembled at Ravenna for the defence of their country and such were their numbers, that, after an army had been detached for the relief of Dalmatia one hundred and fifty thousand fighting men marched under the royal standard. According to the degrees of rank or merit the Gothic king distributed arms and horses rich gifts and liberal promises he moved along the Flaminian way declined the useless sieges of Perusia and Spoleto respected the impregnable rock of Narni and arrived within two miles of Rome at the foot of the Mil vian bridge The narrow passage was fortified with a tower and Belisarius had computed the value of the twenty days which must be lost in the construction of another bridge But the consternation of the soldiers of the tower who either fled or deserted disappointed his hopes and betrayed his person into the most immi nent danger At the head of one thousand horse the Roman general sallied from the Flaminian gate to mark the ground of an advantageous position, and to survey the camp of the barba rians but while he still believed them on the other side of the Tiber, he was suddenly encompassed and assaulted by their innumerable squadrons The fate of Italy depended on his life and the deserters pointed to the conspicuous horse a bay[75] with a white face, which he rode on that memorable day ' Aim at the bay horse " was the universal cry Every bow was bent every javelin was directed against that fatal object and the command was repeated and obeyed by thousands who were ignorant of its real motive The bolder barbarians advanced to the more honourable combat of swords and spears and the praise of an enemy has graced the fall of Visandus the standard bearer,[76] who maintained his foremost station, till he was pierced with thirteen wounds, perhaps by the hand of Belisarius himself The Roman general was strong active, and dexterous on every side he discharged his weighty and mortal strokes his faithful guards imitated his valour and defended his person and the Goths after the loss of a thousand men, fled before the arms of a hero They were rashly pursued to their camp, and the Romans, oppressed by multitudes, made a gradual and at length a precipitate retreat to the gates of the city the gates were shut against the fugitives and the public terror was increased by the report that Belisarius was slain His countenance was indeed disfigured by sweat dust and blood his voice was hoarse his strength was almost exhausted but his unconquerable spirit still remained he imparted that spirit to his desponding companions and their last desperate charge was felt by the flying barbarians as if a new army vigorous and entire, had been poured from the city The Flaminian gate was thrown open to a real triumph but it was not before Belisarius had visited every post and provided for the public safety that he could be persuaded by his wife and friends to taste the needful refreshments of food and sleep In the more improved state of the art of war a general is seldom required or even permitted to display the personal prowess of a soldier and the example of Belisarius may be added to the rare examples of Henry IV , of Pyrrhus and of Alexander

After this first and unsuccessful trial of their enemies the whole army of the Goths passed the Tiber, and formed the siege of the city which continued above a year, till their final departure Whatever fancy may conceive the severe compass of the geographer defines the circumference of Rome within a line of twelve miles and three hundred and forty five paces and that circumference, except in the Vatican has invariably been the same from the triumph of Aurelian to the peaceful but obscure reign of the modern popes [77] But in the day of her greatness the space within her walls was crowded with habitations and inhabitants, and the populous suburbs that stretched along the public roads were darted like so many rays from one common centre Adversity swept away these extraneous ornaments and left naked and desolate a considerable part even of the seven hills Yet Rome in its present state could send into the field above thirty thousand males of a military age [78] and notwithstanding the want of discipline and exercise the far greater part inured to the hardships of poverty might be capable of bearing arms for the defence of their country and religion The prudence of Belisarius did not neglect this important resource His soldiers were relieved by the zeal and diligence of the people who watched while they slept and laboured while they reposed he accepted the voluntary service of the bravest and most indigent of the Roman youth and the companies of townsmen sometimes represented in a vacant post the presence of the troops which had been drawn away to more essential duties But his just confidence was placed in the veterans who had fought under his banner in the Persian and African wars and although that gallant band was reduced to five thousand men he undertook with such contemptible numbers to defend a circle of twelve miles against an army of one hundred and fifty thousand barbarians In the walls of Rome which Belisarius constructed or restored the materials of ancient architecture may be discerned [79] and the whole fortification was completed except in a chasm still extant between the Pincian and Flaminian gates which the prejudices of the Goths and Romans left under the effectual guard of St. Peter the apostle [80]

The battlements or bastions were shaped in sharp angles a ditch broad and deep protected the foot of the rampart and the archers on the rampart were assisted by military engines the balista a powerful cross bow, which darted short but massy arrows the onagri or wild asses which on the principle of a sling threw stones and bullets of an enormous size [81] A chain was drawn across the Tiber the arches of the aqueducts were made impervious and the mole or sepulchre of Hadrian[82] was converted for the first time, to the uses of a citadel. That venerable structure, which contained the ashes of the Antonines was a circular turret rising from a quadrangular basis it was covered with the white marble of Paros and decorated by the statues of gods and heroes and the lover of the arts must read with a sigh that the works of Praxiteles or Lysippus were torn from their lofty pedestals and hurled into the ditch on the heads of the besiegers [12] To each of his lieutenants Belisarius assigned the defence of a gate, with the wise and peremptory instruction that whatever might be the alarm they should steadily adhere to their respective posts, and trust their general for the safety of Rome The formidable host of the Goths was insufficient to embrace the ample measure of the city of the fourteen gates seven only were invested from the Prænestine to the Flaminian way and Vitiges divided his troops into six camps each of which was fortified with a ditch and rampart On the Tuscan side of the river a seventh encampment was formed in the field or circus of the Vatican for the important purpose of commanding the Milvian bridge and the course of the Tiber but they approached with devotion the adjacent church of St. Peter and the threshold of the holy apostles was respected during the siege by a Christian enemy In the ages of victory as often as the senate decreed some distant conquest, the consul denounced hostilities by unbarring in solemn pomp the gates of the temple of Janus [13] Domestic war now rendered the admonition superfluous and the ceremony was superseded by the establishment of a new religion. But the brazen temple of Janus was left standing in the forum of a size sufficient only to contain the statue of the god five cubits in height, of a human form but with two faces directed to the east and west. The double gates were likewise of brass and a fruitless effort to turn them on their rusty hinges revealed the scandalous secret that some Romans were still attached to the superstition of their ancestors

Eighteen days were employed by the besiegers to provide for all the instruments of attack which antiquity had invented Fascines were prepared to fill the ditches, scaling ladders to ascend the walls The largest trees of the forest supplied the timbers of four battering rams their heads were armed with iron they were suspended by ropes and each of them was worked by the labour of fifty men The lofty wooden turrets moved on wheels or rollers and formed a spacious platform of the level of the rampart. On the morning of the nineteenth day a general attack was made from the Prænestine gate to the Vatican seven Gothic columns with their military engines, advanced to the assault and the Romans, who lined the ramparts listened with doubt and anxiety to the cheerful assurances of their commander As soon as the enemy approached the ditch, Belisarius himself drew the first arrow and such was his strength and dexterity that he transfixed the foremost of the barbarian leaders.

A shout of applause and victory was re echoed along the wall He drew a second arrow and the stroke was followed with the same success and the same acclamation. The Roman general then gave the word that the archers should aim at the teams of oxen they were instantly covered with mortal wounds the towers which they drew remained useless and immovable and a single moment disconcerted the laborious projects of the king of the Goths After this disappointment Vitiges still continued or feigned to continue the assault of the Salarian gate that he might divert the attention of his adversary while his principal forces more strenuously attacked the Prænestine gate and the sepulchre of Hadrian at the distance of three miles from each other Near the former the double walls of the Vivarium [14] were low or broken the fortifications of the latter were feebly guarded the vigour of the Goths was excited by the hope of victory and spoil and if a single post had given way the Romans and Rome itself were irrecoverably lost This perilous day was the most glorious in the life of Belisarius Amidst tumult and dismay the whole plan of the attack and defence was distinctly present to his mind he observed the changes of each instant weighed every possible advantage transported his person to the scenes of danger and communicated his spirit in calm and decisive orders. The contest was fiercely maintained from the morning to the evening the Goths were repulsed on all sides and each Roman might boast that he had vanquished thirty barbarians if the strange disproportion of numbers were not counterbalanced by the merit of one man Thirty thousand Goths according to the confession of their own chiefs perished in this bloody action and the multitude of the wounded was equal to that of the slain When they advanced to the assault, their close disorder suffered not a javelin to fall without effect and as they retired the populace of the city joined the pursuit and slaughtered with impunity the backs of their flying enemies Belisarius instantly sallied from the gates and while the soldiers chanted his name and victory the hostile engines of war were reduced to ashes Such was the loss and consternation of the Goths that from this day the siege of Rome degenerated into a tedious and indolent block ade and they were incessantly harassed by the Roman general who in frequent skirmishes, destroyed above five thousand of their bravest troops Their cavalry was unpractised in the use of the bow their archers served on foot and this divided force was incapable of contending with their adversaries whose lances and ar rows, at a distance or at hand were alike for midable The consummate skill of Belisarius em braced the favourable opportunities, and as he chose the ground and the moment as he pressed the charge or sounded the retreat,[86] the squad rons which he detached were seldom unsuc cessful These partial advantages diffused an impatient ardour among the soldiers and people, who began to feel the hardships of a siege, and to disregard the dangers of a general engage ment Each plebeian conceived himself to be a hero and the infantry who since the decay of discipline, were rejected from the line of battle, aspired to the ancient honours of the Roman legion Belisarius praised the spirit of his troops, condemned their presumption yielded to their clamours and prepared the remedies of a de feat the possibility of which he alone had courage to suspect In the quarter of the Vatican the Romans prevailed and if the irreparable moments had not been wasted in the pillage of the camp they might have occupied the Mil vian bridge and charged in the rear of the Gothic host On the other side of the Tiber, Belisarius advanced from the Pincian and Sal arian gates But his army four thousand soldiers perhaps was lost in a spacious plain they were encompassed and oppressed by fresh multi tudes who continually relieved the broken ranks of the barbarians The valiant leaders of the infantry were unskilled to conquer they died the retreat (a hasty retreat) was covered by the prudence of the general and the victors started back with affright from the formidable aspect of an armed rampart The reputation of Belisarius was unsullied by a defeat and the vain confidence of the Goths was not less ser viceable to his designs than the repentance and modesty of the Roman troops

From the moment that Belisarius had de termined to sustain a siege his assiduous care provided Rome against the danger of famine more dreadful than the Gothic arms An extra ordinary supply of corn was imported from Sicily the harvests of Campania and Tuscany were forcibly swept for the use of the city and the rights of private property were infringed by the strong plea of the public safety It might easily be foreseen that the enemy would inter cept the aqueducts, and the cessation of the water mills was the first inconvenience which was speedily removed by mooring large vessels, and fixing mill stones in the current of the river The stream was soon embarrassed by the trunks of trees and polluted with dead bodies, yet so effectual were the precautions of the Roman general that the waters of the Tiber still con tinued to give motion to the mills and drink to the inhabitants the more distant quarters were supplied from domestic wells and a besieged city might support without impatience, the privation of her public baths A large portion of Rome from the Prænestine gate to the church of St Paul was never invested by the Goths their excursions were restrained by the activity of the Moorish troops the navigation of the Tiber and the Latin Appian and Ostian ways were left free and unmolested for the introduc tion of corn and cattle or the retreat of the inhabitants who sought a refuge in Campania or Sicily Anxious to relieve himself from a use less and devouring multitude Belisarius issued his peremptory orders for the instant departure of the women the children, and slaves required his soldiers to dismiss their male and female attendants and regulated their allowance that one moiety should be given in provisions and the other in money His foresight was justified by the increase of the public distress as soon as the Goths had occupied two important posts in the neighbourhood of Rome By the loss of the port or as it is now called the city of Porto he was deprived of the country on the right of the Tiber and the best communication with the sea and he reflected with grief and anger that three hundred men, could he have spared such a feeble band, might have defended its impreg nable works Seven miles from the capital be tween the Appian and the Latin ways two principal aqueducts crossing and again crossing each other enclosed within their solid and lofty arches a fortified space[87] where Vitiges established a camp of seven thousand Goths to intercept the convoys of Sicily and Campania The granaries of Rome were insensibly ex hausted the adjacent country had been wasted with fire and sword such scanty supplies as might yet be obtained by hasty excursions were the reward of valour and the purchase of wealth the forage of the horses and the bread of the soldiers never failed but in the last months of the siege the people was exposed to the miseries of scarcity, unwholesome food[88] and contagious disorders. Belisarius saw and pitied their sufferings but he had foreseen and he watched th decay of their loyalty and the progress of their discontent Adversity had awakened the Romans from the dreams of grandeur and freedom, and taught them the humiliating lesson that it was of small moment to the real happiness whether the name of their master was derived from the Gothic or the Latin language The lieutenant of Justinian listened to their just complaints, but he rejected with disdain the idea of flight or capitulation repressed their lamorous impatience for battle amused them nth the prospect of sure and speedy relief and ecured himself and the city from the effects of heir despair or treachery Twice in each month ie changed the station of the officers to whom custody of the gates was committed the various precautions of patrols watch-words lights, and music, were repeatedly employed to discove whatever passed on the ramparts out guards were posted beyond the ditch, and the trusty vigilance of dogs supplied the more doubtful fidelity of mankind A letter was intercepted which assured the king of the Goths that the Asinarian gate adjoining to the Lateran church, should be secretly opened to his troops. On the proof or suspicion of treason several senators were banished and the pope Sylverius was summoned to attend the representa ve of his sovereign at his headquarters in the Pincian palace.[49] The ecclesiastics who followed their bishop were detained in the first or second apartment,[50] and he alone was admitted to the presence of Belisarius The conqueror of Rome and Carthage was modestly seated at the feet of Antonina, who reclined on a stately couch the general was sil nt but the voice of reproach and menace issued from the mouth of his imperious wife. Accused by credible witnesses and the evidence of his own subscription the successor of St Peter was despoiled of his pontifical ornaments, clad in the mean habit of a monk, and embarked without delay for a distant exile in the East At the emperor's command the clergy of Rome proceeded to the choice of a new bishop and after a so emn invocation of the Holy Ghost, elected the deacon Vigilius, who had purchased the papal throne by a bribe of two hundred pounds of gold. The profit and consequently the guilt of this simony was imputed to Belisarius but the hero obeyed the orders of his wife Antonina served the passions of the empress and Theodora lavished her treasures in the vain hope of obtaining a pontiff hostile or indifferent to the council of Chalcedon.[51]

The epistle of Belisarius to the emperor announced his victory his danger and his resolution According to your commands we have entered the dominions of the Goths, and reduced to your obedience Sicily Campania, and the city of Rome but the loss of these conquests will be more disgraceful than their acquisition was glorious. Hitherto we have successfully fought against the multitudes of the barbarians but their multitudes may finally prevail Victory is the gift of Providence but the reputation of kings and generals depends on the success or the failure of their designs Permit me to speak with freedom if you wish that we should live, send us subsistence if you desire that we should conquer send us arms, horses, and men. The Romans have received us as friends and deliverers but in our present distress they will be either betrayed by their confidence or we shall be oppressed by their treachery and hatred For myself my life is consecrated to your service it is yours to reflect whether my death in this situation will contribute to the glory and prosperity of your reign. Perhaps that reign would have been equally prosperous if the peaceful master of the East had abstained from the conquest of Africa and Italy but as Justinian was ambitious of fame he made some efforts, they were feeble and languid to support and rescue his victorious general A reinforcement of sixteen hundred Sclavonians and Huns was led by Martin and Valerian and as they had reposed during the winter season in the harbours of Greece the strength of the men and horses was not impaired by the fatigues of a sea voyage and they distinguished their valour in the first sally against the besiegers About the time of the summer solstice Euthalius landed at Terracina with large sums of money for the payment of the troops he cautiously proceeded along the Appian way and this convoy entered Rome through the gate Capena[52] while Belisarius on the other side diverted the attention of the Goths by a vigorous and successful skirmish. These seasonable aids the use and reputation of which were dexterously managed by the Roman general revived the courage or at least the hopes, of the soldiers and people The historian Procopius was despatched with an important commission to collect the troops and provisions which Campania could furnish or Constantinople had sent and the secretary of Belisarius was soon followed by Antonina herself[53] who boldly traversed the posts of the enemy and returned with the Oriental succours to the relief of her husband and the besieged city A fleet of three thousand Isaurians cast anchor in the bay of Naples and afterwards at Ostia Above two thousand horse, of whom a part were Thracians landed at Tarentum and after the junction of five hundred soldiers of Campania, and a train of waggons laden with wine and flour, they directed their march on the Appian way from Capua to the neighbourhood of Rome The forces that arrived by land and sea were united at the mouth of the Tiber Antonina convened a council of war it was resolved to surmount with sails and oars, the adverse stream of the river and the Goths were apprehensive of disturbing by any rash hostilities the negotiation to which Belisarius had craftily listened They credulously believed that they saw no more than the vanguard of a fleet and army which already covered the Ionian Sea and the plains of Campania and the illusion was supported by the haughty language of the Roman general when he gave audience to the ambassadors of Vitiges After a specious discourse to vindicate the justice of his cause, they declared that, for the sake of peace they were disposed to renounce the possession of Sicily 'The emperor is not less generous " replied his lieutenant with a disdainful smile, "in return for a gift which you no longer possess, he presents you with an ancient province of the empire he resigns to the Goths the sovereignty of the British island' Belisarius rejected with equal firmness and contempt the offer of a tribute but he allowed the Gothic ambassadors to seek their fate from the mouth of Justinian himself and consented with seeming reluctance, to a truce of three months from the winter solstice to the equinox of spring Prudence might not safely trust either the oaths or hostages of the barbarians but the conscious superiority of the Roman chief was expressed in the distribution of his troops As soon as fear or hunger compelled the Goths to evacuate Alba Porto and Centumcellæ, their place was instantly supplied, the garrisons of Narni Spoleto and Perusia were reinforced and the seven camps of the besiegers were gradually encompassed with the calamities of a siege The prayers and pilgrimage of Datius bishop of Milan were not without effect, and he obtained one thousand Thracians and Isaurians to assist the revolt of Liguria against her Arian tyrant At the same time, John the Sanguinary[94] the nephew of Vitalian was detached with two thousand chosen horse first to Alba on the Fucine lake and afterwards to the frontiers of Picenum on the Hadriatic Sea 'In that province said Belisarius "the Goths have deposited their families and treasures, without a guard or the suspicion of danger Doubtless they will violate the truce let them feel your presence before they hear of your motions Spare the Italians, suffer not any fortified places to remain hostile in your rear and faithfully reserve the spoil for an equal and common partition It would not be reasonable,' he added, with a laugh, "that, whilst we are toiling to the destruction of the drones our more fortunate brethren should rifle and enjoy the honey"

The whole nation of the Ostrogoths had been assembled for the attack, and was almost entirely consumed in the siege of Rome If any credit be due to an intelligent spectator one third at least of their enormous host was destroyed in frequent and bloody combats under the walls of the city The bad fame and pernicious qualities of the summer air might already be imputed to the decay of agriculture and population and the evils of famine and pestilence were aggravated by their own licentiousness and the unfriendly disposition of the country While Vitiges struggled with his fortune while he hesitated between shame and ruin his retreat was hastened by domestic alarms The king of the Goths was informed by trembling messengers that John the Sanguinary spread the devastations of war from the Apennine to the Hadriatic that the rich spoils and innumerable captives of Picenum were lodged in the fortifications of Rimini and that this formidable chief had defeated his uncle insulted his capital and seduced by secret correspondence, the fidelity of his wife the imperious daughter of Amalasontha Yet, before he retired, Vitiges made a last effort either to storm or to surprise the city A secret passage was discovered in one of the aqueducts two citizens of the Vatican were tempted by bribes to intoxicate the guards of the Aurelian gate an attack was meditated on the walls beyond the Tiber in a place which was not fortified with towers and the barbarians advanced with torches and scaling ladders to the assault of the Pincian gate But every attempt was defeated by the intrepid vigilance of Belisarius and his band of veterans who in the most perilous moments did not regret the absence of their companions and the Goths alike destitute of hope and subsistence clamorously urged their departure before the truce should expire and the Roman cavalry should again be united One year and nine days after the commencement of the siege, an army so lately strong and triumphant burnt their tents and tumultuously repassed the Milvian bridge. They repassed not with impunity their thronging multitudes, oppressed in a narrow passage were driven headlong into the Tiber by their own fears and the pursuit of the enemy and the Roman general sallying from the Pincian gate inflicted a severe and disgraceful wound on their retreat. The slow length of a sickly and desponding host was heavily dragged along the Flaminian way from whence the barbarians were sometimes compelled to deviate lest they should encounter the hostile garrisons that guarded the high road to Rimini and Ravenna. Yet so powerful was this flying army that Vitiges spared ten thousand men for the defence of the cities which he was most solicitous to preserve and detached his nephew Uraias with an adequate force for the chastisement of rebellious Milan. At the head of his principal army he besieged Rimini, only thirty three miles distant from the Gothic capital. A feeble rampart and a shallow ditch were maintained by the skill and valour of John the Sanguinary who shared the danger and fatigue of the meanest soldier and emulated on a theatre less illustrious, the military virtues of his great commander. The towers and battering-engines of the barbarians were rendered useless their attacks were repulsed and the tedious blockade which reduced the garrison to the last extremity of hunger afforded time for the union and march of the Roman forces. A fleet, which had surprised Ancona sailed along the coast of the Hadriatic to the relief of the besieged city. The eunuch Narses landed in Picenum with two thousand Heruli and five thousand of the bravest troops of the East. The rock of the Apennine was forced ten thousand veterans moved round the foot of the mountains under the command of Belisarius himself, and a new army whose encampment blazed with innumerable lights appeared to advance along the Flaminian way. Overwhelmed with astonishment and despair the Goths abandoned the siege of Rimini their tents their standards, and their leaders and Vitiges who gave or followed the example of flight never halted till he found a shelter within the walls and morasses of Ravenna.

To these walls and to some fortresses destitute of any mutual support the Gothic monarchy was now reduced. The provinces of Italy had embraced the party of the emperor and his army gradually recruited to the number of twenty thousand men must have achieved an easy and rapid conquest if their invincible powers had not been weakened by the discord of the Roman chiefs. Before the end of the siege an act of blood ambiguous and indiscreet sullied the fair fame of Belisarius. Presidius, a loyal Italian as he fled from Ravenna to Rome was rudely stopped by Constantine the military governor of Spoleto and despoiled even in a church of two daggers, richly inlaid with gold and precious stones. As soon as the public danger had subsided Presidius complained of the loss and injury his complaint was heard, but the order of restitution was disobeyed by the pride and avarice of the offender. Exasperated by the delay Presidius boldly arrested the general's horse as he passed through the forum, and, with the spirit of a citizen demanded the common benefit of the Roman laws. The honour of Belisarius was engaged he summoned a council claimed the obedience of his subordinate officer and was provoked by an insolent reply to call hastily for the presence of his guards. Constantine, viewing their entrance as the signal of death, drew his sword, and rushed on the general who nimbly eluded the stroke and was protected by his friends, while the desperate assassin was disarmed dragged into a neighbouring chamber and executed or rather murdered by the guards at the arbitrary command of Belisarius[11]. In this hasty act of violence the guilt of Constantine was no longer remembered the despair and death of that valiant officer were secretly imputed to the revenge of Antonina and each of his colleagues, conscious of the same rapine was apprehensive of the same fate. The fear of a common enemy suspended the effects of their envy and discontent, but, in the confidence of approaching victory they instigated a powerful rival to oppose the conqueror of Rome and Africa. From the domestic service of the palace and the administration of the private revenue Narses the eunuch was suddenly exalted to the head of an army and the spirit of a hero who afterwards equalled the merit and glory of Belisarius, served only to perplex the operations of the Gothic war. To his prudent counsels the relief of Rimini was ascribed by the leaders of the discontented faction who exhorted Narses to assume an independent and separate command. The epistle of Justinian had indeed enjoined his obedience to the general but the dangerous exception as far as may be advantageous to the public service reserved some freedom of judgment to the discreet favourite who had so lately departed from the sacred and familiar conversation of his sovereign. In the exercise of this doubtful right the eunuch perpetually dissented from the opinions of Belisarius and, after yielding with reluctance to the siege of Urbino, he deserted his colleague in the night, and marched away to the conquest of the Æmilian province The fierce and formidable bands of the Heruli were attached to the person of Narses [96] ten thousand Romans and confederates were persuaded to march under his banners every malcontent embraced the fair opportunity of revenging his private or imaginary wrongs, and the remaining troops of Belisarius were divided and dispersed from the garrisons of Sicily to the shores of the Hadriatic. His skill and perseverance overcame every obstacle Urbino was taken the sieges of Fæsulæ Orvieto and Auximum were undertaken and vigorously prosecuted, and the eunuch Narses was at length recalled to the domestic cares of the palace All dissensions were healed and all opposition was subdued by the temperate authority of the Roman general to whom his enemies could not refuse their esteem, and Belisarius inculcated the salutary lesson that the forces of the state should compose one body and be animated by one soul. But in the interval of discord the Goths were permitted to breathe, an important season was lost, Milan was destroyed and the northern provinces of Italy were afflicted by an inundation of the Franks

When Justinian first meditated the conquest of Italy, he sent ambassadors to the kings of the Franks and adjured them by the common ties of alliance and religion to join in the holy enterprise against the Arians The Goths as their wants were more urgent employed a more effectual mode of persuasion and vainly strove by the gift of lands and money to purchase the friendship or at least the neutrality of a light and perfidious nation [97] But the arms of Belisarius and the revolt of the Italians had no sooner shaken the Gothic monarchy, than Theodebert of Austrasia the most powerful and warlike of the Merovingian kings was persuaded to succour their distress by an indirect and seasonable aid Without expecting the consent of their sovereign ten thousand Burgundians his recent subjects descended from the Alps, and joined the troops which Vitiges had sent to chastise the revolt of Milan After an obstinate siege the capital of Liguria was reduced by famine, but no capitulation could be obtained except for the safe retreat of the Roman garrison Datius the orthodox bishop who had seduced his countrymen to rebellion[98] and ruin escaped to the luxury and honours of the Byzantine court [99] but the clergy, perhaps the Arian clergy, were slaughtered at the foot of their own altars by the defenders of the catholic faith Three hundred thousand males were reported to be slain [100] the female sex and the more precious spoil was resigned to the Burgundians, and the houses, or at least the walls, of Milan were levelled with the ground The Goths, in their last moments were revenged by the destruction of a city second only to Rome in size and opulence, in the splendour of its buildings or the number of its inhabitants, and Belisarius sympathised alone in the fate of his deserted and devoted friends Encouraged by this successful inroad Theodebert himself in the ensuing spring invaded the plains of Italy with an army of one hundred thousand barbarians.[101] The king and some chosen followers were mounted on horseback and armed with lances the infantry, without bows or spears, were satisfied with a shield, a sword and a double-edged battleaxe which in their hands became a deadly and unerring weapon Italy trembled at the march of the Franks, and both the Gothic prince and the Roman general alike ignorant of their designs solicited with hope and terror the friendship of these dangerous allies Till he had secured the passage of the Po on the bridge of Pavia the grandson of Clovis dissembled his intentions, which he at length declared by assaulting almost at the same instant the hostile camps of the Romans and Goths Instead of uniting their arms they fled with equal precipitation, and the fertile though desolate provinces of Liguria and Æmilia were abandoned to a licentious host of barbarians whose rage was not mitigated by any thoughts of settlement or conquest Among the cities which they ruined Genoa not yet constructed of marble is particularly enumerated, and the deaths of thousands according to the regular practice of war appear to have excited less horror than some idolatrous sacrifices of women and children which were performed with impunity in the camp of the most Christian king If it were not a melancholy truth that the first and most cruel sufferings must be the lot of the innocent and helpless history might exult in the misery of the conquerors who in the midst of riches were left destitute of bread or wine reduced to drink the waters of the Po and to feed on the flesh of distempered cattle The dysentery swept away one third of their army, and the clamours of his subjects, who were impatient to pass the Alps disposed Theodebert to listen with respect to the mild exhortations of Belisarius. The memory of this inglorious and destructive warfare was perpetuated on the medals of Gaul, and Justinian without un sheathing his sword, assumed the title of con queror of the Franks. The Merovingian prince was offended by the vanity of the emperor he affected to pity the fallen fortunes of the Goths and his insidious offer of a fœderal union was fortified by the promise or menace of descend ing from the Alps at the head of five hundred thousand men. His plans of conquest were boundless and perhaps chimerical. The king of Austrasia threatened to chastise Justinian, and to march to the gates of Constantinople [102] he was overthrown and slain[103] by a wild bull,[104] as he hunted in the Belgic or German forest

As soon as Belisarius was d livered from his foreign and domestic enemies, he seriously ap plied his forces to the final reduction of Italy In the siege of Osimo the general was nearly transpierced with an arrow if the mortal stroke had not been intercepted by one of his guards who lost in that pious office the use of his hand. The Goths of Osimo four thousand warriors with those of Fæsulæ and the Cottian Alps, were among the last who maintained their in dependence and their gallant resistance which almost tired the patience deserved the esteem, of the conqueror His prudence refused to sub scribe the safe-conduct which they asked to join their brethren of Ravenna but they saved, by an honourable capitulation, one moiety at least of their wealth, with the free alternative of retiring peaceably to their estates or enlisting to serve the emperor in his Persian wars The multitudes which yet adhered to the standard of Vitiges far surpassed the number of the Roman troops but neither prayers nor defiance nor the extreme danger of his most faithful subjects, could tempt the Gothic king beyond the forti fications of Ravenna. These fortifications were indeed impregnable to the assaults of art or viol nce, and when Belisarius invested the capital he was soon convinced that famine only could tame the stubborn spirit of the barba rians. The sea the land, and the channels of the Po were guarded by the vigilance of the Roman general and his morality extended the rights of war to the pract ce of poisoning the waters[105] and secretly firing the granaries[106] of a besieged city[107] While he pressed the blockade of Ra venna, he was surprised by the arrival of two ambassadors from Constantinople with a treaty of peace which Justinian had impru dently signed without deigning to consult the author of his victory By this disgraceful and precarious agreement Italy and the Gothic treasure were divided, and the provinces beyond the Po were left with the regal title to the suc cessor of Theodoric. The ambassadors were eager to accomplish their salutary commission the captive Vitiges accepted with transport the unexpected offer of a crown honour was less prevalent among the Goths than the want and appetite of food and the Roman chiefs, who murmured at the continuance of the war pro fessed implicit submission to the commands of the emperor If Belisarius had possessed only the courage of a soldier the laurel would have been snatched from his hand by timid and envious counsels but in this decisive moment he resolved with the magnanimity of a statesman to sustain alone the danger and merit of gen erous disobedience. Each of his officers gave a written opinion that the siege of Ravenna was impracticable and hopeless the general then rejected the treaty of partition, and declared his own resolution of leading Vitiges in chains to the feet of Justinian. The Goths retired with doubt and dismay this peremptory refusal deprived them of the only signature which they could trust, and filled their minds with a just apprehension that a sagacious enemy had dis covered the full extent of their deplorable state. They compared the fame and fortune of Beli sarius with the weakness of their ill fated king and the comparison suggested an extraordinary pro ect, to which Vitiges, with apparent resig nation was compelled to acquiesce Partition would ruin the strength exile would disgrace the honour of the nation but they offered their arms their treasures, and the fortifications of Ravenna, if Belisarius would disclaim the authority of a master accept the choice of the Goths and assume as he had deserved the kingdom of Italy If the false lustre of a diadem could have tempted the loyalty of a faithful subject, his prudence must have foreseen the inconstancy of the barbarians, and his rational ambition would prefer the safe and honourable sta ion of a Roman general Even the patience and seeming satisfaction with which he enter tained a proposal of treason might be sus ceptible of a malignant interpretation But the lieutenant of Justinian was conscious of his own rectitude he entered into a dark and crooked path as it might lead to the voluntary sub mission of the Goths and his dexterous policy persuaded them that he was disposed to comply with their wishes without engaging an oath or a promise for the performance of a treaty

right the eunuch perpetually dissented from the opinions of Belisarius and, after yielding with reluctance to the siege of Urbino he deserted his colleague in the night, and marched away to the conquest of the Æmilian province The fierce and formidable bands of the Heruli were attached to the person of Narses [98] ten thousand Romans and confederates were persuaded to march under his banners, every malcontent embraced the fair opportunity of revenging his private or imaginary wrongs and the remaining troops of Belisarius were divided and dispersed from the garrisons of Sicily to the shores of the Hadriatic. His skill and perseverance overcame every obstacle Urbino was taken, the sieges of Fæsulæ, Orvieto and Auximum were undertaken and vigorously prosecuted and the eunuch Narses was at length recalled to the domestic cares of the palace All dissensions were healed and all opposition was subdued by the temperate authority of the Roman general to whom his enemies could not refuse their esteem, and Belisarius inculcated the salutary lesson that the forces of the state should compose one body and be animated by one soul. But in the interval of discord the Goths were permitted to breathe an important season was lost, Milan was destroyed and the northern provinces of Italy were afflicted by an inundation of the Franks

When Justinian first meditated the conquest of Italy, he sent ambassadors to the kings of the Franks and adjured them, by the common ties of alliance and religion to join in the holy enterprise against the Arians The Goths as their wants were more urgent employed a more effectual mode of persuasion and vainly strove by the gift of lands and money to purchase the friendship or at least the neutrality of a light and perfidious nation [97] But the arms of Belisarius and the revolt of the Italians had no sooner shaken the Gothic monarchy than Theodebert of Austrasia the most powerful and warlike of the Merovingian kings was persuaded to succour their distress by an indirect and seasonable aid Without expecting the consent of their sovereign ten thousand Burgundians his recent subjects descended from the Alps, and joined the troops which Vitiges had sent to chastise the revolt of Milan After an obstinate siege the capital of Liguria was reduced by famine, but no capitulation could be obtained except for the safe retreat of the Roman garrison Datius the orthodox bishop who had seduced his countrymen to rebellion[98] and ruin, escaped to the luxury and honours of the Byzantine court [99] but the clergy perhaps the Arian clergy were slaughtered at the foot of their own altars by the defenders of the catholic faith Three hundred thousand males were reported to be slain [100] the female sex and the more precious spoil was resigned to the Burgundians and the houses, or at least the walls, of Milan were levelled with the ground The Goths in their last moments were revenged by the destruction of a city second only to Rome in size and opulence, in the splendour of its buildings, or the number of its inhabitants, and Belisarius sympathised alone in the fate of his deserted and devoted friends Encouraged by this successful inroad Theodebert himself, in the ensuing spring invaded the plains of Italy with an army of one hundred thousand barbarians [101] The king and some chosen followers were mounted on horseback and armed with lances the infantry, without bows or spears, were satisfied with a shield a sword and a double-edged battleaxe, which in their hands became a deadly and unerring weapon Italy trembled at the march of the Franks and both the Gothic prince and the Roman general alike ignorant of their designs solicited with hope and terror the friendship of these dangerous allies Till he had secured the passage of the Po on the bridge of Pavia the grandson of Clovis dissembled his intentions, which he at length declared by assaulting almost at the same instant the hostile camps of the Romans and Goths Instead of uniting their arms they fled with equal precipitation, and the fertile though desolate provinces of Liguria and Æmilia were abandoned to a licentious host of barbarians whose rage was not mitigated by any thoughts of settlement or conquest Among the cities which they ruined Genoa not yet constructed of marble, is particularly enumerated, and the deaths of thousands according to the regular practice of war appear to have excited less horror than some idolatrous sacrifices of women and children which were performed with impunity in the camp of the most Christian king If it were not a melancholy truth that the first and most cruel sufferings must be the lot of the innocent and helpless history might exult in the misery of the conquerors who in the midst of riches, were left destitute of bread or wine reduced to drink the waters of the Po and to feed on the flesh of distempered cattle The dysentery swept away one third of their army, and the clamours of his subjects who were impatient to pass the Alps disposed Theodebert to listen with respect to the mild exhortations

and sober In th licence of a military life none could boast that they had seen him intoxicated with wine the most beautiful captives of Gothic or Vandal race were offered to his embraces but he turned aside from their charms and the husband of Antonina was never suspected of violating the laws of conjugal fidelity The spectator and historian of his exploits has observed that amidst the perils of war he was daring without rashness prudent without fear slow or rapid according to the exigencies of the moment that in the deepest distress he was animated by real or apparent hope but that he was modest and humble in the most prosperous fortune By these virtues he equalled or excelled the ancient masters of the military art. Victory by sea and land attended his arms He subdued Africa Italy and the adjacent islands led away captives the successors of Genseric and Theodoric filled Constantinople with the spoils of their palaces and in the space of six years recovered half the provinces of the Western empire In his fame and merit in wealth and power he remained without a rival the first of the Roman sub ects the voice of envy could only magnify his dangerous importance and the emperor might applaud his own discerning spirit which had discovered and raised the genius of Belisarius.

It was the custom of the Roman triumphs that a slave should be placed behind the chariot, to remind the conqueror of the instability of fortune and the infirmities of human nature Procopius in his Anecdotes has assumed that servile and ungrateful office The generous reader may cast away the libel but the evidence of facts will adhere to his memory and he will reluctantly confess that the fame and even the virtue of Belisarius were polluted by the lust and cruelty of his wife and that the hero deserved an appellation which may not drop from the pen of the decent historian. The mother of Antonina[112] was a theatrical prostitute and both h r father and grandfather exercised, at Thessalonica and Constantinople the vile though lucrative profession of charioteers In the various situations of their fortune she became the companion the enemy the servant, and the favourite of the empress Theodora these loose and ambitious females had been connected by similar pleasures they were separated by the jealousy of vice and at length reconciled by the partnership of guilt. Before her marriage with Belisarius, Antonina had one husband and many lovers Photius the son of her former nuptials, was of an age to distinguish himself at the siege of Naples and it was not till the autumn of her age and beauty[113] that she indulged a scandalous attachment to a Thracian youth. Theodosius had been educated in the Eunomian heresy the African voyage was consecrated by the baptism and auspicious name of the first soldier who embarked and the proselyte was adopted into the family of his spiritual parents[114] Belisarius and Antonina. Before they touched the shores of Africa, this holy kindred degenerated into sensual love and as Antonina soon overleaped the bounds of modesty and caution, the Roman general was alone ignorant of his own dishonour During their residence at Carthage he surprised the two lovers in a subterraneous chamber solitary warm and almost naked Anger flashed from his eyes. With the help of this young man said the unblushing Antonina I was secreting our most precious effects from the knowledge of Justinian. The youth resumed his garments, and the pious husband consented to disbelieve the evidence of his own senses From this pleasing and perhaps voluntary delusion Belisarius was awakened at Syracuse by the officious information of Macedonia and that female attendant after requiring an oath for her security produced two chamberlains who like herself had often beheld the adulteries of Antonina. A hasty flight into Asia saved Theodosius from the justice of an injured husband who had signified to one of his guards the order of his death but the tears of Antonina and her artful seductions assured the credulous hero of her innocence and he stooped against his faith and judgment to abandon those imprudent friends who had presumed to accuse or doubt the chastity of his wife The revenge of a guilty woman is implacable and bloody the unfortunate Macedonia with the two witnesses were secretly arrested by the minister of her cruelty their tongues were cut out their bodies were hacked into small pieces and their remains were cast into the sea of Syracuse A rash though judicious saying of Constantine I would sooner have punished the adulteress than the boy was deeply remembered by Antonina and two years afterwards, when despair had armed that officer against his general her sanguinary advice decid d and hastened his execution. Even the indignation of Photius was not forgiven by his mother the exile of her son prepared the recall of her lover and Theodosius condescended to accept the pressing and humble invitation of the conqueror of Italy In the absolute direction of his household and in the important commis which he secretly abhorred The day of the surrender of Ravenna was stipulated by the Gothic ambassadors a fleet laden with provisions sailed as a welcome guest into the deepest recess of the harbour, the gates were opened to the fancied king of Italy, and Belisarius without meeting an enemy triumphantly marched through the streets of an impregnable city [108] The Romans were astonished by their success the multitudes of tall and robust barbarians were confounded by the image of their own patience and the masculine females, spitting in the faces of their sons and husbands, most bitterly reproached them for betraying their dominion and freedom to these pigmies of the south contemptible in their numbers diminutive in their stature Before the Goths could recover from the first surprise and claim the accomplishment of their doubtful hopes the victor established his power in Ravenna beyond the danger of repentance and revolt Vitiges who perhaps had attempted to escape was honourably guarded in his palace [109] the flower of the Gothic youth was selected for the service of the emperor the remainder of the people was dismissed to their peaceful habitations in the southern provinces and a colony of Italians was invited to replenish the depopulated city The submission of the capital was imitated in the towns and villages of Italy which had not been subdued or even visited by the Romans and the independent Goths who remained in arms at Pavia and Verona were ambitious only to become the subjects of Belisarius But his inflexible loyalty rejected except as the substitute of Justinian their oaths of allegiance and he was not offended by the reproach of their deputies that he rather chose to be a slave than a king

After the second victory of Belisarius envy again whispered Justinian listened and the hero was recalled The remnant of the Gothic war was no longer worthy of his presence a gracious sovereign was impatient to reward his services and to consult his wisdom and he alone was capable of defending the East against the innumerable armies of Persia Belisarius understood the suspicion accepted the excuse embarked at Ravenna his spoils and trophies and proved by his ready obedience that such an abrupt removal from the government of Italy was not less unjust than it might have been indiscreet The emperor received with honourable courtesy both Vitiges and his more noble consort and as the king of the Goths conformed to the Athanasian faith, he obtained with a rich inheritance of lands in Asia, the rank of senator and patrician [110] Every spectator admired without peril, the strength and stature of the young barbarians they adored the majesty of the throne, and promised to shed their blood in the service of their benefactor Justinian deposited in the Byzantine palace the treasures of the Gothic monarchy A flattering senate was sometimes admitted to gaze on the magnificent spectacle but it was enviously secluded from the public view and the conqueror of Italy renounced without a murmur perhaps without a sigh, the well-earned honours of a second triumph His glory was indeed exalted above all external pomp and the faint and hollow praises of the court were supplied even in a servile age, by the respect and admiration of his country Whenever he appeared in the streets and public places of Constantinople Belisarius attracted and satisfied the eyes of the people His lofty stature and majestic countenance fulfilled their expectations of a hero the meanest of his fellow citizens were emboldened by his gentle and gracious demeanour, and the martial train which attended his footsteps left his person more accessible than in a day of battle Seven thousand horsemen matchless for beauty and valour were maintained in the service and at the private expense of the general [111] Their prowess was always conspicuous in single combats or in foremost ranks and both parties confessed that in the siege of Rome the guards of Belisarius had alone vanquished the barbarian host Their numbers were continually augmented by the bravest and most faithful of the enemy and his fortunate captives, the Vandals, the Moors and the Goths emulated the attachment of his domestic followers By the union of liberality and justice he acquired the love of the soldiers without alienating the affections of the people The sick and wounded were relieved with medicines and money and still more efficaciously by the healing visits and smiles of their commander The loss of a weapon or a horse was instantly repaired and each deed of valour was rewarded by the rich and honourable gifts of a bracelet or a collar, which were rendered more precious by the judgment of Belisarius He was endeared to the husbandmen by the peace and plenty which they enjoyed under the shadow of his standard. Instead of being injured the country was enriched by the march of the Roman armies and such was the rigid discipline of their camp that not an apple was gathered from the tree not a path could be traced in the fields of corn Belisarius was chaste profession of a monk and the abbot Photius was employed after the death of Justinian to reconcile and regulate the churches of Egypt The son of Antonina suffered all that an enemy can inflict her patient husband imposed on himself the more exquisite misery of violating his promise and deserting his friend

In the succeeding campaign Belisarius was again sent against the Persians he saved the East but he offended Theodora and perhaps the emperor himself The malady of Justinian had countenanced the rumour of his death and the Roman general on the supposition of that probable event spoke the free language of a citizen and a soldier His colleague Buzes who concurred in the same sentiments lost his rank, his liberty and his health by the persecution of the empress but the disgrace of Belisarius was alleviated by the dignity of his own character and the influence of his wife who might wish to humble but could not desire to ruin the partner of her fortunes Even his removal was coloured by the assurance that the sinking state of Italy would be retrieved by the single presence of its conqueror But no sooner had he returned alone and defenceless than a hostile commission was sent to the East to seize his treasures and crim inat his actions the guards and veterans who followed his private banner were distributed among the chiefs of the army and even the eunuchs presumed to ca t lots for the partition of his martial domestics When he passed with a small and sordid retinue throu h the streets of Constantinople his forlorn appearance excited the amazement and compassion of the people Justinian and Theodora received him with cold ingratitude the servile crowd with in solence and contempt and in the evening he retired with trembling steps to his deserted palace An indisposition feigned or real had confined Antonina to her apartment and she walked disdainfully silent in the adjacent portico while Belisarius threw himself on his bed and expected in an agony of grief and terror the death which he had so often braved under the walls of Rome Long after sunset a messenger was announced from the empress he opened with anxious curiosity the letter which contained the sentence of his fate. You cannot be ignorant how much you have deserved my displeasure I am not insensible of the services of Antonina To her merits and intercession I have granted your life and permit you to retain a part of your treasures, which might be justly forfeited to the state Let your gratitude where it is due be displayed not in words, but in your future behaviour I know not how to believe or to relate the transports with which the hero is said to have received this ignominious pardon. He fell prostrate before his wife he kissed the feet of his saviour and he devoutly promised to live the grateful and submissive slave of Antonina A fine of one hundred and twenty thou sand pounds sterling was levied on the fortunes of Belisarius and with the office of count or master of the royal stables, he accepted the conduct of the Italian war At his departure from Constantinople his friends and even the public, were persuaded that as soon as he re gained his freedom he would renounce his dis-simulation and that his wife Theodora and perhaps the emperor himself would be sacri ficed to the just revenge of a virtuous rebel Their hopes were deceived and the unconquer able patience and loyalty of Belisarius appear either below or above the character of a MAN 117

State of the Barbaric World Establishment of the Lombards on the Danube Tribes and Inroads of the Sclavonians Origin, Empire, and Embassies of the Turks Th Flight of the Avars Chosroes I, or Nushirvan, King of Persia His prosperous Reign and Wars with the Romans The Colchian or Lazic War The Æthiopians

OUR estimate of personal merit is relative to the common faculties of mankind The aspiring efforts of genius or virtue either in active or speculative life are measured not so much by their real elevation as by the height to which they ascend above the level of their age or country and the same stature which in a people of giants would pass unnoticed must appear conspicuous in a race of pig mies Leonidas and his three hundred compan ions devoted their lives at Thermopylæ but the education of the infant the boy and the man sions of peace and war,[115] the favourite youth most rapidly acquired a fortune of four hundred thousand pounds sterling and after their return to Constantinople the passion of Antonina at least continued ardent and unabated But fear, devotion and lassitude perhaps inspired Theodosius with more serious thoughts He dreaded the busy scandal of the capital and the indiscreet fondness of the wife of Belisarius escaped from her embraces and retiring to Ephesus, shaved his head and took refuge in the sanctuary of a monastic life The despair of the new Ariadne could scarcely have been excused by the death of her husband She wept, she tore her hair, she filled the palace with her cries "she had lost the dearest of friends a tender a faithful a laborious friend! But her warm entreaties fortified by the prayers of Belisarius were insufficient to draw the holy monk from the solitude of Ephesus It was not till the general moved forward for the Persian war that Theodosius could be tempted to return to Constantinople and the short interval before the departure of Antonina herself was boldly devoted to love and pleasure

A philosopher may pity and forgive the infirmities of female nature from which he receives no real injury but contemptible is the husband who feels and yet endures his own infamy in that of his wife Antonina pursued her son with implacable hatred and the gallant Photius[116] was exposed to her secret persecutions in the camp beyond the Tigris Enraged by his own wrongs and by the dishonour of his blood he cast away in his turn the sentiments of nature and revealed to Belisarius the turpitude of a woman who had violated all the duties of a mother and a wife From the surprise and indignation of the Roman general his former credulity appears to have been sincere he embraced the knees of the son of Antonina adjured him to remember his obligations rather than his birth and confirmed at the altar their holy vows of revenge and mutual defence The dominion of Antonina was impaired by absence and when she met her husband on his return from the Persian confines Belisarius in his first and transient emotions confined her person and threatened her life Photius was more resolved to punish and less prompt to pardon he flew to Ephesus extorted from a trusty eunuch of his mother the full confession of her guilt arrested Theodosius and his treasures in the church of St John the Apostle and concealed his captives whose execution was only delayed in a secure and sequestered fortress of Cilicia Such a daring outrage against public justice could not pass with impunity, and the cause of Antonina was espoused by the empress whose favour she had deserved by the recent services of the disgrace of a præfect, and the exile and murder of a pope At the end of the campaign Belisarius was recalled he complied as usual with the Imperial mandate His mind was not prepared for rebellion his obedience however adverse to the dictates of honour was consonant to the wishes of his heart and when he embraced his wife at the command and perhaps in the presence of the empress the tender husband was disposed to forgive or to be forgiven The bounty of Theodora reserved for her companion a more precious favour I have found she said 'my dearest patrician, a pearl of inestimable value, it has not yet been viewed by any mortal eye but the sight and the possession of this jewel are destined for my friend " As soon as the curiosity and impatience of Antonina were kindled, the door of a bedchamber was thrown open and she beheld her lover whom the diligence of the eunuchs had discovered in his secret prison Her silent wonder burst into passionate exclamations of gratitude and joy and she named Theodora her queen her benefactress and her saviour The monk of Ephesus was nourished in the palace with luxury and ambition but instead of assuming as he was promised the command of the Roman armies Theodosius expired in the first fatigues of an amorous interview The grief of Antonina could only be assuaged by the sufferings of her son A youth of consular rank and a sickly constitution was punished without a trial like a malefactor and a slave yet such was the constancy of his mind that Photius sustained the tortures of the scourge and the rack without violating the faith which he had sworn to Belisarius After this fruitless cruelty the son of Antonina while his mother feasted with the empress was buried in her subterraneous prisons which admitted not the distinction of night and day He twice escaped to the most venerable sanctuaries of Constantinople the church of St Sophia and of the Virgin but his tyrants were insensible of religion as of pity and the helpless youth amidst the clamours of the clergy and people was twice dragged from the altar to the dungeon His third attempt was more successful At the end of three years the prophet Zachariah or some mortal friend indicated the means of an escape he eluded the spies and guards of the empress reached the holy sepulchre of Jerusalem embraced the

tween the Danube and the Alps and the ambition of the Gepidæ was checked by the rising power and fame of the LOMBARDS.[7] This corrupt appellation has been diffused in the thirteenth century by the merchants and bankers of the Italian posterity of these savage warriors but the original name of Langobards is expressive only of the peculiar length and fashion of their beards I am not disposed either to question or to justify their Scandinavian origin[8] nor to pursue the migrations of the Lombards through unknown regions and marvellous adventures About the time of Augustus and Trajan a ray of historic light breaks on the darkness of their antiquities, and they are discovered for the first time, between the Elbe and the Oder Fierce beyond the example of the Germans, they delighted to propagate the tremendous belief that their heads were formed like the heads of dogs and that they drank the blood of their enemies whom they vanquished in battle. The smallness of their numbers was recruited by the adoption of their bravest slaves and alone, amidst their powerful neighbours they defended by arms their high spirited independence. In the tempests of the north which overwhelmed so many names and nations, this little bark of the Lombards still floated on the surface they gradually descended towards the south and the Danube and at the end of four hundred years they again appear with their ancient valour and renown. Their manners were not less ferocious The assassination of a royal guest was executed in the presence and by the command of the king's daughter who had been provoked by some words of insult, and disappointed by his diminutive stature and a tribute the price of blood was imposed on the Lombards by his brother the king of the Heruli Adversity revived a sense of moderation and justice and the insolence of conquest was chastised by the signal defeat and irreparable dispersion of the Heruli who were seated in the southern provinces of Poland.[9] The victories of the Lombards recommended them to the friendship of the emperors and at the solicitation of Justinian they passed the Danube to reduce, according to their treaty the cities of Noricum and the fortresses of Pannonia. But the spirit of rapine soon tempted them beyond these ample limits they wandered along the coast of the Hadriatic as far as Dyrrachium, and presumed with familiar rudeness, to enter the towns and houses of their Roman allies and to seize the captives who had escaped from their audacious hands These acts of hostility the sallies as it might be pretended of some loose adventurers, were disowned by the nation and excused by the emperor but the arms of the Lombards were more seriously engaged by a contest of thirty years, which was terminated only by the extirpation of the Gepidæ The hostile nations often pleaded their cause before the throne of Constantinople and the crafty Justinian, to whom the barbarians were almost equally odious, pronounced a partial and ambiguous sentence and dexterously protracted the war by slow and ineffectual succours Their strength was formidable since the Lombards, who sent into the field several myriads of soldiers, still claimed as the weaker side the protection of the Romans. Their spirit was intrepid yet such is the uncertainty of courage that the two armies were suddenly struck with a panic they fled from each other and the rival kings remained with their guards in the midst of an empty plain. A short truce was obtained but their mutual resentment again kindled, and the remembrance of their shame rendered the next encounter more desperate and bloody Forty thousand of the barbarians perished in the decisive battle which broke the power of the Gepidæ transferred the fears and wishes of Justinian, and first displayed the character of Alboin the youthful prince of the Lombards, and the future conqueror of Italy[10]

The wild people who dwelt or wandered in the plains of Russia Lithuania and Poland, might be reduced, in the age of Justinian under the two great families of the BULGARIANS[11] and the SCLAVONIANS. According to the Greek writers the former who touched the Euxine and the lake Mæotis derived from the Huns their name or descent and it is needless to renew the simple and well known picture of Tartar manners They were bold and dexterous archers who drank the milk and feasted on the flesh of their fleet and indefatigable horses whose flocks and herds followed or rather guided the motions of their roving camps to whose inroads no country was remote or impervious and who were practised in flight though incapable of fear The nation was divided into two powerful and hostile tribes who pursued each other with fraternal hatred They eagerly disputed the friendship or rather the gifts of the emperor and the distinction which nature had fixed between the faithful dog and the rapacious wolf was applied by an ambassador who received only verbal instructions from the mouth of his illiterate prince[12] The Bulgarians of whatsoever species were equally attracted by Roman wealth they assumed a vague dominion over the Sclavonian

had prepared and almost ensured this memorable sacrifice and each Spartan would approve, rather than admire, an act of duty of which himself and eight thousand of his fellow citizens were equally capable[1] The great Pompey might inscribe on his trophies that he had defeated in battle two millions of enemies and reduced fifteen hundred cities from the lake Mæotis to the Red Sea but the fortune of Rome flew before his eagles the nations were oppressed by their own fears, and the invincible legions which he commanded had been formed by the habits of conquest and the discipline of ages In this view the character of Belisarius may be deservedly placed above the heroes of the ancient republics His imperfections flowed from the contagion of the times his virtues were his own the free gift of nature or reflection he raised himself without a master or a rival and so inadequate were the arms committed to his hand, that his sole advantage was derived from the pride and presumption of his adversaries Under his command the subjects of Justinian often deserved to be called Romans but the unwarlike appellation of Greeks was imposed as a term of reproach by the haughty Goths who affected to blush that they must dispute the kingdom of Italy with a nation of tragedians pantomimes and pirates[3] The climate of Asia has indeed been found less congenial than that of Europe to military spirit those populous countries were enervated by luxury, despotism, and superstition and the monks were more expensive and more numerous than the soldiers of the East The regular force of the empire had once amounted to six hundred and forty five thousand men it was reduced in the time of Justinian to one hundred and fifty thousand and this number large as it may seem was thinly scattered over the sea and land—in Spain and Italy in Africa and Egypt, on the banks of the Danube the coast of the Euxine and the frontiers of Persia The citizen was exhausted yet the soldier was unpaid his poverty was mischievously soothed by the privilege of rapine and indolence and the tardy payments were detained and intercepted by the fraud of those agents who usurp without courage or danger the emoluments of war Public and private distress recruited the armies of the state but in the field and still more in the presence of the enemy their numbers were always defective The want of national spirit was supplied by the precarious faith and disorderly service of barbarian mercenaries Even military honour which has often survived the loss of virtue and freedom was almost totally extinct The generals who were multiplied beyond the example of former times, laboured only to prevent the success or to sully the reputation of their colleagues and they had been taught by experience that if merit sometimes provoked the jealousy, error, or even guilt, would obtain the indulgence, of a gracious emperor[4] In such an age the triumphs of Belisarius and afterwards of Narses, shine with incomparable lustre but they are encompassed with the darkest shades of disgrace and calamity While the lieutenant of Justinian subdued the kingdoms of the Goths and Vandals, the emperor,[5] timid though ambitious, balanced the forces of the barbarians fomented their divisions by flattery and falsehood and invited by his patience and liberality the repetition of injuries[6] The keys of Carthage Rome, and Ravenna were presented to their conqueror while Antioch was destroyed by the Persian, and Justinian trembled for the safety of Constantinople

Even the Gothic victories of Belisarius were prejudicial to the state since they abolished the important barrier of the Upper Danube which had been so faithfully guarded by Theodoric and his daughter For the defence of Italy the Goths evacuated Pannonia and Noricum which they left in a peaceful and flourishing condition the sovereignty was claimed by the emperor of the Romans the actual possession was abandoned to the boldness of the first invader On the opposite banks of the Danube the plains of Upper Hungary and the Transylvanian hills were possessed since the death of Attila by the tribes of the Gepidæ who respected the Gothic arms and despised not indeed the gold of the Romans but the secret motive of their annual subsidies The vacant fortifications of the river were instantly occupied by these barbarians their standards were planted on the walls of Sirmium and Belgrade and the ironical tone of their apology aggravated this insult on the majesty of the empire 'So extensive O Cæsar are your dominions so numerous are your cities that you are continually seeking for nations to whom either in peace or war you may relinquish these useless possessions The Gepidæ are your brave and faithful allies and if they have anticipated your gifts they have shown a just confidence in your bounty Their presumption was excused by the mode of revenge which Justinian embraced Instead of asserting the rights of a sovereign for the protection of his subjects the emperor invited a strange people to invade and possess the Roman provinces be

Corinth and the last ruin of Greece has appeared an object too minute for the attention of history The works which the emperor raised for the protection but at the expense of his subjects served only to disclose the weakness of some neglected part and the walls which by flattery had been deemed impregnable were either deserted by the garrison or scaled by the barbarians Three thousand Sclavonians who insolently divided themselves into two bands discovered the weakness and misery of a triumphant reign. They passed the Danube and the Hebrus vanquished the Roman generals who dared to oppose their progress and plundered with impunity the cities of Illyricum and Thrace each of which had arms and numbers to overwhelm their contemptible assailants Whatever praise the boldness of the Sclavonians may deserve it is sullied by the wanton and deliberate cruelty which they are accused of exercising on their prisoners Without distinction of rank or age or sex, the captives were impaled or flayed alive, or suspended between four posts and beaten with clubs till they expired or enclosed in some spacious building and left to perish in the flames with the spoil and cattle which might impede the march of these savage victors[19] Perhaps a more impartial narrative would reduce the number and qualify the nature of these horrid acts and they might sometimes be excused by the cruel laws of retaliation In the siege of Topirus[20] whose obstinate defence had enraged the Sclavonians, they massacred fifteen thousand males but they spared the women and children the most valuable captives were always reserved for labour or ransom the servitude was not rigorous and the terms of their deliverance were speedy and moderate. But the subject or the historian of Justinian, exhaled his just indignation in the language of complaint and reproach and Procopius has confidently affirmed that in a reign of thirty two years each annual inroad of the barbarians consumed two hundred thousand of the inhabitants of the Roman empire The entire population of Turkish Europe which nearly corresponds with the provinces of Justinian, would perhaps be incapable of supplying six millions of persons, the result of this incredible estimate.[21]

In the midst of these obscure calamities Europe felt the shock of a revolution, which first revealed to the world the name and nation of the Turks. Like Romulus the founder of that martial people was suckled by a she wolf who afterwards made him the father of a numerous progeny and the representation of that animal in the banners of the Turks preserved the memory, or rather suggested the idea of a fable which was invented without any mutual intercourse by the shepherds of Latium and those of Scythia At the equal distance of two thousand miles from the Caspian, the Icy, the Chinese, and the Bengal seas a ridge of mountains is conspicuous the centre and perhaps the summit, of Asia which in the language of different nations has been styled Imaus and Caf[22] and Altai and the Golden Mountains and the Girdle of the Earth. The sides of the hills were productive of minerals and the iron forges,[23] for the purpose of war were exercised by the Turks, the most despised portion of the slaves of the great khan of the Geougen But their servitude could only last till a leader bold and eloquent should arise to persuade his countrymen that the same arms which they forged for their masters might become in their own hands the instruments of freedom and victory They sallied from the mountain[24] a sceptre was the reward of his advice and the annual ceremony in which a piece of iron was heated in the fire, and a smith's hammer was successively handled by the prince and his nobles recorded for ages the humble profession and rational pride of the Turkish nation Bertezena their first leader signalised their valour and his own in successful combats against the neighbouring tribes but when he presumed to ask in marriage the daughter of the great khan the insolent demand of a slave and a mechanic was contemptuously rejected. The disgrace was expiated by a more noble alliance with a princess of China and the decisive battle which almost extirpated the nation of the Geougen established in Tartary the new and more powerful empire of the Turks. They reigned over the north but they confessed the vanity of conquest by their faithful attachment to the mountain of their fathers The royal encampment seldom lost sight of Mount Altai, from whence the river Irtish descends to water the rich pastures of the Calmucks[25] which nourish the largest sheep and oxen in the world The soil is fruitful and the climate mild and temperate the happy region was ignorant of earthquake and pestilence the emperor's throne was turned towards the east, and a golden wolf on the top of a spear seemed to guard the entrance of his tent One of the successors of Bertezena was tempted by the luxury and superstition of China but his design of building cities and temples was defeated by the simple wisdom of a barbarian counsellor The Turks be

name, and their rapid marches could only be stopped by the Baltic Sea or the extreme cold and poverty of the north But the same race of Sclavonians appears to have maintained, in every age the possession of the same countries Their numerous tribes however distant or adverse used one common language (it was harsh and irregular) and were known by the resemblance of their form which deviated from the swarthy Tartar, and approached without attaining the lofty stature and fair complexion of the German Four thousand six hundred villages[13] were scattered over the provinces of Russia and Poland and their huts were hastily built of rough timber, in a country deficient both in stone and iron Erected or rather concealed in the depth of forests on the banks of rivers or the edge of morasses we may not perhaps without flattery compare them to the architecture of the beaver which they resembled in a double issue to the land and water for the escape of the savage inhabitant an animal less cleanly, less diligent and less social, than that marvellous quadruped The fertility of the soil rather than the labour of the natives, supplied the rustic plenty of the Sclavonians Their sheep and horned cattle were large and numerous and the fields which they sowed with millet and panic[14] afforded in the place of bread a coarse and less nutritive food The incessant rapine of their neighbours compelled them to bury this treasure in the earth but on the appearance of a stranger it was freely imparted by a people whose unfavourable character is qualified by the epithets of chaste, patient and hospitable As their supreme god they adored an invisible master of the thunder The rivers and the nymphs obtained their subordinate honours and the popular worship was expressed in vows and sacrifice The Sclavonians disdained to obey a despot a prince or even a magistrate but their experience was too narrow their passions too headstrong to compose a system of equal law or general defence Some voluntary respect was yielded to age and valour but each tribe or village existed as a separate republic and all must be persuaded where none could be compelled They fought on foot almost naked and except an unwieldy shield without any defensive armour their weapons of offence were a bow a quiver of small poisoned arrows and a long rope which they dexterously threw from a distance and entangled their enemy in a running noose In the field the Sclavonian infantry was dangerous by their speed agility and hardiness they swam, they dived they remained under water, drawing their breath through a hollow cane and a river or lake was often the scene of their unsuspected ambuscade But these were the achievements of spies or stragglers the military art was unknown to the Sclavonians their name was obscure and their conquests were inglorious[15]

I have marked the faint and general outline of the Sclavonians and Bulgarians without attempting to define their intermediate boundaries which were not accurately known or respected by the barbarians themselves Their importance was measured by their vicinity to the empire and the level country of Moldavia and Wallachia was occupied by the Antes[16] a Sclavonian tribe, which swelled the titles of Justinian with an epithet of conquest[17] Against the Antes he erected the fortifications of the Lower Danube and laboured to secure the alliance of a people seated in the direct channel of northern inundation an interval of two hundred miles between the mountains of Transylvania and the Euxine Sea But the Antes wanted power and inclination to stem the fury of the torrent and the light armed Sclavonians from a hundred tribes pursued with almost equal speed the footsteps of the Bulgarian horse The payment of one piece of gold for each soldier procured a safe and easy retreat through the country of the Gepidæ who commanded the passage of the Upper Danube[18] The hopes or fears of the barbarians their intestine union or discord the accident of a frozen or shallow stream the prospect of harvest or vintage the prosperity or distress of the Romans were the causes which produced the uniform repetition of annual visits[19] tedious in the narrative and destructive in the event The same year and possibly the same month in which Ravenna surrendered was marked by an invasion of the Huns or Bulgarians so dreadful that it almost effaced the memory of their past inroads They spread from the suburbs of Constantinople to the Ionian Gulf destroyed thirty two cities or castles erased Potidæa which Athens had built and Philip had besieged and repassed the Danube dragging at their horses heels one hundred and twenty thousand of the subjects of Justinian In a subsequent inroad they pierced the wall of the Thracian Chersonesus extirpated the habitations and the inhabitants boldly traversed the Hellespont and returned to their companions laden with the spoils of Asia Another party, which seemed a multitude in the eyes of the Romans penetrated without opposition from the straits of Thermopylæ to the isthmus of audience of Justinian Candish the first of the ambassadors, addressed the Roman emperor in these terms You see before you O mighty prince, the representatives of the strongest and most populous of nations the invincible, the irresistible Avars We are willing to devote our s lves to your service we are able to vanquish and destroy all the enemies who now disturb your repose But we expect as the price of our alliance, as the reward of our valour precious gifts annual subsidies and fruitful possessions

. the time of this embassy Justinian had reign- above thirty he had lived above seventy five ars his mind as well as his body was feeble d languid and the conqueror of Africa and aly careless of the permanent interest of his ople aspired only to end his days in the bom even of inglorious peace. In a studied ora on, he imparted to the senate his resolution to issemble the insult and to purchase the friend up of the Avars and the whole enate like the randarins of China applauded the incomparabl wisdom and foresight of their sovereign. The instruments of luxury were immediately prepared to captivate the barbarians silken garments soft and splendid beds and chains and collars incrusted wi h gold The ambassadors content with such liberal reception departed from Constantinople, and Valentin one of the emperor's guards was sent with a similar character to their camp at the foot of Mount Caucasus As their destruction or their success must be alike advantageous to the empire he persuaded them to invade the enemies of Rome and they were easily tempted by gifts and promises to gratify their ruling inclinations These fugitives who fled before the Turkish arms passed the Tanais and Borysthenes and boldly advanced into th heart of Poland and Germany violating the law of nations and abusing the rights of victory Before ten years had elapsed their camps were seated on the Danube and the Elbe, many Bulgarian and Sclavonian names were obliterated from the earth and the remainder of their tribes are found as tributaries and vassals under the standard of the Avars Th chagan the peculiar title of their king still affected to cultivate the friendship of the emperor and Justinian entertained some thoughts of fixing them in Pannonia to balance the prevailing power of the Lombards But the virtue or treachery of an Avar betrayed the secret enmity and ambitious designs of their countrymen and they loudly complained of the timid though jealous policy of detaining their ambassadors and denying th arms which they had been allowed to purchase in the capital of the empire [44]

Perhaps the apparent change in the dispositions of the emperors may be ascribed to the embassy which was received from the conquerors of the Avars [45] The immense distance which eluded their arms could not extinguish their resentment the Turkish ambassadors pursued the footsteps of the vanquished to the Jaik the Volga Mount Caucasus the Euxine, and Constantinople and at length appeared before the successor of Constantine to request that he would not espouse the cause of rebels and fugitives. Even commerce had some share in this remarkable negotiation and the Sogdoites, who were now the tributaries of the Turks embraced the fair occasion of opening by the north of the Caspian a new road for the importation of Chinese silk into the Roman empire. The Persian who preferred the navigation of Ceylon, had stopped the caravans of Bochara and Samarcand their silk was contemptuously burnt some Turkish ambassadors died in Persia with a suspicion of poison and the great khan permitted his faithful vassal Maniach, the prince of th Sogdoites to propose at the Byzantine court a treaty of alliance against th ir common enemies Their spl ndid apparel and rich presents, the fruit of Oriental luxury distinguished Maniach and his colleagues from the rude savages of the North their letters in the Scythian character and language, announced a people who had attained the rudiments of science [46] they enumerated the conquests, they offered the friendship and military aid of the Turks and their sincerity was attested by direful imprecations (if they were guilty of falsehood) against their own head and the head of Disabul their master The Greek prince entertained with hospitable regard the ambassadors of a remote and powerful monarch the sight of silkworms and looms disappointed the hopes of the Sogdoites the emperor renounced or seemed to renounce, the fugitive Avars but he accepted the alliance of the Turks and the ratification of the treaty was carried by a Roman minister to the foot of Mount Altai. Under the successors of Justinian the friendship of the two nations was cultivated by frequent and cordial intercourse the most favoured vassals were permitted to imitate the example of the great khan and one hundred and six Turks, who on various occasions had visited Constantinople departed at the same time for their native country The duration and length of the journey from the Byzantine court to Mount Altai are not specified it might have said 'are not equal in number to one hundredth part of the inhabitants of China If we balance their power, and elude their armies it is because we wander without any fixed habitations in the exercise of war and hunting Are we strong? we advance and conquer are we feeble? we retire and are concealed Should the Turks confine themselves within the walls of cities the loss of a battle would be the destruction of their empire The bonzes preach only patience, humility, and the renunciation of the world Such O king! is not the religion of heroes" They entertained with less reluctance the doctrines of Zoroaster but the greatest part of the nation acquiesced without inquiry in the opinions, or rather in the practice of their ancestors The honours of sacrifice were reserved for the supreme deity, they acknowledged in rude hymns their obligations to the air, the fire the water, and the earth and their priests derived some profit from the art of divination Their unwritten laws were rigorous and impartial theft was punished by a tenfold restitution adultery, treason, and murder with death and no chastisement could be inflicted too severe for the rare and inexpiable guilt of cowardice As the subject nations marched under the standard of the Turks their cavalry, both men and horses, were proudly computed by millions one of their effective armies consisted of four hundred thousand soldiers, and in less than fifty years they were connected in peace and war with the Romans, the Persians and the Chinese In their northern limits some vestige may be discovered of the form and situation of Kamtchatka of a people of hunters and fishermen whose sledges were drawn by dogs and whose habitations were buried in the earth The Turks were ignorant of astronomy but the observation taken by some learned Chinese with a gnomon of eight feet fixes the royal camp in the latitude of forty nine degrees, and marks their extreme progress within three or at least ten degrees of the polar circle [27] Among their southern conquests the most splendid was that of the Nephthalites or White Huns, a polite and warlike people, who possessed the commercial cities of Bochara and Samarcand who had vanquished the Persian monarch, and carried their victorious arms along the banks and perhaps to the mouth of the Indus On the side of the west the Turkish cavalry advanced to the lake Mæotis They passed that lake on the ice The khan who dwelt at the foot of Mount Altai issued his commands for the siege of Bosphorus [8] a city the voluntary subject of Rome and whose princes had formerly been the friends of Athens [28] To the east the Turks invaded China as often as the vigour of the government was relaxed and I am taught to read in the history of the times that they mowed down their patient enemies like hemp or grass and that the mandarins applauded the wisdom of an emperor who repulsed these barbarians with golden lances This extent of savage empire compelled the Turkish monarch to establish three subordinate princes of his own blood, who soon forgot their gratitude and allegiance The conquerors were enervated by luxury, which is always fatal except to an industrious people, the policy of China solicited the vanquished nations to resume their independence and the power of the Turks was limited to a period of two hundred years The revival of their name and dominion in the southern countries of Asia are the events of a later age, and the dynasties which succeeded to their native realms may sleep in oblivion since their history bears no relation to the decline and fall of the Roman empire [30]

In the rapid career of conquest the Turks attacked and subdued the nation of the Ogors or Varchonites on the banks of the river Til which derived the epithet of Black from its dark water or gloomy forests [31] The khan of the Ogors was slain with three hundred thousand of his subjects and their bodies were scattered over the space of four days' journey their surviving countrymen acknowledged the strength and mercy of the Turks and a small portion about twenty thousand warriors, preferred exile to servitude They followed the well known road of the Volga, cherished the error of the nations who confounded them with the AVARS, and spread the terror of that false though famous appellation, which had not however saved its lawful proprietors from the yoke of the Turks [32] After a long and victorious march the new Avars arrived at the foot of Mount Caucasus in the country of the Alani [33] and Circassians where they first heard of the splendour and weakness of the Roman empire They humbly requested their confederate the prince of the Alani to lead them to this source of riches and their ambassador with the permission of the governor of Lazica was transported by the Euxine Sea to Constantinople The whole city was poured forth to behold with curiosity and terror the aspect of a strange people their long hair, which hung in tresses down their backs was gracefully bound with ribands, but the rest of their habit appeared to imitate the fashion of the Huns When they were admitted to the

ercenary aid of the barbarians who had slain is father His nobles were suspicious that Kobad never forgave the authors of his expulsion, r even those of his restoration The people was eluded and inflamed by the fanaticism of Mazdak[38] who asserted the community of women[39] and the equality of mankind, whilst he appropriated the richest lands and most beautiful females to the use of his sectaries The view of these disorders, which had been fomented by his laws and example[40] embittered the declining age of the Persian monarch and his fears were increased by the consciousness of his design to reverse the natural and customary order of succession in favour of his third and most favoured son so famous under the names of Chosroes and Nushirvan To render the youth more illustrious in the eyes of the nations Kobad was desirous that he should be adopted by the emperor Justin the hope of peace inclined the Byzantine court to accept this singular proposal and Chosroes might have acquired a specious claim to the inheritance of his Roman parent But the future mischief was diverted by the advice of the quæstor Proclus a difficulty was started, whether the adoption should be performed as a civil or military rite[41] the treaty was abruptly dissolved and the sense of this indignity sunk deep into the mind of Chosroes who had already advanced to the Tigris on his road to Constantinople His father did not long survive the disappointment of his wishes the testament of their deceased sovereign was read in the assembly of the nobles and a powerful faction, prepared for the event, and regardless of the priority of age exalted Chosroes to the throne of Persia He filled that throne during a prosperous period of forty-eight years[42] and the justice of Nushirvan is celebrated as the theme of immortal praise by the nations of the East.

But the justice of kings is understood by themselves and even by their subjects with an ample indulgence for the gratification of passion and interest The virtue of Chosroes was that of a conqueror who in the measures of peace and war is excited by ambition and restrained by prudence who confounds the greatness with the happiness of a nation and calmly devotes the lives of thousands to the fame or even the amusement, of a single man. In his domestic administration the just Nushirvan would merit in our feelings the appellation of a tyrant His two elder brothers had been deprived of their fair expectations of the diadem their future life between the supreme rank and the condition of subjects was anxious to themselves and formidable to their master fear as well as revenge might tempt them to rebel the slightest evidence of a conspiracy satisfied the author of their wrongs and the repose of Chosroes was secured by the death of these unhappy princes, with their families and adherents. One guiltless youth was saved and dismissed by the compassion of a veteran general and this act of humanity, which was revealed by his son overbalanced the merit of reducing twelve nations to the obedience of Persia. The zeal and prudence of Mebodes had fixed the diadem on the head of Chosroes himself but he delayed to attend the royal summons till he had performed the duties of a military review he was instantly commanded to repair to the iron tripod which stood before the gate of the palace,[43] where it was death to relieve or approach the victim and Mebodes languished several days before his sentence was pronounced by the inflexible pride and calm ingratitude of the son of Kobad. But the people, more especially in the East is disposed to forgive, and even to applaud the cruelty which strikes at the loftiest heads—at the slaves of ambition whose voluntary choice has exposed them to live in the smiles and to perish by the frown of a capricious monarch. In the execution of the laws which he had no temptation to violate in the punishment of crimes which attacked his own dignity as well as the happiness of individuals Nushirvan or Chosroes deserved the appellation of just His government was firm rigorous, and impartial It was the first labour of his reign to abolish the dangerous theory of common or equal possessions the lands and women which the sectaries of Mazdak had usurped were restored to their lawful owners and the temperate chastisement of the fanatics or impostors confirmed the domestic rights of society Instead of listening with blind confidence to a favourite minister he established four viziers over the four great provinces of his empire—Assyria Media Persia and Bactriana In the choice of judges præfects and counsellors he strove to remove the mask which is always worn in the presence of kings he wished to substitute the natural order of talents for the accidental distinctions of birth and fortune he professed in specious language his intention to prefer those men who carried the poor in their bosoms and to banish corruption from the seat of justice as dogs were excluded from the temples of the Magi. The code of laws of the first Artaxerxes was revived and published as the rule of the magistrates but the assurance of speedy punishment was the best

been difficult to mark a road through the nameless deserts the mountains rivers and morasses of Tartary but a curious account has been preserved of the reception of the Roman ambassadors at the royal camp After they had been purified with fire and incense according to a rite still practised under the sons of Zingis they were introduced to the presence of Disabul In a valley of the Golden Mountain they found the great khan in his tent seated in a chair with wheels, to which a horse might be occasionally harnessed As soon as they had delivered their presents, which were received by the proper officers they exposed in a florid oration the wishes of the Roman emperor that victory might attend the arms of the Turks, that their reign might be long and prosperous and that a strict alliance without envy or deceit might for ever be maintained between the two most powerful nations of the earth. The answer of Disabul corresponded with these friendly professions, and the ambassadors were seated by his side at a banquet which lasted the greatest part of the day the tent was surrounded with silk hangings and a Tartar liquor was served on the table which possessed at least the intoxicating qualities of wine The entertainment of the succeeding day was more sumptuous the silk hangings of the second tent were embroidered in various figures and the royal seat the cups and the bases were of gold. A third pavilion was supported by columns of gilt wood a bed of pure and massy gold was raised on four peacocks of the same metal and before the entrance of the tent dishes basins and statues of solid silver and admirable art were ostentatiously piled in waggons the monuments of valour rather than of industry When Disabul led his armies against the frontiers of Persia his Roman allies followed many days the march of the Turkish camp nor were they dismissed till they had enjoyed their precedency over the envoy of the Great King whose loud and intemperate clamours interrupted the silence of the royal banquet The power and ambition of Chosroes cemented the union of the Turks and Romans who touched his dominions on either side but those distant nations regardless of each other, consulted the dictates of interest, without recollecting the obligations of oaths and treaties While the successor of Disabul celebrated his father s obsequies he was saluted by the ambassadors of the emperor Tiberius who proposed an invasion of Persia and sustained with firmness the angry and perhaps the just reproaches of that haughty barbarian You see my ten fingers, said the great khan and he applied them to his mouth ' You Romans speak with as many tongues but they are tongues of deceit and perjury To me you hold one language to my subjects another and the nations are successively deluded by your perfidious eloquence You precipitate your allies into war and danger, you enjoy their labours, and you neglect your benefactors Hasten your return, inform your master that a Turk is incapable of uttering or forgiving falsehood, and that he shall speedily meet the punishment which he deserves While he solicits my friendship with flattering and hollow words he is sunk to a confederate of my fugitive Varchonites. If I condescend to march against those contemptible slaves they will tremble at the sound of our whips they will be trampled, like a nest of ants, under the feet of my innumerable cavalry I am not ignorant of the road which they have followed to invade your empire nor can I be deceived by the vain pretence that Mount Caucasus is the impregnable barrier of the Romans. I know the course of the Dniester, the Danube, and the Hebrus the most warlike nations have yielded to the arms of the Turks and from the rising to the setting sun the earth is my inheritance " Notwithstanding this menace, a sense of mutual advantage soon renewed the alliance of the Turks and Romans but the pride of the great khan survived his resentment and when he announced an important conquest to his friend the emperor Maurice he styled himself the master of the seven races and the lord of the seven climates of the world [37]

Disputes have often arisen between the sovereigns of Asia for the title of king of the world while the contest has proved that it could not belong to either of the competitors The kingdom of the Turks was bounded by the Oxus or Gihon and Touran was separated by that great river from the rival monarchy of Iran or Persia which in a smaller compass contained perhaps a larger measure of power and population The Persians, who alternately invaded and repulsed the Turks and the Romans were still ruled by the house of Sassan which ascended the throne three hundred years before the accession of Justinian His contemporary Cabades or Kobad had been successful in war against the emperor Anastasius but the reign of that prince was distracted by civil and religious troubles A prisoner in the hands of his subjects an exile among the enemies of Persia he recovered his liberty by prostituting the honour of his wife and regained his kingdom with the dangerous and obliterated and the intrinsic merit of the fables of Pilpay is far inferior to the concise elegance of Phædrus and the native graces of La Fontaine Fifteen moral and political sentences are illustrated in a series of apologues but the composition is intricate the narrative prolix, and the precept obvious and barren. Yet the Brahman may assume the merit of inventing a pleasing fiction which adorns the nakedness of truth, and alleviates, perhaps to a royal ear the harshness of instruction With a similar design to admonish kings that they are strong only in the strength of their subjects, the same Indians invented the game of chess, which was likewise introduced into Persia under the reign of Nushirvan.[56]

The son of Kobad found his kingdom involved in a war with the successor of Constantine and the anxiety of his domestic situation inclined him to grant the suspension of arms which Justinian was impatient to purchase Chosroes saw the Roman ambassadors at his feet. He accepted eleven thousand pounds of gold as the price of an endless or indefinite peace [57] some mutual exchanges were regulated the Persian assumed the guard of the gates of Caucasus, and the demolition of Dara was suspended on the condition that it should never be made the residence of the general of the East. This interval of repose had been solicited and was diligently improved by the ambition of the emperor his African conquests were the first fruits of the Persian treaty and the avarice of Chosroes was soothed by a large portion of the spoils of Carthage which his ambassadors required in a tone of pleasantry and under the colour of friendship [58] But the trophies of Belisarius disturbed the slumbers of the Great King and he heard with astonishment, envy and fear that Sicily Italy and Rome itself had been reduced in three rapid campaigns to the obedience of Justinian Unpractised in the art of violating treaties, he secretly excited his bold and subtle vassal Almondar That prince of the Saracens who resided at Hira [59] had not been included in the general peace and still waged an obscure war against his rival Arethas, the chief of the tribe of Gassan and confederate of the empire. The subject of this dispute was an extensive sheep-walk in the desert to the south of Palmyra An immemorial tribute for the licence of pasture appeared to attest the rights of Almondar while the Gassanite appealed to the Latin name of strata, a paved road, as an unquestionable evidence of the sovereignty and labours of the Romans [60] The two monarchs supported the cause of their respective vassals and the Persian Arab without expecting the event of a slow and doubtful arbitration enriched his flying camp with the spoil and captives of Syria. Instead of repelling the arms Justinian attempted to seduce the fidelity of Almondar while he called from the extremities of the earth the nations of Æthiopia and Scythia to invade the dominions of his rival But the aid of such allies was distant and precarious and the discovery of this hostile correspondence justified the complaints of the Goths and Armenians who implored, almost at the same time, the protection of Chosroes The descendants of Arsaces, who were still numerous in Armenia, had been provoked to assert the last relics of national freedom and hereditary rank and the ambassadors of Vitiges had secretly traversed the empire to expose the instant, and almost inevitable danger of the kingdom of Italy Their representations were uniform, weighty and effectual We stand before your throne the advocates of your interest as well as of our own The ambitious and faithless Justinian aspires to be the sole master of the world. Since the endless peace which betrayed the common freedom of mankind that prince your ally in words, your enemy in actions, has alike insulted his friends and foes, and has filled the earth with blood and confusion Has he not violated the privileges of Armenia the independence of Colchis and the wild liberty of the Tzanian mountains? Has he not usurped, with equal avidity the city of Bosphorus on the frozen Mæotis and the vale of palm trees on the shores of the Red Sea? The Moors the Vandals the Goths have been successively oppressed and each nation has calmly remained the spectator of their neighbour's ruin Embrace O king! the favourable moment the East is left without defence while the armies of Justinian and his renowned general are detained in the distant regions of the West If you hesitate and delay Belisarius and his victorious troops will soon return from the Tiber to the Tigris and Persia may enjoy the wretched consolation of being the last devoured [61] By such arguments Chosroes was easily persuaded to imitate the example which he condemned but the Persian, ambitious of military fame disdained the inactive warfare of a rival who issued his sanguinary commands from the secure station of the Byzantine palace.

Whatever might be the provocations of Chosroes, he abused the confidence of treaties and the just reproaches of dissimulation and falsehood could only be concealed by the lustre of his victories [62] The Persian army which had

security of their virtue Their behaviour was in spected by a thousand eyes, their words were overheard by a thousand ears, the secret or public agents of the throne and the provinces from the Indian to the Arabian confines were enlightened by the frequent visits of a sovereign who affected to emulate his celestial brother in his rapid and salutary career Education and agriculture he viewed as the two objects most deserving of his care In every city of Persia orphans and the children of the poor were maintained and instructed at the public expense, the daughters were given in marriage to the richest citizens of their own rank and the sons, according to their different talents were employed in mechanic trades or promoted to more honourable service The deserted villages were relieved by his bounty, to the peasants and farmers who were found incapable of cultivating their lands he distributed cattle seed and the instruments of husbandry and the rare and inestimable treasure of fresh water was parsimoniously managed and skilfully dispersed over the arid territory of Persia [44] The prosperity of that kingdom was the effect and the evidence of his virtues, his vices are those of Oriental despotism, but in the long competition between Chosroes and Justinian the advantage both of merit and fortune is almost always on the side of the barbarian [45]

To the praise of justice Nushirvan united the reputation of knowledge and the seven Greek philosophers who visited his court were invited and deceived by the strange assurance that a disciple of Plato was seated on the Persian throne Did they expect that a prince, strenuously exercised in the toils of war and government should agitate with dexterity like their own the abstruse and profound questions which amused the leisure of the schools of Athens? Could they hope that the precepts of philosophy should direct the life and control the passions of a despot whose infancy had been taught to consider his absolute and fluctuating will as the only rule of moral obligation? [46] The studies of Chosroes were ostentatious and superficial but his example awakened the curiosity of an ingenious people, and the light of science was diffused over the dominions of Persia [47] At Gondi Sapor in the neighbourhood of the royal city of Susa an academy of physic was founded which insensibly became a liberal school of poetry, philosophy, and rhetoric. [48] The annals of the monarchy [49] were composed and while recent and authentic history might afford some useful lessons both to the prince and people the darkness of the first ages was embellished by t giants the dragons and the fabulous heroes Oriental romance [50] Every learned or confide stranger was enriched by the bounty and fl tered by the conversation of the monarch nobly rewarded a Greek physician [51] by the de liverance of three thousand captives, and the sophists who contended for his favour were ex asperated by the wealth and insolence of Ura nius, their more successful rival Nushirvan be lieved or at least respected the religion of the Magi and some traces of persecution may be discovered in his reign [52] Yet he allowed him self freely to compare the tenets of the various sects and the theological disputes in which he frequently presided diminished the authority of the priest and enlightened the minds of the people At his command the most celebrated writers of Greece and India were translated in to the Persian language—a smooth and elegant idiom recommended by Mahomet to the use of paradise, though it is branded with the epithets of savage and unmusical by the ignorance and presumption of Agathias [53] Yet the Greek historian might reasonably wonder that it should be found possible to execute an entire version of Plato and Aristotle in a foreign dialect which had not been framed to express the spirit of freedom and the subtleties of philosophic disquisition And if the reason of the Stagyrite might be equally dark or equally intelligible in every tongue the dramatic art and verbal argumentation of the disciple of Socrates [54] appear to be indissolubly mingled with the grace and perfection of his Attic style In the search of universal knowledge, Nushirvan was informed that the moral and political fables of Pilpay, an ancient Brahman were preserved with jealous reverence among the treasures of the kings of India The physician Perozes was secretly despatched to the banks of the Ganges with instructions to procure at any price the communication of this valuable work His dexterity obtained a transcript, his learned diligence accomplished the translation and the fables of Pilpay [55] were read and admired in the assembly of Nushirvan and his nobles The Indian original and the Pers an copy have long since disappeared but this venerable monument has been saved by the curiosity of the Arabian caliphs revived in the modern Persic the Turkish, the Syriac the Hebrew and the Greek idioms, and transfused through successive versions into the modern languages of Europe In their present form the peculiar character, the manners and religion of the Hindoos are completely

These hopes might have been realised if the conqueror of Italy had not been seasonably recalled to the defence of the East[43] While Chosroes pursued his ambitious designs on the coast of the Euxine Belisarius, at the head of an army without pay or discipline encamped beyond the Euphrates within six miles of Nisibis. He meditated by a skilful operation to draw the Persians from their impregnable citadel and improving his advantage in the field either to intercept their retreat, or perhaps to enter the gates with the flying barbarians He advanced one day's journey on the territories of Persia reduced the fortress of Sisaurane and sent the governor with eight hundred chosen horsemen to serve the emperor in his Italian wars He detached Arethas and his Arabs supported by twelve hundred Romans to pass the Tigris and to ravage the harvests of Assyria a fruitful province long exempt from the calamities of war But the plans of Belisarius were disconcerted by the untractable spirit of Arethas who neither returned to the camp nor sent any intelligence of his motions The Roman general was fixed in anxious expectation to the same spot the time of action elapsed the ardent sun of Mesopotamia inflamed with fevers the blood of his European soldiers and the stationary troops and officers of Syria affected to tremble for the safety of their defenceless cities Yet this diversion had already succeeded in forcing Chosroes to return with loss and precipitation and if the skill of Belisarius had been seconded by discipline and valour his success might have satisfied the sanguine wishes of the public, who required at his hands the conquest of Ctesiphon and the deliverance of the captives of Antioch At the end of the campaign he was recalled to Constantinople by an ungrateful court, but the dangers of the ensuing spring restored his confidence and command and the hero almost alone was despatched with the speed of post-horses to repel by his name and presence the invasion of Syria He found the Roman generals among whom was a nephew of Justinian, imprisoned by their fears in the fortifications of Hierapolis. But instead of listening to their timid counsels Belisarius commanded them to follow him to Europus where he had resolved to collect his forces, and to execute whatever God should inspire him to achieve against the enemy His first attitude on the banks of the Euphrates restrained Chosroes from advancing towards Palestine and he received with art and dignity the ambassadors or rather spies, of the Persian monarch The plain between Hierapolis and the river was covered with the squadrons of cavalry six thousand hunters, tall and robust who pursued their game without the apprehension of an enemy On the opposite bank the ambassadors descried a thousand Armenian horse who appeared to guard the passage of the Euphrates The tent of Belisarius was of the coarsest linen the simple equipage of a warrior who disdained the luxury of the East. Around his tent the nations who marched under his standard were arranged with skilful confusion The Thracians and Illyrians were posted in the front the Heruli and Goths in the centre the prospect was closed by the Moors and Vandals and their loose array seemed to multiply their numbers Their dress was light and active one soldier carried a whip another a sword a third a bow a fourth perhaps a battle-axe and the whole picture exhibited the intrepidity of the troops and the vigilance of the general Chosroes was deluded by the address and awed by the genius of the lieutenant of Justinian Conscious of the merit and ignorant of the force of his antagonist he dreaded a decisive battle in a distant country from whence not a Persian might return to relate the melancholy tale The Great King hastened to repass the Euphrates and Belisarius pressed his retreat by affecting to oppose a measure so salutary to the empire and which could scarcely have been prevented by an army of a hundred thousand men Envy might suggest to ignorance and pride that the public enemy had been suffered to escape but the African and Gothic triumphs are less glorious than this safe and bloodless victory in which neither fortune nor the valour of the soldiers can subtract any part of the general's renown The second removal of Belisarius from the Persian to the Italian war revealed the ex

been assembled in the plains of Babylon pru dently declined the strong cities of Mesopotamia and followed the western bank of the Euphrates till the small though populous town of Dura presumed to arrest the progress of the Great King The gates of Dura, by treachery and surprise were burst open and as soon as Chosroes had stained his scimitar with the blood of the inhabitants he dismissed the am bassador of Justinian to inform his master in what place he had left the enemy of the Romans The conqueror still affected the praise of humanity and justice and as he beheld a noble matron with her infant rudely dragged along the ground he sighed, he wept, and implored the divine justice to punish the author of these calamities Yet the herd of twelve thousand captives was ransomed for two hundred pounds of gold the neighbouring bishop of Sergiopolis pledged his faith for the payment and in the subsequent year the unfeeling avarice of Chos roes exacted the penalty of an obligation which it was generous to contract and impossible to discharge He advanced into the heart of Syria, but a feeble enemy, who vanished at his ap proach disappointed him of the honour of vic tory and as he could not hope to establish his dominion the Persian king displayed in this in road the mean and rapacious vices of a robber Hierapolis Berrhœa or Aleppo Apamea and Chalcis were successively besieged they re deemed their safety by a ransom of gold or sil ver proportioned to their respective strength and opulence and their new master enforced without observing the terms of capitulation Educated in the religion of the Magi he exer cised without remorse the lucrative trade of sacrilege and after stripping of its gold and gems a piece of the true cross he generously re stored the naked relic to the devotion of the Christians of Apamea No more than fourteen years had elapsed since Antioch was ruined by an earthquake but the queen of the East the new Theopolis had been raised from the ground by the liberality of Justinian and the increasing greatness of the buildings and the people al ready erased the memory of this recent disaster On one side the city was defended by the moun tain on the other by the river Orontes but the most accessible part was commanded by a su perior eminence the proper remedies were re jected from the despicable fear of discovering its weakness to the enemy, and Germanus the emperor s nephew refused to trust his person and dignity within the walls of a besieged city The people of Antioch had inherited the vain and satirical genius of their ancestors they were elated by a sudden reinforcement of six thou sand soldiers they disdained the offers of an easy capitulation and their intemperate clam ours insulted from the ramparts the majesty of the Great King Under his eye the Persian myr iads mounted with scaling ladders to the as sault the Roman mercenaries fled through the opposite gate of Daphne and the generous as sistance of the youth of Antioch served only to aggravate the miseries of their country As Chosroes, attended by the ambassadors of Justinian, was descending from the mountain, he affected in a plaintive voice to deplore the ob stinacy and ruin of that unhappy people but the slaughter still raged with unrelenting fury and the city at the command of a barbarian was delivered to the flames The cathedral of Antioch was indeed preserved by the avarice, not the piety of the conqueror a more honour able exemption was granted to the church of St Julian and the quarter of the town where the ambassadors resided some distant streets were saved by the shifting of the wind and the walls still subsisted to protect and soon to betray their new inhabitants Fanaticism had defaced the ornaments of Daphne but Chosroes breath ed a purer air amidst her groves and fountains, and some idolaters in his train might sacrifice with impunity to the nymphs of that elegant re treat Eighteen miles below Antioch the river Orontes falls into the Mediterranean The haughty Persian visited the term of his con quests and after bathing alone in the sea he offered a solemn sacrifice of thanksgiving to the sun or rather to the Creator of the sun whom the Magi adored If this act of superstition of fended the prejudices of the Syrians they were pleased by the courteous and even eager atten tion with which he assisted at the games of the circus and as Chosroes had heard that the blue faction was espoused by the emperor his per emptory command secured the victory of the green charioteer From the discipline of his camp the people derived more solid consolation and they interceded in vain for the life of a soldier who had too faithfully copied the rapine of the just Nushirvan At length fatigued though un satiated with the spoil of Syria he slowly moved to the Euphrates formed a temporary bridge in the neighbourhood of Barbalissus and defined the space of three days for the entire passage of his numerous host After his return he founded, at the distance of one day s journey from the palace of Ctesiphon a new city which perpet uated the joint names of Chosroes and of An

ty languages were spoken in the market of Dioscurias,[71] they were the imperfect idioms of so many savage tribes or families sequestered from each other in the valleys of Mount Caucasus and their separation which diminished the importance must have multiplied the number of their rustic capitals. In the present state of Mingrelia a village is an assemblage of huts within a wooden fence the fortresses are seated in the depth of forests the princely town of Cyta or Cotatis, consists of two hundred houses and a stone edifice appertains only to the magnificence of kings Twelve ships from Constantinople and about sixty barks laden with the fruits of industry annually cast anchor on the coast and the list of Colchian exports is much increased, since the natives had only slaves and hides to offer in exchange for the corn and salt which they purchased from the subjects of Justinian Not a vestige can be found of the art the knowledge or the navigation of the ancient Colchians few Greeks desired or dared to pursue the footsteps of the Argonauts and even the marks of an Egyptian colony are lost on a nearer approach. The rite of circumcision is practised only by the Mahometans of the Euxine and the curled hair and swarthy complexion of Africa no longer disfigure the most perfect of the human race It is in the adjacent climates of Georgia Mingrelia and Circassia that nature has placed at least to our eyes, the model of beauty in the shape of the limbs, the colour of the skin the symmetry of the features, and the expression of the countenance.[72] According to the destination of the two sexes the men seem formed for action, the women for love and the perpetual supply of females from Mount Caucasus has purified the blood and improved the breed of the southern nations of Asia. The proper district of Mingrelia a portion only of the ancient Colchis, has long sustained an exportation of twelve thousand slaves. The number of prisoners or criminals would be inadequate to the annual demand but the common people are in a state of servitude to their lords the exercise of fraud or rapine is unpunished in a lawless community and the market is continually replenished by the abuse of civil and paternal authority Such a trade[73] which reduces the human species to the level of cattle, may tend to encourage marriage and population, since the multitude of children enriches their sordid and inhuman parent. But this source of impure wealth must inevitably poison the national manners obliterate the sense of honour and virtue, and almost extinguish the instincts of nature the Christians of Georgia and Mingrelia are the most dissolute of mankind and their children who in a tender age are sold into foreign slavery have already learned to imitate the rapine of the father and the prostitution of the mother Yet amidst the rudest ignorance, the untaught natives discover a singular dexterity both of mind and hand and although the want of union and discipline exposes them to their more powerful neighbours a bold and intrepid spirit has animated the Colchians of every age. In the host of Xerxes they served on foot and their arms were a dagger or a javelin a wooden casque and a buckler of raw hides. But in their own country the use of cavalry has more generally prevailed the meanest of the peasants disdain to walk the martial nobles are possessed perhaps, of two hundred horses and above five thousand are numbered in the train of the prince of Mingrelia The Colchian government has been always a pure and hereditary kingdom and the authority of the sovereign is only restrained by the turbulence of his subjects. Whenever they were obedient he could lead a numerous army into the field but some faith is requisite to believe that the single tribe of the Suanians was composed of two hundred thousand soldiers, or that the population of Mingrelia now amounts to four millions of inhabitants.[75]

It was the boast of the Colchians that their ancestors had checked the victories of Sesostris and the defeat of the Egyptian is less incredible than his successful progress as far as the foot of Mount Caucasus They sunk without any memorable effort under the arms of Cyrus followed in distant wars the standard of the Great King and presented him every fifth year with one hundred boys and as many virgins the fairest produce of the land.[76] Yet he accepted this gift like the gold and ebony of India the frankincense of the Arabs, or the negroes and ivory of Æthiopia the Colchians were not subject to the dominion of a satrap and they continued to enjoy the name as well as substance of national independence[77] After the fall of the Persian empire Mithridates king of Pontus added Colchis to the wide circle of his dominions on the Euxine and when the natives presumed to request that his son might reign over them, he bound the ambitious youth in chains of gold and delegated a servant in his place In pursuit of Mithridates the Romans advanced to the banks of the Phasis and their galleys ascended the river till they reached the camp of Pompey and his legions[78] But the senate and afterwards tent of his personal merit, which had corrected or supplied the want of discipline and courage Fifteen generals without concert or skill led through the mountains of Armenia an army of thirty thousand Romans inattentive to their signals their ranks and their ensigns Four thousand Persians, entrenched in the camp of Dubis, vanquished, almost without a combat, this disorderly multitude, their useless arms were scattered along the road and their horses sunk under the fatigue of their rapid flight But the Arabs of the Roman party prevailed over their brethren the Armenians returned to their allegiance the cities of Dara and Edessa resisted a sudden assault and a regular siege and the calamities of war were suspended by those of pestilence A tacit or formal agreement between the two sovereigns protected the tranquillity of the Eastern frontier and the arms of Chosroes were confined to the Colchian or Lazic war, which has been too minutely described by the historians of the times [64]

The extreme length of the Euxine Sea [65] from Constantinople to the mouth of the Phasis may be computed as a voyage of nine days and a measure of seven hundred miles From the Iberian Caucasus, the most lofty and craggy mountains of Asia that river descends with such oblique vehemence that in a short space it is traversed by one hundred and twenty bridges Nor does the stream become placid and navigable till it reaches the town of Sarapana, five days journey from the Cyrus which flows from the same hills but in a contrary direction to the Caspian lake The proximity of these rivers has suggested the practice or at least the idea, of wafting the precious merchandise of India down the Oxus, over the Caspian up the Cyrus and with the current of the Phasis into the Euxine and Mediterranean seas As it successively collects the streams of the plain of Colchis the Phasis moves with diminished speed though accumulated weight At the mouth it is sixty fathoms deep and half a league broad, but a small woody island is interposed in the midst of the channel the water, so soon as it has deposited an earthy or metallic sediment floats on the surface of the waves and is no longer susceptible of corruption In a course of one hundred miles, forty of which are navigable for large vessels, the Phasis divides the celebrated region of Colchis [66] or Mingrelia [67] which on three sides, is fortified by the Iberian and Armenian mountains, and whose maritime coast extends about two hundred miles from the neighbourhood of Trebizond to Dioscurias and the confines of Circassia Both the soil and climate are relaxed by excessive moisture twenty-eight rivers besides the Phasis and his dependent streams convey their waters to the sea, and the hollowness of the ground appears to indicate the subterraneous channels between the Euxine and the Caspian In the fields where wheat or barley is sown the earth is too soft to sustain the action of the plough but the gom, a small grain not unlike the millet or coriander seed supplies the ordinary food of the people and the use of bread is confined to the prince and his nobles Yet the vintage is more plentiful than the harvest and the bulk of the stems as well as the quality of the wine, display the unassisted powers of nature The same powers continually tend to overshadow the face of the country with thick forests the timber of the hills and the flax of the plains contribute to the abundance of naval stores, the wild and tame animals the horse, the ox, and the hog are remarkably prolific and the name of the pheasant is expressive of his native habitation on the banks of the Phasis The gold mines to the south of Trebizond, which are still worked with sufficient profit, were a subject of national dispute between Justinian and Chosroes, and it is not unreasonable to believe that a vein of precious metal may be equally diffused through the circle of the hills, although these secret treasures are neglected by the laziness or concealed by the prudence of the Mingrelians The waters, impregnated with particles of gold are carefully strained through sheepskins or fleeces but this expedient the groundwork perhaps of a marvellous fable affords a faint image of the wealth extracted from a virgin earth by the power and industry of ancient kings Their silver palaces and golden chambers surpass our belief, but the fame of their riches is said to have excited the enterprising avarice of the Argonauts [68] Tradition has affirmed, with some colour of reason that Egypt planted on the Phasis a learned and polite colony [69] which manufactured linen built navies and invented geographical maps The ingenuity of the moderns has peopled with flourishing cities and nations the isthmus between the Euxine and the Caspian [70] and a lively writer observing the resemblance of climate, and in his apprehension of trade has not hesitated to pronounce Colchis the Holland of antiquity [71]

But the riches of Colchis shine only through the darkness of conjecture or tradition and its genuine history presents a uniform scene of rudeness and poverty If one hundred and thir

corn was effectually removed by the loss of those valuable commodities The authority of a Roman legislator was succeeded by the pride of an ιental despot, who beheld with equal disdain e slaves whom he had exalted and the kings hom he had humbled before the foot tool of s throne. The adoration of fire was introduced to Colchis by the zeal of the Magi their in lerant spirit provoked the fervour of a Chris an peop e and the prejudice of nature or edu ιtion was wounded by the impious practice of ιposing the dead bodies of their parents on the ιmmit of a lofty tower to the crows and vul ιres of the air [53] Conscious of the increasing atred wh h retarded the execution of his great esigns the just Nushirvan had secretly given rders to assassinate the king of the Lazi to ransplant the people into some distant land nd to fix a faithful and warlike colony on the ιanks of th Phasis The watchful jealousy of the Colchians foresaw and averted the approach ng ruin. Their repentance was accepted at Constantinople by the prudence rather than the clemency of Justinian and he commanded Dagisteus, with seven thousand Romans and one thousand of the Zani, to expel th Pers ans from the coast of the Euxine.

The siege of Petra, which the Roman general with the aid of the Lazi immediately under took, is one of the most remarkable actions of the age The city was seated on a craggy rock, which hung over the sea and communicated by a steep and narrow path with the land Since the approach was difficult the attack might be deemed impossible the Persian conqueror had strengthened the fortifications of Justinian, and the places least inaccessible were covered by additional bulwarks In this important fortress the vigilance of Chosroes had deposited a maga zine of offensive and defensive arms sufficient for five times the number not only of the garri son, but of the besiegers themselves. The stock of flour and salt provisions was adequate to the consumption of five years the want of wine was supplied by vinegar and a grain from whence a strong liquor was extracted and a triple aque duct eluded the diligence and even the suspi cions of the enemy But the firmest defence of Petra was placed in the valour of fifteen hun dred Persians, who esisted the assaults of the Romans whilst in a softer vein of earth a mine was secretly perforated. The wall, supported by slender and temporary props hung tottering in the air but Dagisteus del yed the attack till he had secured a specific recompense and the town was relieved before the return of his messenger from Constantinople The Persian garrison was reduced to four hundred men of whom no more than fifty were exempt from sickness or wounds yet such had been their inflexible perseverance that they concealed their losses from the enemy by enduring without a murmur the sight and putrefying stench of the dead bodies of their eleven hundred companions. After their d liverance the breaches were hastily stopped with sandbags the mine was replenished with earth, a new wall was erected on a frame of substantial timber and a fresh garrison of three thousand men was stationed at Petra to sustain the labours of a second siege. The operations both of the attack and defence were conducted with skilful obstinacy and each party derived useful lessons from the experience of their past faults. A battering ram was invented of light construction and powerful effect *it was trans*ported and worked by the hands of forty soldiers, and as the stones were loosened by its repeated strokes they were torn with long iron hooks from the wall From those walls a shower of darts was incessantly poured on the heads of the assailants but they were most dangerously annoyed by a fiery composition of sulphur and bitumen which in Colchis might with some propriety be named the oil of Medea Of six thousand Romans who mounted the scaling ladders, their general Besas was first a gallant veteran of seventy years of age the courage of their leader his fall and extreme danger animated the irresistible effort of his troops and their prevailing numbers oppressed the strength without subduing the spirit of the Persian garrison The fate of these valiant men deserves to be more distinctly noticed Seven hundred had perished in the siege two thousand three hundred survived to defend the breach. One thousand and seventy were destroyed with fire and sword in the last assault and if seven hundred and thirty were made prisoners only eighteen among them were found without the marks of honourable wounds The remaining five hundred escaped into the citadel which they maintained without any hopes of relief rejecting the fairest terms of capitulation and service till they were lost in the flames They died in obedience to the com mands of their prince and such examples of loyalty and valour might excite their country men to deeds of equal despair and more prosperous event The instant d molition of the works of Pet a confessed the astonishment and apprehension of the conqueror

the emperors, disdained to reduce that distant and useless conquest into the form of a province. The family of a Greek rhetorician was permitted to reign in Colchis and the adjacent kingdoms from the time of Mark Antony to that of Nero and after the race of Polemo[79] was extinct the eastern Pontus, which preserved his name extended no farther than the neighbourhood of Trebizond Beyond these limits the fortifications of Hyssus of Apsarus, of the Phasis of Dioscurias or Sebastopolis, and of Pityus were guarded by sufficient detachments of horse and foot and six princes of Colchis received their diadems from the lieutenants of Cæsar One of these lieutenants the eloquent and philosophic Arrian surveyed and has described the Euxine coast under the reign of Hadrian The garrison which he reviewed at the mouth of the Phasis consisted of four hundred chosen legionaries the brick walls and towers, the double ditch and the military engines on the rampart, rendered this place inaccessible to the barbarians but the new suburbs which had been built by the merchants and veterans required in the opinion of Arrian some external defence [80] As the strength of the empire was gradually impaired, the Romans stationed on the Phasis were either withdrawn or expelled, and the tribe of the Lazi [81] whose posterity speak a foreign dialect and inhabit the sea-coast of Trezibond imposed their name and dominion on the ancient kingdom of Colchis Their independence was soon invaded by a formidable neighbour who had acquired by arms and treaties the sovereignty of Iberia The dependent king of Lazica received his sceptre at the hands of the Persian monarch and the successors of Constantine acquiesced in this injurious claim which was proudly urged as a right of immemorial prescription In the beginning of the sixth century their influence was restored by the introduction of Christianity, which the Mingrelians still profess with becoming zeal without understanding the doctrines or observing the precepts of their religion After the decease of his father Zathus was exalted to the regal dignity by the favour of the Great King but the pious youth abhorred the ceremonies of the Magi and sought in the palace of Constantinople an orthodox baptism a noble wife, and the alliance of the emperor Justin The king of Lazica was solemnly invested with the diadem, and his cloak and tunic of white silk with a gold border, displayed in rich embroidery the figure of his new patron who soothed the jealousy of the Persian court and excused the revolt of Colchis by the venerable names of hospitality and religion The common interest of both empires imposed on the Colchians the duty of guarding the passes of Mount Caucasus, where a wall of sixty miles is now defended by the monthly service of the musketeers of Mingrelia [82]

But this honourable connection was soon corrupted by the avarice and ambition of the Romans Degraded from the rank of allies, the Lazi were incessantly reminded by words and actions of their dependent state. At the distance of a day's journey beyond the Apsarus they beheld the rising fortress of Petra [83] which commanded the maritime country to the south of the Phasis Instead of being protected by the valour Colchis was insulted by the licentiousness of foreign mercenaries the benefits of commerce were converted into base and vexatious monopoly and Gubazes the native prince, was reduced to a pageant of royalty by the superior influence of the officers of Justinian Disappointed in their expectations of Christian virtue, the indignant Lazi reposed some confidence in the justice of an unbeliever After a private assurance that their ambassadors should not be delivered to the Romans they publicly solicited the friendship and aid of Chosroes The sagacious monarch instantly discerned the use and importance of Colchis and meditated a plan of conquest which was renewed at the end of a thousand years by Shah Abbas, the wisest and most powerful of his successors [84] His ambition was fired by the hope of launching a Persian navy from the Phasis of commanding the trade and navigation of the Euxine Sea of desolating the coast of Pontus and Bithynia of distressing perhaps of attacking Constantinople and of persuading the barbarians of Europe to second his arms and counsels against the common enemy of mankind Under the pretence of a Scythian war he silently led his troops to the frontiers of Iberia the Colchian guides were prepared to conduct them through the woods and along the precipices of Mount Caucasus and a narrow path was laboriously formed into a safe and spacious highway for the march of cavalry, and even of elephants Gubazes laid his person and diadem at the feet of the king of Persia his Colchians imitated the submission of their prince and after the walls of Petra had been shaken the Roman garrison prevented by a capitulation the impending fury of the last assault But the Lazi soon discovered that their impatience had urged them to choose an evil more intolerable than the calamities which they strove to escape The monopoly of salt and own ambassadors at the Imperial court The successor of Cyrus assumed the majesty of the eastern sun and graciously permitted his younger brother Justinian to reign over the West with the pale and reflected splendour of the moon This gigantic style was supported by the pomp and eloquence of Isdigune one of the royal chamberlains His wife and daughters with a train of eunuchs and camels attended the march of the ambassador two satraps with golden diadems were numbered among his followers he was guarded by five hundred horse, the most valiant of the Persians and the Roman governor of Dara wisely refused to admit more than twenty of this martial and hostile caravan. When Isdigune had saluted the emperor and delivered his presents, he passed ten months at Constantinople without discussing any serious affairs Instead of being confined in his palace, and receiving food and water from the hands of his keepers the Persian ambassador without spies or guards was allowed to visit the capital and the freedom of conversation and trade enjoyed by his domestics offended the prejudices of an age which rigorously practised the law of nations without confidence or courtesy [88] By an unexampled indulgence his interpreter a servant below the notice of a Roman magistrate was seated at the table of Justinian by the side of his master and one thousand pounds of gold might be assigned for the expense of his journey and entertainment Yet the repeated labours of Isdigune could procure only a partial and imperfect truce which was always purchased with the treasures and renewed at the solicitation of the Byzantine court Many years of fruitless desolation elapsed before Justinian and Chosroes were compelled by mutual lassitude to consult the repose of their declining age At a conference held on the frontier each party without expecting to gain credit, displayed the power the justice and the pacific intentions of their respective sovereigns but necessity and interest dictated the treaty of peace which was concluded for a term of fifty years, diligently composed in the Greek and Persian languages and attested by the seals of twelve interpreters The liberty of commerce and religion was fixed and defined the allies of the emperor and the Great King were included in the same benefits and obligations and the most scrupulous precautions were provided to prevent or determine the accidental disputes that might arise on the confines of two hostile nations After twenty years of destructive though feeble war the limits still remained without alteration, and Chosroes was persuaded to renounce his dangerous claim to the possession or sovereignty of Colchis and its dependent states Rich in the accumulated treasures of the East he extorted from the Romans an annual payment of thirty thousand pieces of gold and the smallness of the sum revealed the disgrace of a tribute in its naked deformity In a previous debate the chariot of Sesostris and the wheel of fortune were applied by one of the Ministers of Justinian who observed that the reduction of Antioch and some Syrian cities had elevated beyond measure the vain and ambitious spirit of the barbarian. "You are mistaken" replied the modest Persian "the king of kings the lord of mankind looks down with contempt on such petty acquisitions and of the ten nations vanquished by his invincible arms he esteems the Romans as the least formidable" [89] According to the Orientals the empire of Nushirvan extended from Ferganah, in Transoxiana, to Yemen or Arabia Felix He subdued the rebels of Hyrcania reduced the provinces of Cabul and Zablestan on the banks of the Indus broke the power of the Euthalites, terminated by an honourable treaty the Turkish war and admitted the daughter of the great Khan into the number of his lawful wives Victorious and respected among the princes of Asia he gave audience in his palace of Madain or Ctesiphon to the ambassadors of the world. Their gifts or tributes arms rich garments, gems slaves or aromatics were humbly presented at the foot of his throne and he condescended to accept from the king of India ten quintals of the wood of aloes a maid seven cubits in height and a carpet softer than silk the skin as it was reported of an extraordinary serpent [90]

Justinian had been reproached for his alliance with the Æthiopians as if he attempted to introduce a people of savage negroes into the system of civilised society But the friends of the Roman empire the Axumites or Abyssinians may be always distinguished from the original natives of Africa.[91] The hand of nature has flattened the noses of the negroes, covered their heads with shaggy wool and tinged their skin with inherent and indelible blackness But the olive complexion of the Abyssinians their hair shape and features distinctly mark them as a colony of Arabs and this descent is confirmed by the resemblance of language and manners the report of an ancient emigration and the narrow interval between the shores of the Red Sea Christianity had raised that nation above the level of African barbarism [92] their inter warfare and alternate success of the Roman and Persian arms cannot detain the attention of posterity at the foot of Mount Caucasus The advantages obtained by the troops of Justinian were more frequent and splendid but the forces of the Great King were continually supplied till they amounted to eight elephants and seventy thousand men including twelve thousand Scythian allies and above three thousand Dilemites who descended by their free choice from the hills of Hyrcania and were equally formidable in close or distant combat The siege of Archæopolis, a name imposed or corrupted by the Greeks was raised with some loss and precipitation but the Persians occupied the passes of Iberia Colchis was enslaved by their forts and garrisons they devoured the scanty sustenance of the people and the prince of the Lazi fled into the mountains In the Roman camp faith and discipline were unknown, and the independent leaders who were invested with equal power, disputed with each other the preeminence of vice and corruption The Persians followed without a murmur the commands of a single chief who implicitly obeyed the instructions of their supreme lord Their general was distinguished among the heroes of the East by his wisdom in council and his valour in the field The advanced age of Mermeroes and the lameness of both his feet could not diminish the activity of his mind or even of his body and whilst he was carried in a litter in the front of battle he inspired terror to the enemy and a just confidence to the troops who under his banners were always successful After his death the command devolved to Nacoragan a proud satrap who in a conference with the Imperial chiefs had presumed to declare that he disposed of victory as absolutely as of the ring on his finger Such presumption was the natural cause and forerunner of a shameful defeat The Romans had been gradually repulsed to the edge of the sea shore and their last camp on the ruins of the Grecian colony of Phasis was defended on all sides by strong entrenchments the river and Euxine, and a fleet of galleys Despair united their counsels and invigorated their arms they withstood the assault of the Persians and the flight of Nacoragan preceded or followed the slaughter of ten thousand of his bravest soldiers He escaped from the Romans to fall into the hands of an unforgiving master who severely chastised the error of his own choice the unfortunate general was flayed alive and his skin stuffed into the human form was exposed on a mountain—a dreadful warning to those who might hereafter be intrusted with the fame and fortune of Persia [86] Yet the prudence of Chosroes insensibly relinquished the prosecution of the Colchian war in the just persuasion that it is impossible to reduce, or at least to hold a distant country against the wishes and efforts of its inhabitants The fidelity of Gubazes sustained the most rigorous trials He patiently endured the hardships of a savage life, and rejected with disdain the specious temptations of the Persian court The king of the Lazi had been educated in the Christian religion his mother was the daughter of a senator during his youth he had served ten years a silentiary of the Byzantine palace [87] and the arrears of an unpaid salary were a motive of attachment as well as of complaint But the long continuance of his sufferings extorted from him a naked representation of the truth and truth was an unpardonable libel on the lieutenants of Justinian who amidst the delays of a ruinous war had spared his enemies and trampled on his allies Their malicious information persuaded the emperor that his faithless vassal already meditated a second defection an order was surprised to send him prisoner to Constantinople a treacherous clause was inserted that he might be lawfully killed in case of resistance and Gubazes without arms or suspicion of danger was stabbed in the security of a friendly interview In the first moments of rage and despair the Colchians would have sacrificed their country and religion to the gratification of revenge But the authority and eloquence of the wiser few obtained a salutary pause the victory of the Phasis restored the terror of the Roman arms and the emperor was solicitous to absolve his own name from the imputation of so foul a murder A judge of senatorial rank was commissioned to inquire into the conduct and death of the king of the Lazi He ascended a stately tribunal encompassed by the ministers of justice and punishment in the presence of both nations this extraordinary cause was pleaded according to the forms of civil jurisprudence, and some satisfaction was granted to an injured people by the sentence and execution of the meaner criminals [88]

In peace the king of Persia continually sought the pretences of a rupture but no sooner had he taken up arms than he expressed his desire of a safe and honourable treaty During the fiercest hostilities the two monarchs entertained a deceitful negotiation and such was the superiority of Chosroes that whilst he treated the Roman ministers with insolence and contempt he obtained the most unprecedented honours for

CHAPTER XLIII

Rebellions of Africa Restoration of the Gothic Kingdom by Totila Loss and Recovery of Rome Final Conquest of Italy by Narses Extinction of the Ostrogoths Defeat of the Franks and Alemanni Last Victory, Disgrace, and Death of Belisarius Death and Character of Justinian Comet, Earthquakes, and Plague

THE review of the nations from the Danube to the Nile has exposed on every side the weakness of the Romans and our wonder is reasonably excited that they should presume to enlarge an empire whose ancient limits they were incapable of defending But the wars, the conquests and the triumphs of Justinian are the feeble and pernicious efforts of old age which exhaust the remains of strength and accelerate the decay of the powers of life He exulted in the glorious act of restoring Africa and Italy to the republic but the calamities which followed the departure of Belisarius betrayed the impotence of the conqueror and accomplished the ruin of those unfortunate countries

From his new acquisitions Justinian expected that his avarice as well as his pride, should be richly gratified A rapacious minister of the finances closely pursued the footsteps of Belisarius and as the old registers of tribute had been burnt by the Vandals, he indulged his fancy in a liberal calculation and arbitrary assessment of the wealth of Africa [1] The increase of taxes which were drawn away by a distant sovereign, and a general resumption of the patrimony of crown lands soon dispelled the intoxication of the public joy but the emperor was insensible to the modest complaints of the people till he was awakened and alarmed by the clamours of military discontent Many of the Roman soldiers had married the widows and daughters of the Vandals As their own by the double right of conquest and inheritance they claimed the estates which Genseric had assigned to his victorious troops They heard with disdain the cold and selfish representations of their officers that the liberality of Justinian had raised them from a savage or servile condition that they were already enriched by the spoils of Africa the treasure the slaves and the movables of the vanquished barbarians and that the ancient and lawful patrimony of the emperors would be applied only to the support of that government on which their own safety and reward must ultimately depend The mutiny was secretly inflamed by a thousand soldiers for the most part Heruli who had imbibed the doctrines and were instigated by the clergy of the Arian sect and the cause of perjury and rebellion was sanctified by the dispensing powers of fanaticism. course with Egypt and the successors of Constantine[94] had communicated the rudiments of the arts and sciences their vessels traded to the isle of Ceylon [95] and seven kingdoms obeyed the Negus or supreme prince of Abyssinia The independence of the Homerites who reigned in the rich and happy Arabia was first violated by an Æthiopian conqueror he drew his hereditary claim from the Queen of Sheba [96] and his ambition was sanctified by religious zeal. The Jews powerful and active in exile, had seduced the mind of Dunaan prince of the Homerites They urged him to retaliate the persecution inflicted by the Imperial laws on their unfortunate brethren some Roman merchants were injuriously treated and several Christians of Negra[97] were honoured with the crown of martyrdom [98] The churches of Arabia implored the protection of the Abyssinian monarch The Negus passed the Red Sea with a fleet and army, deprived the Jewish proselyte of his kingdom and life, and extinguished a race of princes who had ruled above two thousand years the sequestered region of myrrh and frankincense The conqueror immediately announced the victory of the Gospel requested an orthodox patriarch and so warmly professed his friendship to the Roman empire that Justinian was flattered by the hope of diverting the silk trade through the channel of Abyssinia and of exciting the forces of Arabia against the Persian king Nonnosus descended from a family of ambassadors was named by the emperor to execute this important commission He wisely declined the shorter but more dangerous road through the sandy deserts of Nubia ascended the Nile embarked on the Red Sea and safely landed at the African port of Adulis From Adulis to the royal city of Axume is no more than fifty leagues in a direct line but the winding passes of the mountains detained the ambassador fifteen days and as he traversed the forests he saw and vaguely computed about five thousand wild elephants. The capital according to his report, was large and populous and the village of Axume is still conspicuous by the regal coronations by the ruins of a Christian temple and by sixteen or seventeen obelisks inscribed with Grecian characters.[99] But the Negus gave audience in the open field seated on a lofty chariot, which was drawn by four elephants superbly caparisoned, and surrounded by his nobles and musicians. He was clad in a linen garment and cap, holding in his hand two javelins and a light shield, and although his nakedness was imperfectly covered, he displayed the barbaric pomp of gold chains collars and bracelets richly adorned with pearls and precious stones The ambassador of Justinian knelt the Negus raised him from the ground, embraced Nonnosus kissed the seal perused the letter, accepted the Roman alliance, and, brandishing his weapons, denounced implacable war against the worshippers of fire But the proposal of the silk trade was eluded and notwithstanding the assurances and perhaps the wishes of the Abyssinians these hostile menaces evaporated without effect The Homerites were unwilling to abandon their aromatic groves, to explore a sandy desert, and to encounter after all their fatigues, a formidable nation from whom they had never received any personal injuries Instead of enlarging his conquests the king of Æthiopia was incapable of defending his possessions Abrahah the slave of a Roman merchant of Adulis assumed the sceptre of the Homerites, the troops of Africa were seduced by the luxury of the climate, and Justinian solicited the friendship of the usurper, who honoured with a slight tribute the supremacy of his prince After a long series of prosperity the power of Abrahah was overthrown before the gates of Mecca his children were despoiled by the Persian conqueror and the Æthiopians were finally expelled from the continent of Asia This narrative of obscure and remote events is not foreign to the decline and fall of the Roman empire If a Christian power had been maintained in Arabia Mahomet must have been crushed in his cradle and Abyssinia would have prevented a revolution which has changed the civil and religious state of the world [100]

Rebellions of Africa. Restoration of the Gothic Kingdom by Totila. Loss and Recovery of Rome. Final Conquest of Italy by Narses. Extinction of the Ostrogoths. Defeat of the Franks and Alemanni. Last Victory, Disgrace, and Death of Belisarius. Death and Character of Justinian. Comet, Earthquakes, and Plague

THE review of the nations from the Danube to the Nile has exposed, on every side, the weakness of the Romans; and our wonder is reasonably excited that they should presume to enlarge an empire whose ancient limits they were incapable of defending. But the wars, the conquests, and the triumphs of Justinian are the feeble and pernicious efforts of old age, which exhaust the remains of strength and accelerate the decay of the powers of life. He exulted in the glorious act of restoring Africa and Italy to the republic; but the calamities which followed the departure of Belisarius betrayed the impotence of the conqueror, and accomplished the ruin of those unfortunate countries.

From his new acquisitions Justinian expected that his avarice as well as his pride should be richly gratified. A rapacious minister of the finances closely pursued the footsteps of Belisarius; and, as the old registers of tribute had been burnt by the Vandals, he indulged his fancy in a liberal calculation and arbitrary assessment of the wealth of Africa.[1] The increase of taxes, which were drawn away by a distant sovereign, and a general resumption of the patrimony of crown lands soon dispelled the intoxication of the public joy; but the emperor was insensible to the modest complaints of the people till he was awakened and alarmed by the clamours of military discontent. Many of the Roman soldiers had married the widows and daughters of the Vandals. As their own, by the double right of conquest and inheritance, they claimed the estates which Genseric had assigned to his victorious troops. They heard with disdain the cold and selfish representations of their officers, that the liberality of Justinian had raised them from a savage or servile condition; that they were already enriched by the spoils of Africa, the treasure, the slaves, and the movables of the vanquished barbarians; and that the ancient and lawful patrimony of the emperors would be applied only to the support of th[illegible]n which their own safety and reward must ultimately depend. The mutiny was secretly inflamed by a thousand soldiers, for the most part Heruli, who had imbibed the doctrines and were instigated by the clergy of the Arian sect; and the cause of perjury and rebellion was sanctified by the dispensing powers of fanaticism. The Arians deplored the ruin of their church, triumphant above a century in Africa; and they were justly provoked by the laws of the conqueror, which interdicted the baptism of their children and the exercise of all religious worship. Of the Vandals chosen by Belisarius, the far greater part, in the honours of the Eastern service, forgot their country and religion. But a generous band of four hundred obliged the mariners, when they were in sight of the isle of Lesbos, to alter their course: they touched on Peloponnesus, ran ashore on a desert coast of Africa, and boldly erected on Mount Aurasius the standard of independence and revolt. While the troops of the province disclaimed the commands of their superiors, a conspiracy was formed at Carthage against the life of Solomon, who filled with honour the place of Belisarius; and the Arians had piously resolved to sacrifice the tyrant at the foot of the altar during the awful mysteries of the festival of Easter. Fear or remorse restrained the daggers of the assassins, but the patience of Solomon emboldened their discontent; and at the end of ten days a furious sedition was kindled in the circus, which desolated Africa above ten years. The pillage of the city and the indiscriminate slaughter of its inhabitants were suspended only by darkness, sleep, and intoxication. The governor, with seven companions, among whom was the historian Procopius, escaped to Sicily. Two-thirds of the army were involved in the guilt of treason; and eight thousand insurgents, assembling in the field of Bulla, elected Stoza for their chief, a private soldier, who possessed in a superior degree the virtues of a rebel. Under the mask of freedom his eloquence could lead, or at least impel, the passions of his equals. He raised himself to a level with Belisarius and the nephew of the emperor, by daring to encounter them in the field and the victorious generals were compelled to acknowledge that Stoza de served a purer cause and a more legitimate command Vanquished in battle he dexter ously employed the arts of negotiation a Roman army was seduced from their allegiance and the chiefs who had trusted to his faithless prom ise were murdered by his order in a church of Numidia When every resource either of force or perfidy was exhausted Stoza with some desperate Vandals retired to the wilds of Mau ritania obtained the daughter of a barbarian prince and eluded the pursuit of his enemies by the report of his death The personal weight of Belisarius, the rank the spirit and the temper of Germanus the emperor s nephew and the vigour and success of the second administration of the eunuch Solomon restored the modesty of the camp and maintained for a while the tran quillity of Africa But the vices of the Byzantine court were felt in that distant province, the troops complained that they were neither paid nor relieved and as soon as the public disorders were sufficiently mature Stoza was again alive in arms, and at the gates of Carthage He fell in a single combat, but he smiled in the agonies of death when he was informed that his own jave lin had reached the heart of his antagonist The example of Stoza and the assurance that a fortunate soldier had been the first king en couraged the ambition of Gontharis and he promised by a private treaty to divide Africa with the Moors if, with their dangerous aid he should ascend the throne of Carthage The feeble Areobindus unskilled in the affairs of peace and war, was raised by his marriage with the niece of Justinian to the office of exarch He was suddenly oppressed by a sedition of the guards and his abject supplications which provoked the contempt could not move the pity of the inexorable tyrant After a reign of thirty days Gontharis himself was stabbed at a ban quet by the hand of Artaban and it is singular enough that an Armenian prince of the royal family of Arsaces should re establish at Car thage the authority of the Roman empire In the conspiracy which unsheathed the dagger of Brutus against the life of Cæsar every circum stance is curious and important to the eyes of posterity but the guilt or merit of these loyal or rebellious assassins could interest only the con temporaries of Procopius who by their hopes and fears their friendship or resentment were personally engaged in the revolutions of Africa.[2]

That country was rapidly sinking into the state of barbarism from whence it had been raised by the Phœnician colonies and Roman laws and every step of intestine discord was marked by some deplorable victory of savage man over civilised society The Moors [3] though ignorant of justice were impatient of oppres sion their vagrant life and boundless wilder ness disappointed the arms and eluded th chains of a conqueror and experience had shown that neither oaths nor obligations could secure the fidelity of their attachment The victory of Mount Auras had awed them into momentary submission but if they respected the character of Solomon, they hated and de spised the pride and luxury of his two nephews, Cyrus and Sergius on whom their uncle had imprudently bestowed the provincial govern ments of Tripoli and Pentapolis A Moorish tribe encamped under the walls of Leptis to renew their alliance and receive from the gov ernor the customary gifts Fourscore of their deputies were introduced as friends into the city but on the dark suspicion of a conspiracy, they were massacred at the table of Sergius and the clamour of arms and revenge was re-echoed through the valleys of Mount Atlas from both the Syrtes to the Atlantic Ocean A personal injury the unjust execution or murder of his brother rendered Antalas the enemy of the Romans The defeat of the Vandals had formerly signalised his valour the rudiments of justice and prudence were still more conspicuous in a Moor and, while he laid Adrumetum in ashes, he calmly admonished the emperor that the peace of Africa might be secured by the recall of Solomon and his unworthy nephews The exarch led forth his troops from Carthage but at the distance of six days journey, in the neigh bourhood of Tebeste [4] he was astonished by the superior numbers and fierce aspect of the bar barians He proposed a treaty, solicited a recon ciliation and offered to bind himself by the most solemn oaths By what oaths can he bind himself? interrupted the indignant Moors Will he swear by the Gospels the divine books of the Christians? It was on those books that the faith of his nephew Sergius was pledged to eighty of our innocent and unfortunate breth ren Before we trust them a second time let us try their efficacy in the chastisement of perjury and the vindication of their own honour Their honour was vindicated in the field of Tebeste by the death of Solomon and the total loss of his army The arrival of fresh troops and more skilful commanders soon checked the insolence of the Moors seventeen of their princes were slain in the same battle and the doubtful and transient submission of their tribes was celebrated with lavish applause by the people of Constantinople Successive inroads had reduced the province of Africa to one third of the measure of Italy yet the Roman emperors continued to reign above a century over Carthage and the fruitful coast of the Mediterranean. But the victories and the losses of Justinian were alike pernicious to mankind and such was the desolation of Africa that in many parts a stranger might wander whole days without meeting the face either of a friend or an enemy The nation of the Vandals had disappeared they once amounted to a hundred and sixty thousand warriors, without including the children the women or the slaves Their numbers were infinitely surpassed by the number of the Moorish families extirpated in a relentless war and the same destruction was retaliated on the Romans and their allies who perished by the climate their mutual quarrels, and the rage of the barbarians When Procopius first landed he admired the populousness of the cities and country strenuously exercised in the labours of commerce and agriculture. In less than twenty years that busy scene was converted into a silent solitude the wealthy citizens escaped to Sicily and Constantinople and the secret historian has confidently affirmed that five millions of Africans were consumed by the wars and government of the emperor Justinian.[5]

The jealousy of the Byzantine court had not permitted Belisarius to achieve the conquest of Italy and his abrupt departure revived the courage of the Goths[6] who respected his genius, his virtue and even the laudable motive which had urged the servant of Justinian to deceive and reject them. They had lost their king (an inconsiderable loss) their capital their treasures the provinces from Sicily to the Alps and the military force of two hundred thousand barbarians, magnificently equipped with horses and arms Yet all was not lost as long as Pavia was defended by one thousand Goths inspired by a sense of honour the love of freedom and the memory of their past greatness The supreme command was unanimously offered to the brave Uraias and it was in his eyes alone that the disgrace of his uncle Vitiges could appear as a reason of exclusion His voice inclined the election in favour of Hildibald whose personal merit was recommended by the vain hope that his kinsman Theudes the Spanish monarch, would support the common interest of the Gothic nation. The success of his arms in Liguria and Venetia seemed to justify their choice but he soon declared to the world that he was incapable of forgiving or commanding his benefactor The consort of Hildibald was deeply wounded by the beauty the riches and the pride of the wife of Uraias and the death of that virtuous patriot excited the indignation of a free people A bold assassin executed their sentence by striking off the head of Hildibald in the midst of a banquet the Rugians a foreign tribe assumed the privilege of election and Totila the nephew of the late king was tempted by revenge to deliver himself and the garrison of Trevigo into the hands of the Romans. But the gallant and accomplished youth was easily persuaded to prefer the Gothic throne before the service of Justinian and as soon as the palace of Pavia had been purified from the Rugian usurper he reviewed the national force of five thousand soldiers and generously undertook the restoration of the kingdom of Italy

The successors of Belisarius eleven generals of equal rank neglected to crush the feeble and disunited Goths, till they were roused to action by the progress of Totila and the reproaches of Justinian The gates of Verona were secretly opened to Artabazus at the head of one hundred Persians in the service of the empire. The Goths fled from the city At the distance of sixty furlongs the Roman generals halted to regulate the division of the spoil While they disputed the enemy discovered the real number of the victors the Persians were instantly overpowered and it was by leaping from the wall that Artabazus preserved a life which he lost in a few days by the lance of a barbarian who had defied him to single combat Twenty thousand Romans encountered the forces of Totila near Faenza and on the hills of Mugello of the Florentine territory The ardour of freemen who fought to regain their country was opposed to the languid temper of mercenary troops who were even destitute of the merits of strong and well-disciplined servitude. On the first attack they abandoned their ensigns threw down their arms and dispersed on all sides with an active speed which abated the loss, whilst it aggravated the shame, of their defeat The king of the Goths who blushed for the baseness of his enemies pursued with rapid steps the path of honour and victory Totila passed the Po traversed the Apennine, suspended the important conquest of Ravenna, Florence and Rome and marched through the heart of Italy to form the siege or rather the blockade of Naples The

Roman chiefs imprisoned in their respective cities and accusing each other of the common disgrace did not presume to disturb his enterprise But the emperor, alarmed by the distress and danger of his Italian conquests despatched to the relief of Naples a fleet of galleys and a body of Thracian and Armenian soldiers They landed in Sicily, which yielded its copious stores of provisions but the delays of the new commander an unwarlike magistrate, protracted the sufferings of the besieged and the succours which he dropped with a timid and tardy hand were successively intercepted by the armed vessels stationed by Totila in the Bay of Naples The principal officer of the Romans was dragged with a rope round his neck, to the foot of the wall from whence with a trembling voice he exhorted the citizens to implore, like himself the mercy of the conqueror They requested a truce, with a promise of surrendering the city if no effectual relief should appear at the end of thirty days Instead of one month, the audacious barbarian granted them three in the just confidence that famine would anticipate the term of their capitulation After the reduction of Naples and Cumæ, the provinces of Lucania, Apulia and Calabria submitted to the king of the Goths Totila led his army to the gates of Rome pitched his camp at Tibur or Tivoli within twenty miles of the capital and calmly exhorted the senate and people to compare the tyranny of the Greeks with the blessings of the Gothic reign

The rapid success of Totila may be partly ascribed to the revolution which three years experience had produced in the sentiments of the Italians At the command or at least in the name of a catholic emperor the pope [7] their spiritual father had been torn from the Roman church and either starved or murdered on a desolate island [8] The virtues of Belisarius were replaced by the various or uniform vices of eleven chiefs at Rome Ravenna Florence Perugia Spoleto etc who abused their authority for the indulgence of lust or avarice The improvement of the revenue was committed to Alexander a subtle scribe long practised in the fraud and oppression of the Byzantine schools and whose name of Psallicion the scissors [9] was drawn from the dexterous artifice with which he reduced the size without defacing the figure of the gold coin Instead of expecting the restoration of peace and industry he imposed a heavy assessment on the fortunes of the Italians Yet his present or future demands were less odious than a prosecution of arbitrary rigour against the persons and property of all those who under the Gothic kings, had been concerned in the receipt and expenditure of the public money The subjects of Justinian who escaped these partial vexations were oppressed by the irregular maintenance of the soldiers whom Alexander defrauded and despised, and their hasty sallies in quest of wealth or subsistence provoked the inhabitants of the country to await or implore their deliverance from the virtues of a barbarian Totila[10] was chaste and temperate and none were deceived either friends or enemies, who depended on his faith or his clemency To the husbandmen of Italy the Gothic king issued a welcome proclamation enjoining them to pursue their important labours, and to rest assured that on the payment of the ordinary taxes they should be defended by his valour and discipline from the injuries of war The strong towns he successively attacked and as soon as they had yielded to his arms he demolished the fortifications to save the people from the calamities of a future siege, to deprive the Romans of the arts of defence, and to decide the tedious quarrel of the two nations by an equal and honourable conflict in the field of battle The Roman captives and deserters were tempted to enlist in the service of a liberal and courteous adversary the slaves were attracted by the firm and faithful promise that they should never be delivered to their masters and from the thousand warriors of Pavia a new people under the same appellation of Goths was insensibly formed in the camp of Totila He sincerely accomplished the articles of capitulation, without seeking or accepting any sinister advantage from ambiguous expressions or unforeseen events the garrison of Naples had stipulated that they should be transported by sea the obstinacy of the winds prevented their voyage but they were generously supplied with horses provisions, and a safe-conduct to the gates of Rome The wives of the senators who had been surprised in the villas of Campania were restored without a ransom to their husbands the violation of female chastity was inexorably chastised with death and in the salutary regulation of the diet of the famished Neapolitans the conqueror assumed the office of a humane and attentive physician The virtues of Totila are equally laudable whether they proceeded from true policy religious principle, or the instinct of humanity He often harangued his troops and it was his constant theme that national vice and ruin are inseparably connected that victory is the fruit of moral as well as military virtue and that the prince and even the people are responsible for the crimes which they neglect to punish

The return of Belisarius to save the country which he had subdued was pressed with equal vehemence by his friends and enemies, and the Gothic war was imposed as a trust or an exile on the veteran commander A hero on the banks of the Euphrates a slave in the palace of Constantinople he accepted with reluctance the painful task of supporting his own reputation and retrieving the faults of his successors. The sea was open to the Romans the ships and soldiers were assembled at Salona near the palace of Diocletian he refreshed and reviewed his troops at Pola in Istria coasted round the head of the Hadriatic entered the port of Ravenna and despatched orders rather than supplies to the subordinate cities His first public oration was addressed to the Goths and Romans in the name of the emperor who had suspended for a while the conquest of Persia and listened to the prayers of his Italian subjects. He gently touched on the causes and the authors of the recent disasters striving to remove the fear of punishment for the past and the hope of impunity for the future and labouring with more zeal than success to unite all the members of his government in a firm league of affection and obedience Justinian his gracious master was inclined to pardon and reward and it was their interest as well as duty to reclaim their deluded brethren who had been seduced by the arts of the usurper Not a man was tempted to desert the standard of the Gothic king Belisarius soon discovered that he was sent to remain the idle and impotent spectator of the glory of a young barbarian and his own epistle exhibits a genuine and lively picture of the distress of a noble mind Most excellent prince we are arrived in Italy destitute of all the necessary implements of war—men, horses arms and money In our late circuit through the villages of Thrace and Illyricum we have collected with extreme difficulty about four thousand recruits naked and unskilled in the use of weapons and the exercises of the camp The soldiers already stationed in the province are discontented fearful and dismayed at the sound of an enemy they dismiss their horses, and cast their arms on the ground. No taxes can be raised since Italy is in the hands of the barbarians the failure of payment has deprived us of the right of command or even of admonition. Be assured dread Sir that the greater part of your troops have already deserted to the Goths If the war could be achieved by the presence of Belisarius alone your wishes are satisfied Belisarius is in the midst of Italy But if you desire to conquer far other preparations are requisite without a military force the title of general is an empty name. It would be expedient to restore to my service my own veterans and domestic guards. Before I can take the field I must receive an adequate supply of light and heavy armed troops and it is only with ready money that you can procure the indispensable aid of a powerful body of the cavalry of the Huns.' [11] An officer in whom Belisarius confided was sent from Ravenna to hasten and conduct the succours but the message was neglected and the messenger was detained at Constantinople by an advantageous marriage. After his patience had been exhausted by delay and disappointment, the Roman general repassed the Hadriatic, and expected at Dyrrachium the arrival of the troops which were slowly assembled among the subjects and allies of the empire His powers were still inadequate to the deliverance of Rome, which was closely besieged by the Gothic king The Appian way a march of forty days was covered by the barbarians and as the prudence of Belisarius declined a battle he preferred the safe and speedy navigation of five days from the coast of Epirus to the mouth of the Tiber

After reducing by force or treaty the towns of inferior note in the midland provinces of Italy Totila proceeded not to assault but to encompass and starve the ancient capital Rome was afflicted by the avarice, and guarded by the valour of Bessas a veteran chief of Gothic extraction who filled with a garrison of three thousand soldiers, the spacious circle of her venerable walls From the distress of the people he extracted a profitable trade and secretly rejoiced in the continuance of the siege It was for his use that the granaries had been replenished the charity of Pope Vigilius had purchased and embarked an ample supply of Sicilian corn but the vessels which escaped the barbarians were seized by a rapacious governor who imparted a scanty sustenance to the soldiers and sold the remainder to the wealthy Romans The medimnus, or fifth part of the quarter of wheat was exchanged for seven pieces of gold fifty pieces were given for an ox a rare and accidental prize the progress of famine enhanced this exorbitant value and the mercenaries were tempted to deprive themselves of the allowance which was scarcely sufficient for the support of life. A tasteless and unwhole

some mixture in which the bran thrice exceeded the quantity of flour, appeased the hunger of the poor, they were gradually reduced to feed on dead horses dogs cats and mice and eagerly to snatch the grass and even the nettles which grew among the ruins of the city A crowd of spectres pale and emaciated their bodies oppressed with disease and their minds with despair, surrounded the palace of the governor, urged with unavailing truth, that it was the duty of a master to maintain his slaves, and humbly requested that he would provide for their subsistence permit their flight or command their immediate execution Bessas replied with unfeeling tranquillity that it was impossible to feed, unsafe to dismiss and unlawful to kill the subjects of the emperor Yet the example of a private citizen might have shown his countrymen that a tyrant cannot withhold the privilege of death Pierced by the cries of five children who vainly called on their father for bread he ordered them to follow his steps advanced with calm and silent despair to one of the bridges of the Tiber and covering his face, threw himself headlong into the stream in the presence of his family and the Roman people To the rich and pusillanimous, Bessas sold the permission of departure but the greatest part of the fugitives expired on the public highways or were intercepted by the flying parties of barbarians [12] In the meanwhile the artful governor soothed the discontent, and revived the hopes of the Romans by the vague reports of the fleets and armies which were hastening to their relief from the extremities of the East They derived more rational comfort from the assurance that Belisarius had landed at the port and without numbering his forces they firmly relied on the humanity the courage and the skill of their great deliverer

The foresight of Totila had raised obstacles worthy of such an antagonist Ninety furlongs below the city in the narrowest part of the river he joined the two banks by strong and solid timbers in the form of a bridge, on which he erected two lofty towers manned by the bravest of his Goths and profusely stored with missile weapons and engines of offence The approach of the bridge and towers was covered by a strong and massy chain of iron and the chain at either end on the opposite sides of the Tiber, was defended by a numerous and chosen detachment of archers But the enterprise of forcing these barriers and relieving the capital displays a shining example of the boldness and conduct of Belisarius His cavalry advanced from the port along the public road to awe the motions and distract the attention of the enemy His infantry and provisions were distributed in two hundred large boats and each boat was shielded by a high rampart of thick planks, pierced with many small holes for the discharge of missile weapons In the front, two large vessels were linked together to sustain a floating castle which commanded the towers of the bridge, and contained a magazine of fire sulphur, and bitumen The whole fleet which the general led in person was laboriously moved against the current of the river The chain yielded to their weight, and the enemies who guarded the banks were either slain or scattered. As soon as they touched the principal barrier the fireship was instantly grappled to the bridge one of the towers, with two hundred Goths was consumed by the flames the assailants shouted victory and Rome was saved if the wisdom of Belisarius had not been defeated by the misconduct of his officers He had previously sent orders to Bessas to second his operations by a timely sally from the town, and he had fixed his lieutenant Isaac by a peremptory command to the station of the port But avarice rendered Bessas immovable while the youthful ardour of Isaac delivered him into the hands of a superior enemy The exaggerated rumour of his defeat was hastily carried to the ears of Belisarius he paused betrayed in that single moment of his life some emotions of surprise and perplexity and reluctantly sounded a retreat to save his wife Antonina his treasures and the only harbour which he possessed on the Tuscan coast The vexation of his mind produced an ardent and almost mortal fever, and Rome was left without protection to the mercy or indignation of Totila The continuance of hostilities had embittered the national hatred the Arian clergy was ignominiously driven from Rome Pelagius the archdeacon returned without success from an embassy to the Gothic camp and a Sicilian bishop the envoy or nuncio of the pope, was deprived of both his hands for daring to utter falsehoods in the service of the church and state

Famine had relaxed the strength and discipline of the garrison of Rome They could derive no effectual service from a dying people and the inhuman avarice of the merchant at length absorbed the vigilance of the governor Four Isaurian sentinels while their companions slept and their officers were absent descended by a rope from the wall and secretly proposed to the Gothic king to introduce his troops into the city The offer was entertained with cold ness and suspicion they returned in safety they twice repeated their visit the place was twice examined the conspiracy was known and disregarded and no sooner had Totila con sented to the attempt than they unbarred the Asinarian gate and gave admittance to the Goths Till the dawn of day they halted in order of battle apprehensive of treachery or ambush it the troops of Bessas with their leader had ready escaped and when the king was pressed disturb their retreat he prudently replied at no sight could be more grateful than that f a flying enemy The patricians who were ill possessed of horses Decius Basilius, etc. ccompanied the governor their brethren, mong whom Olybrius, Orestes and Maximus are named by the historian took refuge in the hurch of St Peter but the assertion that only ive hundred persons remained in the capital n.pires some doubt of the fidelity either of his narrative or of his text As soon as daylight had displayed the entire victory of the Goths their monarch devoutly visited the tomb of the prince of the apostles but while he prayed at the altar twenty five soldiers and sixty citizens were put to the sword in the vestibule of the templ.. The archdeacon Pelagius [13] stood be fore him, with the Gospels in his hand O Lord, be merciful to your servant. Pelagius said Totila with an insulting smile your pride now condescends to become a supphant 'I am a suppliant, replied the prudent arch deacon God has now made us your subjects, and as your subjects we are entitled to your clemency At his humble prayer the lives of the Romans were spared and the chastity of the maids and matrons was preserved inviolate from the passions of the hungry soldiers But they were rewarded by the freedom of pillage after the most precious spoils had been reserved for the royal treasury The houses of the sena tors were plentifully stored with gold and silver and the avarice of Bessas had laboured with so much guilt and shame for the benefit of the con queror In this revolution the sons and daughters of Roman consuls tas ed the misery which they had spurned or relieved wandered in tattered garments through the streets of the city and begged their bread, perhaps without success before the gates of their hereditary mansions. The riches of Rusticiana the daughter of Sym machus and widow of Boethius had been gen erously devoted to alleviate the calamities of famine But the barbarians were exasperated by the report that she had prompted the people to overthrow the statues of the great Theo doric and the life of that venerable matron would have been sacrificed to his memory if Totila had not respected her birth her virtues and even the pious motive of her revenge The next day he pronounced two orations to con gratulate and admonish his victorious Goths and to reproach the senate as the vilest of slaves with their perjury folly and ingrati tude sternly declaring that their estates and honours were justly forfeited to the companions of his arms Yet he consented to forgive their revolt and the senators repaid his clemency by despatching circular letters to their tenants and vassals in the provinces of Italy strictly to en join them to desert the standard of the Greeks, to cultivate their lands in peace and to learn from their masters the duty of obedience to a Gothic sovereign Against the city which had so long delayed the course of his victories he ap peared inexorable one-third of the walls in different parts were demolished by his com mand fire and engines prepared to consume or subvert the most stately works of antiquity and the world was astonished by the fatal decree that Rome should be changed into a pasture for cattle The firm and temperate remon strance of Belisarius suspended the execution he warned the barbarian not to sully his fame by the destruction of those monum nts which were the glory of the dead and the delight of the living and Totila was persuaded by the advice of an enemy to preserve Rome as the ornament of his kingdom or the fairest pledge of peace and reconciliation When he had signi fied to the ambassadors of Belisarius his inten tion of sparing the city he stationed an army at the distance of one hundred and twenty fur longs to observe the motions of the Roman general With the remainder of his forces he marched into Lucania and Apulia and occupied on the summit of Mount Garganus [14] one of the camps of Hannibal [15] The senators were dragged in his train, and afterwards confined in the fortresses of Campania the citizens with their wives and children were dispersed in exile and during forty days Rome was abandoned to desolate and dreary solitude [16]

The loss of Rome was speedily retrieved by an action to which according to the event the public opinion would apply the names of rash ness or h roism. Af er the departure of Totila, the Roman general sallied from the port at the head of a thousand horse cut in pieces the enemy who opposed his progress and visited with pity and reverence the vacant space of the eternal city Resolved to maintain a station so conspicuous in the eyes of mankind he summoned the greatest part of his troops to the standard which he erected on the Capitol the old inhabitants were recalled by the love of their country and the hopes of food and the keys of Rome were sent a second time to the emperor Justinian The walls as far as they had been demolished by the Goths were repaired with rude and dissimilar materials, the ditch was restored iron spikes[17] were profusely scattered in the highways to annoy the feet of the horses, and as new gates could not suddenly be procured, the entrance was guarded by a Spartan rampart of his bravest soldiers At the expiration of twenty five days Totila returned by hasty marches from Apulia to avenge the injury and disgrace Belisarius expected his approach The Goths were thrice repulsed in three general assaults they lost the flower of their troops the royal standard had almost fallen into the hands of the enemy, and the fame of Totila sunk, as it had risen, with the fortune of his arms Whatever skill and courage could achieve had been performed by the Roman general it remained only that Justinian should terminate, by a strong and seasonable effort the war which he had ambitiously undertaken The indolence perhaps the impotence of a prince who despised his enemies and envied his servants, protracted the calamities of Italy After a long silence Belisarius was commanded to leave a sufficient garrison at Rome, and to transport himself into the province of Lucania whose inhabitants, inflamed by catholic zeal had cast away the yoke of their Arian conquerors In this ignoble warfare the hero invincible against the power of the barbarians was basely vanquished by the delay the disobedience, and the cowardice of his own officers He reposed in his winter quarters of Crotona in the full assurance that the two passes of the Lucanian hills were guarded by his cavalry They were betrayed by treachery or weakness and the rapid march of the Goths scarcely allowed time for the escape of Belisarius to the coast of Sicily At length a fleet and army were assembled for the relief of Ruscianum or Rossano,[18] a fortress sixty furlongs from the ruins of Sybaris where the nobles of Lucania had taken refuge In the first attempt the Roman forces were dissipated by a storm In the second they approached the shore but they saw the hills covered with archers, the landing place defended by a line of spears and the king of the Goths impatient for battle The conqueror of Italy retired with a sigh and continued to languish, inglorious and inactive, till Antonina, who had been sent to Constantinople to solicit succours obtained after the death of the empress the permission of his return

The five last campaigns of Belisarius might abate the envy of his competitors, whose eyes had been dazzled and wounded by the blaze of his former glory Instead of delivering Italy from the Goths he had wandered like a fugitive along the coast without daring to march into the country or to accept the bold and repeated challenge of Totila Yet in the judgment of the few who could discriminate counsels from events and compare the instruments with the execution he appeared a more consummate master of the art of war than in the season of his prosperity when he presented two captive kings before the throne of Justinian The valour of Belisarius was not chilled by age his prudence was matured by experience but the moral virtues of humanity and justice seem to have yielded to the hard necessity of the times. The parsimony or poverty of the emperor compelled him to deviate from the rule of conduct which had deserved the love and confidence of the Italians The war was maintained by the oppression of Ravenna Sicily, and all the faithful subjects of the empire and the rigorous prosecution of Herodian provoked that injured or guilty officer to deliver Spoleto into the hands of the enemy The avarice of Antonina which had been sometimes diverted by love now reigned without a rival in her breast Belisarius himself had always understood that riches, in a corrupt age are the support and ornament of personal merit And it cannot be presumed that he should stain his honour for the public service without applying a part of the spoil to his private emolument The hero had escaped the sword of the barbarians but the dagger of conspiracy[19] awaited his return In the midst of wealth and honours Artaban who had chastised the African tyrant complained of the ingratitude of courts He aspired to Præjecta the emperor s niece who wished to reward her deliverer but the impediment of his previous marriage was asserted by the piety of Theodora. The pride of royal descent was irritated by flattery and the service in which he gloried had proved him capable of bold and sanguinary deeds The death of Justinian was resolved but the conspirators delayed the execution till they could surprise Belisarius disarmed and naked in the palace of Constantinople Not a hope could be entertained of shaking his long tried fidelity and they justly dreaded the revenge or rather justice of the veteran general who might speedily assemble an army in Thrace to punish the assassins and perhaps to enjoy the fruits of their crime Delay afforded time for rash communications and honest confessions Artaban and his accomplices were condemned by the senate but the extreme clemency of Justinian detained them in the gentle confinement of the palace till he pardoned their flagitious attempt against his throne and life. If the emperor forgave his enemies he must cordially embrace a friend whose victories were alone remembered and who was endeared to his prince by the recent circumstance of their common danger Belisarius reposed from his toils, in the high station of general of the East and count of the domestics and the older consuls and patricians respectfully yielded the precedency of rank to the peerless merit of the first of the Romans [19] The first of the Romans still submitted to be the slave of his wife but the servitud of habit and affection became less disgraceful when the death of Theodora had removed the baser influence of fear Joannina their daughter and the sole heiress of their fortunes, was betrothed to Anastasius the grandson, or rather the nephew of the empress [2] whose kind intercession forwarded the consummation of their youthful loves But the power of Theodora expired, the parents of Joannina returned, and her honour perhaps her happiness were sacrificed to the revenge of an unfeeling mother who dissolved the imperfect nuptials before they had been ratified by the ceremonies of the church. [22]

Before the departure of Belisarius Perusia was besieged and few cities were impregnable to the Gothic arms Ravenna Ancona and Crotona still resisted the barbarians and when Totila asked in marriage one of the daughters of France he was stung by the ju t reproach that the king of Italy was unworthy of his title till it was acknowledged by the Roman people Three thousand of the bravest soldiers had been l ft to defend the capital On the suspicion of a monopoly they massacred the governor and announced to Justinian by a deputation of th clergy that unless their offence was pardoned and th ir arrears were satisfied they should instantly accept the tempting offers of Totila. But the off cer who succeeded to the command (his name was Diogenes) deserved their esteem and confidence and the Goths, instead of finding an easy conquest encountered a vigorous resistance from the soldiers and people, who patiently endured the loss of the port and of all maritime supplies. The siege of Rome would perhaps have been raised, if the liberality of Totila to the Isaurians had not encouraged some of their venal countrymen to copy the example of treason. In a dark night while the Gothic trumpets sounded on another side they silently opened the gate of St Paul the barbarians rushed into the city and the flying garrison was intercepted before they could reach the harbour of Centumcellæ A soldier trained in the school of Belisarius Paul of Cilicia, retired with four hundred men to the mole of Hadrian. They repelled the Goths but they felt the approach of famine and their aversion to the taste of horse flesh confirmed their resolution to risk the event of a desperate and decisive sally But their spirit insensibly stooped to the offers of capitulation they retrieved their arrears of pay and preserved their arms and horses by enlisting in the service of Totila their chiefs who pleaded a laudable attachment to their wives and children in the East were dismissed with honour and above four hundred enemies who had taken refuge in the sanctuaries were saved by the clemency of the victor He no longer entertained a wish of destroying the edifices of Rome [3] which he now respected as the seat of the Gothic kingdom the senate and people were restored to their country the means of subsistence were liberally provided and Totila in the robe of peace exhibited the equestrian games of the circus. Whilst he amused the eyes of the multitude, four hundred vessels were prepared for the embarkation of his troops The cities of Rhegium and Tarentum were reduced he passed into Sicily the object of his implacable resentment and the island was stripped of its gold and silver of the fruits of the earth and of an infinite number of horses, sheep and oxen Sardinia and Corsica obeyed the fortune of Italy and the sea-coast of Greece was visited by a fleet of three hundred galleys [24] The Goths were landed in Corcyra and the ancient continent of Epirus they advanced as far as Nicopolis the trophy of Augustus and Dodona [25] once famous by the oracle of Jove In every step of his victories the wise barbarian repeated to Justinian his desire of peace, applauded the concord of their predecessors and offered to employ the Gothic arms in the service of the empire

Justinian was deaf to the voice of peace but he neglected the prosecution of war and the indolence of his temper disappointed in some degree, the obstinacy of his passions. From this

salutary slumber the emperor was awakened by the pope Vigilius and the patrician Cethegus, who appeared before his throne and adjured him in the name of God and the people, to resume the conquest and deliverance of Italy In the choice of the generals, caprice as well as judgment was shown A fleet and army sailed for the relief of Sicily, under the conduct of Liberius, but his want of youth and experience were afterwards discovered, and before he touched the shores of the island he was overtaken by his successor In the place of Liberius the conspirator Artaban was raised from a prison to military honours in the pious presumption that gratitude would animate his valour and fortify his allegiance Belisarius reposed in the shade of his laurels but the command of the principal army was reserved for Germanus [26] the emperor's nephew, whose rank and merit had been long depressed by the jealousy of the court Theodora had injured him in the rights of a private citizen the marriage of his children and the testament of his brother, and although his conduct was pure and blameless Justinian was displeased that he should be thought worthy of the confidence of the malcontents The life of Germanus was a lesson of implicit obedience he nobly refused to prostitute his name and character in the factions of the circus the gravity of his manners was tempered by innocent cheerfulness and his riches were lent without interest to indigent or deserving friends His valour had formerly triumphed over the Sclavonians of the Danube and the rebels of Africa the first report of his promotion revived the hopes of the Italians and he was privately assured that a crowd of Roman deserters would abandon on his approach the standard of Totila His second marriage with Malasontha the grand-daughter of Theodoric endeared Germanus to the Goths themselves and they marched with reluctance against the father of a royal infant the last offspring of the line of Amali [27] A splendid allowance was assigned by the emperor the general contributed his private fortune his two sons were popular and active and he surpassed in the promptitude and success of his levies the expectation of mankind He was permitted to select some squadrons of Thracian cavalry the veterans, as well as the youth of Constantinople and Europe engaged their voluntary service and as far as the heart of Germany his fame and liberality attracted the aid of the barbarians. The Romans advanced to Sardica an army of Sclavonians fled before their march but within two days of their final departure the designs of Germanus were terminated by his malady and death. Yet the impulse which he had given to the Italian war still continued to act with energy and effect The maritime towns, Ancona, Crotona, Centumcellæ, resisted the assaults of Totila Sicily was reduced by the zeal of Artaban and the Gothic navy was defeated near the coast of the Hadriatic. The two fleets were almost equal, forty seven to fifty galleys the victory was decided by the knowledge and dexterity of the Greeks, but the ships were so closely grappled that only twelve of the Goths escaped from this unfortunate conflict. They affected to depreciate an element in which they were unskilled, but their own experience confirmed the truth of a maxim, that the master of the sea will always acquire the dominion of the land [28]

After the loss of Germanus the nations were provoked to smile by the strange intelligence that the command of the Roman armies was given to a eunuch But the eunuch Narses[29] is ranked among the few who have rescued that unhappy name from the contempt and hatred of mankind A feeble diminutive body concealed the soul of a statesman and a warrior His youth had been employed in the management of the loom and distaff in the cares of the household, and the service of female luxury, but while his hands were busy, he secretly exercised the faculties of a vigorous and discerning mind A stranger to the schools and the camp, he studied in the palace to dissemble to flatter and to persuade and as soon as he approached the person of the emperor, Justinian listened with surprise and pleasure to the manly counsels of his chamberlain and private treasurer [30] The talents of Narses were tried and improved in frequent embassies he led an army into Italy acquired a practical knowledge of the war and the country and presumed to strive with the genius of Belisarius Twelve years after his return the eunuch was chosen to achieve the conquests which had been left imperfect by the first of the Roman generals Instead of being dazzled by vanity or emulation he seriously declared that unless he were armed with an adequate force, he would never consent to risk his own glory and that of his sovereign Justinian granted to the favourite what he might have denied to the hero the Gothic war was rekindled from its ashes and the preparations were not unworthy of the ancient majesty of the empire The key of the public treasure was put into his hand to collect magazines, to levy sol diers, to purchase arms and horses to discharge the arrears of pay and to tempt the fidelity of the fugitives and deserters The troops of Germanus were still in arms they halted at Salona in the expectation of a new leader, and legions of subjects and allies were created by the well known liberality of the eunuch Narses The king of the Lombards [31] satisfied or surpassed the obligations of a treaty by lending two thousand two hundred of his bravest warriors, who were followed by three thousand of their martial attendants Three thousand Heruli fought on horseback under Philemuth, their native chi f and the noble Aratus, who adopted the manners and discipline of Rome conducted a band of veterans of the same nation Dagisthaeus was released from prison to command the Huns and Kobad, the grandson and nephew of the Great King was conspicuous by the regal tiara at the head of his faithful Persians who had devoted themselves to the fortunes of their prince.[32] Absolute in the exercise of his authority more bsolute in the affection of his troops Narses d a numerous and gallant army from Philippopolis to Salona from whence he coasted the astern side of the Hadriatic as far as the confines of Italy His progress was checked The East could not supply vessels capable of transporting such multitudes of men and horses. The Franks who in the general confusion had usurped the greater part of the Venetian province refused a free passage to the friends of the Lombards The station of Verona was occupied by Teias with the flower of the Gothic forces and that skilful commander had overspread the adjacent country with the fall of woods and the inundation of waters [33] In this perplexity an officer of experience proposed a measure secure by the appearance of rashness that the Roman army should cautiously advance along the sea shore, while the fleet preceded their march, and successively cast a bridge of boats over the mouths of the rivers the Timavus, the Brenta the Adige and the Po that fall into the Hadriatic to the north of Ravenna Nine days he reposed in the city collected the fragments of the Italian army and marched towards Rimini to meet the defiance of an insulting enemy

The prudence of Narses impelled him to speedy and decisive action. His powers were the last effort of the state the cost of each day accumulated the enormous account and the nations untrained to discipline or fatigue might be rashly provoked to turn their arms against each other or against their benefactor The same considerations might have tempered the ardour of Totila. But he was conscious that the clergy and people of Italy aspired to a second revolution he felt or suspected the rapid progress of treason and he resolved to risk the Gothic kingdom on the chance of a day in which the valiant would be animated by instant danger and the disaffected might be awed by mutual ignorance In his march from Ravenna the Roman general chastised the garrison of Rimini traversed in a direct line the hills of Urbino and re-entered the Flaminian way nine miles beyond the perforated rock an obstacle of art and nature which might have stopped or retarded his progress.[34] The Goths were assembled in the neighbourhood of Rome they advanced without delay to seek a superior enemy and the two armies approached each other at the distance of one hundred furlongs, between Tagina [35] and the sepulchres of the Gauls [36] The haughty message of Narses was an offer not of peace but of pardon. The answer of the Gothic king declared his resolution to die or conquer What day said the messenger will you fix for the combat? The eighth day replied Totila but early the next morning he attempted to surprise a foe suspicious of deceit and prepared for battle Ten thousand Heruli and Lombards, of approved valour and doubtful faith, were placed in the centre Each of the wings was composed of eight thousand Romans the right was guarded by the cavalry of the Huns the left was covered by fifteen hundred chosen horse destined, according to the emergencies of action, to sustain the retreat of their friends, or to encompass the flank of the enemy From his proper station at the head of the right wing the eunuch rode along the line expressing by his voice and countenance the assurance of victory exciting the soldiers of the emperor to punish the guilt and madness of a band of robbers and exposing to their view gold chains collars, and bracelets, the rewards of military virtue. From the event of a single combat they drew an omen of success and they beheld with pleasure the courage of fifty archers who maintained a small eminence against three successive attacks of the Gothic cavalry At the distance only of two bow shots the armies spent the morning in dreadful suspense and the Romans tasted some necessary food without unloosening the cuirass from their breast or the bridle from their horses Narses awaited the charge and it was delayed by Totila till he had received his last succours of two thousand Goths. While he consumed the hours in fruitless treaty, the king exhibited in a narrow space the strength and agility of a warrior His armour was enchased with gold, his purple banner floated with the wind he cast his lance into the air caught it with the right hand, shifted it to the left threw himself backwards, re covered his seat, and managed a fiery steed in all the paces and evolutions of the equestrian school As soon as the succours had arrived he retired to his tent assumed the dress and arms of a private soldier, and gave the signal of battle The first line of cavalry advanced with more courage than discretion and left behind them the infantry of the second line They were soon engaged between the horns of a crescent, into which the adverse wings had been insensibly curved and were saluted from either side by the volleys of four thousand archers Their ardour and even their distress drove them for wards to a close and unequal conflict, in which they could only use their lances against an enemy equally skilled in all the instruments of war A generous emulation inspired the Romans and their barbarian allies and Narses, who calmly viewed and directed their efforts, doubted to whom he should adjudge the prize of superior bravery The Gothic cavalry was astonished and disordered pressed and broken and the line of infantry instead of presenting their spears or opening their intervals, were trampled under the feet of the flying horse Six thousand of the Goths were slaughtered with out mercy in the field of Tagina Their prince, with five attendants was overtaken by Asbad of the race of the Gepidæ Spare the king of Italy cried a loyal voice and Asbad struck his lance through the body of Totila The blow was instantly revenged by the faithful Goths they transported their dying monarch seven miles beyond the scene of his disgrace and his last moments were not embittered by the pres ence of an enemy Compassion afforded him the shelter of an obscure tomb but the Romans were not satisfied of their victory till they be held the corpse of the Gothic king His hat enriched with gems and his bloody robe were presented to Justinian by the messengers of triumph.[37]

As soon as Narses had paid his devotions to the Author of victory and the blessed Virgin his peculiar patroness [38] he praised rewarded and dismissed the Lombards The villages had been reduced to ashes by these valiant savages they ravished matrons and virgins on the altar their retreat was diligently watched by a strong detachmen of regular forces who prevented a repetition of the like disorders The victorious eunuch pursued his march through Tuscany accepted the submission of the Goths, heard the acclamations and often the complaints of the Italians, and encompassed the walls of Rome with the remainder of his formidable host. Round the wide circumference Narses assigned to himself and to each of his lieutenants a real or a feigned attack while he silently marked the place of easy and unguarded entrance Neither the fortifications of Hadrian's mole, nor of the port, could long delay the progress of the conqueror, and Justinian once more received the keys of Rome which under his reign had been five times taken and recovered [39] But the deliverance of Rome was the last calamity of the Roman people The barbarian allies of Narses too frequently confounded the privi leges of peace and war The despair of the flying Goths found some consolation in sanguinary revenge and three hundred youths of the noblest families who had been sent as hostages beyond the Po were inhumanly slain by the successor of Totila The fate of the senate sug gests an awful lesson of the vicissitude of human affairs Of the senators whom Totila had ban ished from their country, some were rescued by an officer of Belisarius and transported from Campania to Sicily while others were too guilty to confide in the clemency of Justinian, or too poor to provide horses for their escape to the sea shore Their brethren languished five years in a state of indigence and exile the vic tory of Narses revived their hopes, but their premature return to the metropolis was pre vented by the furious Goths and all the for tresses of Campania were stained with patrician [40] blood After a period of thirteen centuries the institution of Romulus expired and if the nobles of Rome still assumed the title of sena tors few subsequent traces can be discovered of a public council or constitutional order Ascend six hundred years and contemplate the kings of the earth soliciting an audience as the slaves or freedmen of the Roman senate! [41]

The Gothic war was yet alive The bravest of the nation retired beyond the Po and Teias was unanimously chosen to succeed and re- venge their departed hero The new king im mediately sent ambassadors to implore or rather to purchase the aid of the Franks and nobly lavished for the public safety the riches which had been deposited in the palace of Pavia. The residue of the royal treasure was guarded by his brother Aligern at Cumæ in Campania but the strong castle which Totila

had fortified was closely besieged by the arms of Narses From the Alps to the foot of Mount Vesuvius the Gothic king by rapid and secret marches advanced to the relief of his brother eluded the vigilance of the Roman chiefs and pitched his camp on the banks of the Sarnus or Draco [43] which flows from Nuceria into the bay of Naples. The river separated the two armies sixty days were consumed in distant and fruitless combats and Teias maintained this important post till he was deserted by his fleet and the hope of subsistence With reluctant steps he ascended the Lactarian mount where the physicians of Rome since the time of Galen had sent their patients for the benefit of the air and the milk.[44] But the Goths soon embraced a more generous resolution—to descend the hill to dismiss their horses and to die in arms and in the possession of freedom. The king marched at their head bearing in his right hand a lance, and an ample buckler in his left with the one he struck dead the foremost of the assailants with the other he received the weapons which every hand was ambitious to aim against his life After a combat of many hours his left arm was fatigued by the weight of twelve javelins which hung from his shield Without moving from his ground or suspending his blows the hero called aloud on his attendants for a fresh buckler but in the moment while his side was uncovered it was pierced by a mortal dart He fell and his head exalted on a spear proclaimed to the nations that the Gothic kingdom was no more But the example of his death served only to animate the companions who had sworn to perish with their leader They fought till darkness descended on the earth. They reposed on their arms The combat was renewed with the return of light and maintained with unabated vigour till the evening of the second day The repose of a second night, the want of water and the loss of their bravest champions determined the surviving Goths to accept the fair capitulation which the prudence of Narses was inclined to propose. They embraced the alternative of residing in Italy as the subjects and soldiers of Justinian or departing with a portion of their private wealth in search of some independent country [45] Yet the oath of fidelity or exile was alike rejected by one thousand Goths who broke away before the treaty was signed and boldly effected their retreat to the walls of Pavia. The spirit as well as the situation of Aligern prompted him to imitate rather than to bewail his brother a strong and dexterous archer he transpierced with a single arrow the armour and breast of his antagonist and his military conduct defended Cumæ[45] above a year against the forces of the Romans Their industry had scooped the Sibyl s cave[46] into a prodigious mine combustible materials were introduced to consume the temporary props the wall and the gate of Cumæ sunk into the cavern but the ruins formed a deep and inaccessible precipice On the fragment of a rock Aligern stood alone and unshaken till he calmly surveyed the hopeless condition of his country and judged it more honourable to be the friend of Narses than the slave of the Franks. After the death of Teias the Roman general separated his troops to reduce the cities of Italy Lucca sustained a long and vigorous siege, and such was the humanity or the prudence of Narses, that the repeated perfidy of the inhabitants could not provoke him to exact the forfeit lives of their hostages. These hostages were dismissed in safety and their grateful zeal at length subdued the obstinacy of their countrymen.[47]

Before Lucca had surrendered Italy was overwhelmed by a new deluge of barbarians A feeble youth the grandson of Clovis reigned over the Austrasians or Oriental Franks The guardians of Theodebald entertained with coldness and reluctance the magnificent promises of the Gothic ambassadors But the spirit of a martial people outstripped the timid counsels of the court two brothers Lothaire and Buccelin [48] the dukes of the Alamanni, stood forth as the leaders of the Italian war and seventy five thousand Germans descended in the autumn from the Rhætian Alps into the plain of Milan. The vanguard of the Roman army was stationed near the Po under the conduct of Fulcaris a bold Herulian, who rashly conceived that personal bravery was the sole duty and merit of a commander As he marched without order or precaution along the Æmilian way an ambuscade of Franks suddenly rose from the amphitheatre of Parma his troops were surprised and routed but their leader refused to fly declaring to the last moment that death was less terrible than the angry countenance of Narses The death of Fulcaris and the retreat of the surviving chiefs decided the fluctuating and rebellious temper of the Goths they flew to the standard of their deliverers and admitted them into the cities which still resisted the arms of the Roman general. The conqueror of Italy opened a free passage to the irresistible torrent of barbarians They passed under the walls of Cesena, and answered by threats and reproaches the advice of Aligern that the Gothic treasures

could no longer repay the labour of an invasion Two thousand Franks were destroyed by the skill and valour of Narses himself, who sallied from Rimini at the head of three hundred horse to chastise the licentious rapine of their march On the confines of Samnium the two brothers divided their forces With the right wing Buccelin assumed the spoil of Campania Lucania, and Bruttium, with the left, Lothaire accepted the plunder of Apulia and Calabria They followed the coast of the Mediterranean and the Hadriatic as far as Rhegium and Otranto, and the extreme lands of Italy were the term of their destructive progress The Franks who were Christians and catholics contented themselves with simple pillage and occasional murder But the churches which their piety had spared were stripped by the sacrilegious hands of the Alamanni, who sacrificed horses' heads to their native deities of the woods and rivers,[49] they melted or profaned the consecrated vessels and the ruins of shrines and altars were stained with the blood of the faithful Buccelin was actuated by ambition, and Lothaire by avarice The former aspired to restore the Gothic kingdom the latter after a promise to his brother of speedy succours returned by the same road to deposit his treasure beyond the Alps The strength of their armies was already wasted by the change of climate and contagion of disease the Germans revelled in the vintage of Italy, and their own intemperance avenged in some degree the miseries of a defenceless people

At the entrance of the spring the Imperial troops who had guarded the cities assembled to the number of eighteen thousand men in the neighbourhood of Rome Their winter hours had not been consumed in idleness By the command and after the example of Narses they repeated each day their military exercise on foot and on horseback accustomed their ear to obey the sound of the trumpet and practised the steps and evolutions of the Pyrrhic dance From the straits of Sicily Buccelin with thirty thousand Franks and Alamanni slowly moved towards Capua occupied with a wooden tower the bridge of Casilinum, covered his right by the stream of the Vulturnus and secured the rest of his encampment by a rampart of sharp stakes and a circle of waggons whose wheels were buried in the earth. He impatiently expected the return of Lothaire ignorant alas! that his brother could never return and that the chief and his army had been swept away by a strange disease[50] on the banks of the lake Benacus, between Trent and Verona The banners of Narses soon approached the Vulturnus, and the eyes of Italy were anxiously fixed on the event of this final contest Perhaps the talents of the Roman general were most conspicuous in the calm operations which precede the tumult of a battle His skilful movements intercepted the subsistence of the barbarian deprived him of the advantage of the bridge and river, and in the choice of the ground and moment of action reduced him to comply with the inclination of his enemy On the morning of the important day when the ranks were already formed a servant for some trivial fault was killed by his master one of the leaders of the Heruli The justice or passion of Narses was awakened he summoned the offender to his presence, and without listening to his excuses gave the signal to the minister of death If the cruel master had not infringed the laws of his nation this arbitrary execution was not less unjust than it appears to have been imprudent. The Heruli felt the indignity, they halted but the Roman general without soothing their rage or expecting their resolution, called aloud as the trumpets sounded, that unless they hastened to occupy their place, they would lose the honour of the victory His troops were disposed[51] in a long front the cavalry on the wings in the centre the heavy armed foot the archers and slingers in the rear The Germans advanced in a sharp pointed column of the form of a triangle or solid wedge They pierced the feeble centre of Narses who received them with a smile into the fatal snare and directed his wings of cavalry insensibly to wheel on their flanks and encompass their rear The host of the Franks and Alamanni consisted of infantry a sword and buckler hung by their side and they used as their weapons of offence a weighty hatchet and a hooked javelin which were only formidable in close combat or at a short distance The flower of the Roman archers on horseback and in complete armour skirmished without peril round this immovable phalanx, supplied by active speed the deficiency of number and aimed their arrows against a crowd of barbarians who instead of a cuirass and helmet, were covered by a loose garment of fur or linen They paused they trembled their ranks were confounded and in the decisive moment the Heruli preferring glory to revenge charged with rapid violence the head of the column Their leader Sindbal and Aligern the Gothic prince deserved the prize of superior valour and their example incited the victorious troops achieve with swords and spears the destruction of the enemy Buccelin and the greatest part of his army perished on the field of battle in the waters of the Vulturnus or by the hands of the enraged peasants but it may seem incredible that a victory[52] which no more than five of the Alamanni survived could be purchased with the loss of fourscore Romans. Seven thousand Goths, the relics of the war defended the fortress of Campsa till the ensuing spring and every messenger of Narses announced the reduction of the Italian cities whose names were corrupted by the ignorance or vanity of the Greeks[53] After the battle of Casilinum Narses entered the capital the arms and treasures of the Goths the Franks and the Alamanni were displayed his soldiers with garlands in their hands chanted the praises of the conqueror and Rome for the last time beheld the semblance of a triumph.

After a reign of sixty years the throne of the Gothic kings was filled by the exarchs of Ravenna the representatives in peace and war of the emperor of the Romans Their jurisdiction was soon reduced to the limits of a narrow province but Narses himself the first and most powerful of the exarchs administered above fifteen years the entire kingdom of Italy Like Belisarius, he had deserved the honours of envy calumny and disgrace but the favourite eunuch still enjoyed the confidence of Justinian or the leader of a victorious army awed and repressed the ingratitude of a timid court. Yet it was not by weak and mischievous indulgence that Narses secured the attachment of his troops. Forgetful of the past, and regardless of the future they abused the present hour of prosperity and peace The cities of Italy resounded with the noise of drinking and dancing the spoils of victory were wasted in sensual pleasures and nothing (says Agathias) remained unless to exchange their shields and helmets for the soft lute and the capacious hogshead[54] In a manly oration not unworthy of a Roman censor the eunuch reproved these disorderly vices, which sullied their fame and endangered their safety The soldiers blushed and obeyed discipline was confirmed the fortifications were restored a duke was stationed for the defence and military command of each of the principal cities[55] and the eye of Narses pervaded the ample prospect from Calabria to the Alps The remains of the Gothic nation evacuated the country or mingled with the people the Franks, instead of revenging the death of Buccelin, abandoned, without a struggle, their Italian conquests and the rebellious Sindbal chief of the Heruli was subdued taken, and hung on a lofty gallows by the inflexible justice of the exarch.[56] The civil state of Italy, after the agitation of a long tempest was fixed by a pragmatic sanction, which the emperor promulgated at the request of the pope Justinian introduced his own jurisprudence into the schools and tribunals of the West he ratified the acts of Theodoric and his immediate successors, but every deed was rescinded and abolished which force had extorted or fear had subscribed under the usurpation of Totila. A moderate theory was framed to reconcile the rights of property with the safety of prescription, the claims of the state with the poverty of the people, and the pardon of offences with the interest of virtue and order of society Under the exarchs of Ravenna Rome was degraded to the second rank. Yet the senators were gratified by the permission of visiting their estates in Italy and of approaching without obstacle the throne of Constantinople the regulation of weights and measures was delegated to the pope and senate and the salaries of lawyers and physicians, of orators and grammarians, were destined to preserve or rekindle the light of science in the ancient capital Justinian might dictate benevolent edicts,[57] and Narses might second his wishes by the restoration of cities and more especially of churches But the power of kings is most effectual to destroy and the twenty years of the Gothic war had consummated the distress and depopulation of Italy As early as the fourth campaign under the discipline of Belisarius himself fifty thousand labourers died of hunger[58] in the narrow region of Picenum[59] and a strict interpretation of the evidence of Procopius would swell the loss of Italy above the total sum of her present inhabitants.[60]

I desire to believe but I dare not affirm, that Belisarius sincerely rejoiced in the triumph of Narses Yet the consciousness of his own exploits might teach him to esteem without jealousy the merit of a rival and the repose of the aged warrior was crowned by a last victory which saved the emperor and the capital The barbarians who annually visited the provinces of Europe were less discouraged by some accidental defeats than they were excited by the double hope of spoil and of subsidy In the thirty second winter of Justinian's reign the Danube was deeply frozen Zabergan led the cavalry of the Bulgarians and his standard was followed by a promiscuous multitude of Sclavonians. The savage chief passed without

could no longer repay the labour of an invasion Two thousand Franks were destroyed by the skill and valour of Narses himself, who sallied from Rimini at the head of three hundred horse to chastise the licentious rapine of their march On the confines of Samnium the two brothers divided their forces With the right wing Buccelin assumed the spoil of Campania, Lucania, and Bruttium with the left Lothaire accepted the plunder of Apulia and Calabria They followed the coast of the Mediterranean and the Hadriatic as far as Rhegium and Otranto and the extreme lands of Italy were the term of their destructive progress The Franks who were Christians and catholics contented themselves with simple pillage and occasional murder But the churches which their piety had spared were stripped by the sacrilegious hands of the Alamanni who sacrificed horses heads to their native deities of the woods and rivers [49] they melted or profaned the consecrated vessels, and the ruins of shrines and altars were stained with the blood of the faithful Buccelin was actuated by ambition, and Lothaire by avarice The former aspired to restore the Gothic kingdom the latter after a promise to his brother of speedy succours returned by the same road to deposit his treasure beyond the Alps The strength of their armies was already wasted by the change of climate and contagion of disease the Germans revelled in the vintage of Italy and their own intemperance avenged in some degree the miseries of a defenceless people

At the entrance of the spring the Imperial troops who had guarded the cities assembled to the number of eighteen thousand men, in the neighbourhood of Rome Their winter hours had not been consumed in idleness By the command and after the example of Narses they repeated each day their military exercise on foot and on horseback accustomed their ear to obey the sound of the trumpet and practised the steps and evolutions of the Pyrrhic dance From the straits of Sicily Buccelin with thirty thousand Franks and Alamanni slowly moved towards Capua occupied with a wooden tower the bridge of Casilinum covered his right by the stream of the Vulturnus and secured the rest of his encampment by a rampart of sharp stakes and a circle of waggons whose wheels were buried in the earth He impatiently expected the return of Lothaire ignorant alas! that his brother could never return and that the chief and his army had been swept away by a strange disease[50] on the banks of the lake Benacus, between Trent and Verona The banners of Narses soon approached the Vulturnus, and the eyes of Italy were anxiously fixed on the event of this final contest Perhaps the talents of the Roman general were most conspicuous in the calm operations which precede the tumult of a battle His skilful movements intercepted the subsistence of the barbarian, deprived him of the advantage of the bridge and river and in the choice of the ground and moment of action reduced him to comply with the inclination of his enemy On the morning of the important day when the ranks were already formed, a servant for some trivial fault was killed by his master one of the leaders of the Heruli The justice or passion of Narses was awakened he summoned the offender to his presence, and without listening to his excuses gave the signal to the minister of death. If the cruel master had not infringed the laws of his nation this arbitrary execution was not less unjust than it appears to have been imprudent. The Heruli felt the indignity they halted but the Roman general, without soothing their rage or expecting their resolution called aloud, as the trumpets sounded that unless they hastened to occupy their place, they would lose the honour of the victory His troops were disposed[51] in a long front the cavalry on the wings in the centre the heavy armed foot the archers and slingers in the rear The Germans advanced in a sharp pointed column of the form of a triangle or solid wedge They pierced the feeble centre of Narses who received them with a smile into the fatal snare and directed his wings of cavalry insensibly to wheel on their flanks and encompass their rear The host of the Franks and Alamanni consisted of infantry a sword and buckler hung by their side and they used as their weapons of offence a weighty hatchet and a hooked javelin which were only formidable in close combat or at a short distance The flower of the Roman archers on horseback and in complete armour skirmished without peril round this immovable phalanx, supplied by active speed the deficiency of number and aimed their arrows against a crowd of barbarians who instead of a cuirass and helmet were covered by a loose garment of fur or linen They paused they trembled their ranks were confounded and in the decisive moment the Heruli preferring glory to revenge, charged with rapid violence the head of the column Their leader Sindbal and Aligern the Gothic prince deserved the prize of superior valour and their example incited the victorious troops

hope or terror prepared for the impending tumult The senators themselves, fearful and suspicious were convened at the ninth hour and the præfect received their commands to visit every quarter of the city and proclaim a general illumination for the recovery of the em peror s health. The ferment subsided but every accident betrayed the impotence of the govern ment and the factious temper of the people the guards were disposed to mutiny as often as their quarters were changed or their pay was withheld the frequent calamities of fires and earthquakes afforded the opportunities of dis order the disputes of the blues and greens of the orthodox and heretics d generated into bloody battles and in the presence of the Persian ambassador Justinian blushed for him self and for his subjects Capricious pardon and arbitrary punishment embittered the irksome ness and discontent of a long reign a conspiracy was formed in the palace and unless v e are deceived by the names of Marcellus and Sergius the most virtuous and the most profligate of the courti rs were associated in the same designs They had fixed the time of the execution their rank gave them access to the royal banquet and their black slaves[65] were stationed in the vestibule and porticoes to announce the death of the tyrant and to excite a sedition in the capital But the indiscretion of an accomplice saved the poor remnant of the days of Justinian The conspirators were detected and seized with daggers hidden under their garments Mar ce lus died by his own hand and Sergius was dra ged from th sanctuary[66] Pressed by re morse or tempted by the hopes of safety h accused two officers of the household of Beli sarius and torture forced them to declare that they had acted according to the secret instruc tions of their patron[67] Posterity will not hastily believe that a hero who in the vigour of life had disdained the fairest offers of ambition and re venge should stoop to the murder of his prince whom he could not long expect to survive His followers were impatient to fly but flight must have been supported by rebellion and he had liv d enough for nature and for glory Belisarius appeared before the council with less fear than indignation after forty years' service the em peror had prejudged his guilt and injustice was sanctified by the presence and authority of the patriarch The life of Belis r us was graciously spared but his fortunes were sequestered and from December to July he was guarded as a prisoner in his own palace At length his in nocence was acknowledged his freedom and honours were restored and death which might be hastened by resentment and grief removed him from the world about eight months after his deliverance The name of Belisarius can never die but instead of the funeral the monu ments the statues so justly due to his memory, I only read that his treasures the spoils of the Goths and Vandals were immediately con fiscated by the emperor Some decent portion was reserved however for the use of his widow and as Antonina had much to repent she de voted the last remains of her life and fortune to the foundation of a convent Such is the simple and genuine narrative of the fall of Belisarius and the ingratitude of Justinian "That he was deprived of his eyes and reduced by envy to beg his bread Give a penny to Belisarius the general" is a fiction of later times[68] which has obtained credit, or rather favour as a strange example of the vicissitudes of fortune[69]

If the emperor could rejoice in the death of Belisarius he enjoyed the base satisfaction only eight months, the last period of a reign of thirty eight and a life of eighty three years It would be difficult to trace the character of a prince who is not the most conspicuous object of his own times but the confessions of an enemy may be received as the safest evidence of his virtues The resemblance of Justinian to the bust of Domitian is maliciously urged[70] with the acknowledgment however of a well pro portioned figure a ruddy complexion and a pleasing countenance The emperor was easy of access patient of hearing courteous and affable in discourse and a master of the angry passions which rage with such destructive violence in the breast of a despot Procopius praises his temper to reproach him with calm and de liberate cruelty but in the conspiracies which attacked his authority and person a more candid judge will approve the justice or admire the clemency of Justinian. He excelled in the private virtues of chastity and temperance but the impartial love of beauty would have been less mischievous than his conjugal tenderness for Theodora and his abstemious diet was regulated not by the prudence of a philosopher, but the superstition of a monk. His repasts were short and frugal on solemn fasts he contented himself with water and vegetables and such was his strength as well as fervour that he fre quently passed two days and as many nights without tasting any food The measure of his sleep was not less rigorous after the repose of a single hour the body was awakened by the soul and to the astonishment of his chamber opposition the river and the mountains spread his troops over Macedonia and Thrace, and advanced with no more than seven thousand horse to the long walls which should have defended the territory of Constantinople But the works of man are impotent against the assaults of nature a recent earthquake had shaken the foundations of the walls and the forces of the empire were employed on the distant frontiers of Italy, Africa, and Persia The seven schools [61] or companies of the guards or domestic troops had been augmented to the number of five thousand five hundred men whose ordinary station was in the peaceful cities of Asia But the places of the brave Armenians were insensibly supplied by lazy citizens who purchased an exemption from the duties of civil life without being exposed to the dangers of military service Of such soldiers few could be tempted to sally from the gates and none could be persuaded to remain in the field unless they wanted strength and speed to escape from the Bulgarians The report of the fugitives exaggerated the numbers and fierceness of an enemy who had polluted holy virgins and abandoned new born infants to the dogs and vultures a crowd of rustics imploring food and protection increased the consternation of the city and the tents of Zabergan were pitched at the distance of twenty miles [6] on the banks of a small river which encircles Melanthias and afterwards falls into the Propontis [63] Justinian trembled and those who had only seen the emperor in his old age were pleased to suppose that he had lost the alacrity and vigour of his youth By his command the vessels of gold and silver were removed from the churches in the neighbourhood and even the suburbs of Constantinople the ramparts were lined with trembling spectators the golden gate was crowded with useless generals and tribunes and the senate shared the fatigues and the apprehensions of the populace

But the eyes of the prince and people were directed to a feeble veteran, who was compelled by the public danger to resume the armour in which he had entered Carthage and defended Rome The horses of the royal stables of private citizens and even of the circus were hastily collected the emulation of the old and young was roused by the name of Belisarius and his first encampment was in the presence of a victorious enemy His prudence and the labour of the friendly peasants secured with a ditch and rampart the repose of the night innumerable fires and clouds of dust were artfully contrived to magnify the opinion of his strength his soldiers suddenly passed from despondency to presumption and while ten thousand voices demanded the battle, Belisarius dissembled his knowledge that in the hour of trial he must depend on the firmness of three hundred veterans The next morning the Bulgarian cavalry advanced to the charge. But they heard the shouts of multitudes, they beheld the arms and discipline of the front they were assaulted on the flanks by two ambuscades which rose from the woods their foremost warriors fell by the hand of the aged hero and his guards and the swiftness of their evolutions was rendered useless by the close attack and rapid pursuit of the Romans In this action (so speedy was their flight) the Bulgarians lost only four hundred horse but Constantinople was saved and Zabergan, who felt the hand of a master withdrew to a respectful distance But his friends were numerous in the councils of the emperor, and Belisarius obeyed with reluctance the commands of envy and Justinian which forbade him to achieve the deliverance of his country On his return to the city the people, still conscious of their danger, accompanied his triumph with acclamations of joy and gratitude, which were imputed as a crime to the victorious general But when he entered the palace the courtiers were silent and the emperor after a cold and thankless embrace dismissed him to mingle with the train of slaves Yet so deep was the impression of his glory on the minds of men that Justinian, in the seventy seventh year of his age was encouraged to advance near forty miles from the capital and to inspect in person the restoration of the long wall The Bulgarians wasted the summer in the plains of Thrace, but they were inclined to peace by the failure of their rash attempts on Greece and the Chersonesus A menace of killing their prisoners quickened the payment of heavy ransoms and the departure of Zabergan was hastened by the report that double prowed vessels were built on the Danube to intercept his passage The danger was soon forgotten and a vain question, whether their sovereign had shown more wisdom or weakness amused the idleness of the city [64]

About two years after the last victory of Belisarius the emperor returned from a Thracian journey of health or business or devotion Justinian was afflicted by a pain in his head and his private entry countenanced the rumour of his death Before the third hour of the day the bakers shops were plundered of their bread the houses were shut and every citizen with dictator was cherished and consecrated by the piety of a statesman while his secret superstition referred the comet to the glory of his own times.[79] The fifth visit has been already ascribed to the fifth year of Justinian which coincides with the five hundred and thirty first of the Christian era. And it may deserve notice, that in this, as in the preceding instance the comet was followed, though at a longer interval by a remarkable paleness of the sun. The sixth return, in the year eleven hundred and six is recorded by the chronicles of Europe and China and in the first fervour of the Crusades the Christians and the Mahometans might surmise, with equal reason that it portend d the destruction of the Infidels The seventh phenomenon of one thousand six hundred and eighty was presented to the eyes of an enlightened a [80] The philosophy of Bayle dispelled a prejudice which Milton s muse had so recently adorned that the comet, "from its horrid hair shakes pestilence and war [81] Its road in the eavens was observed with exquisite skill by lamsteed and Cassini and the mathematical ience of Bernoulli, Newton and Halley investi ated the laws of its revolutions At the eigh h eriod, in the year two thousand three hundred nd fifty five their calculations may perhaps e verified by the astronomers of some future apital in the Siberian or American wilderness.

II The near approach of a comet may injure r destroy the globe which we inhabit but the hanges on its surface have been hitherto produced by the action of volcanoes and earth quakes.[82] The nature of the soil may indicate the countries most exposed to these formidable concussions since they are caused by subterraneous fires and such fires are kindled by the union and fermentation of iron and sulphur But their times and effects appear to lie beyond the rea h of human curiosity and the philosopher will discreetly abstain from the prediction of earthquakes till he has counted the drops of water that silently filtrate on the inflammable mineral and measured the caverns which increase by resistance the explosion of the imprisoned air Without assigning the cause history will distinguish the periods in which these calamitous events have been rare or frequent, and will observe that this fever of the earth raged with uncommon violence during the reign of Justinian.[83] Each year is marked by th repetition of earthquakes of such duration that Constantinople has been shaken above forty days of such extent that the shock has been communicated to the whole surface of the globe or at least of the Roman empire An impulsive or vibratory motion was felt enormous chasms were opened huge and heavy bodies were discharged into the air the sea alternately advanced and retreated beyond its ordinary bounds and a mountain was torn from Libanus [84] and cast into the waves, where it protected, as a mole, the new harbour of Botrys[85] in Phœnicia The stroke that agitates an ant hill may crush the insect myriads in the dust yet truth must extort a confession that man has industriously laboured for his own destruction. The institution of great cit es, which include a nation within the limits of a wall almost realises the wish of Caligula that the Roman people had but one neck. Two hundred and fifty thousand persons are said to have perished in the earthquake of Antioch whose domestic multitudes were swelled by the conflux of strangers to the festival of the Ascension. The loss of Berytus [86] was of smaller account but of much greater value That city on the coast of Phœnicia was illustrated by the study of the civil law which opened the surest road to wealth and dignity the schools of Berytus were filled with the rising spirits of the age and many a youth was lost in the earthquake who might have lived to be the scourge or the guardian of his country In these disasters the architect becomes the enemy of mankind. The hut of a savage or the tent of an Arab may be thrown down without injury to the inhabitant and the Peruvians had reason to deride the folly of their Spanish conquerors who with so much cost and labour erected their own sepulchres The rich marbles of a patrician are dashed on his own head a whole people is buried under the ruins of pub lic and private edifices and the conflagration is kindled and propagated by the innumerable fires which are necessary for the subsistence and manufactures of a great city Instead of the mutual sympathy which might comfort and assist the distressed they dread fully experience the vices and passions which are released from the fear of punishment the tottering houses are pillaged by intrepid avarice revenge embraces the moment and selects the victim and the earth often swallows the assassin or the ravisher in the consummation of their crimes Superstition involves the present danger with invisible terrors and if the image of death may sometimes be subservient to the virtue or repentance of individuals an affrighted people is more forcibly moved to expect the end of the world or to deprecate with servile homage the wrath of an avenging Deity

lains Justinian walked or studied till the morning light Such restless application prolonged his time for the acquisition of knowledge[72] and the despatch of business, and he might seriously deserve the reproach of confounding, by minute and preposterous diligence, the general order of his administration The emperor professed himself a musician and architect, a poet and philosopher, a lawyer and theologian and if he failed in the enterprise of reconciling the Christian sects, the review of the Roman jurisprudence is a noble monument of his spirit and industry In the government of the empire he was less wise or less successful the age was unfortunate, the people was oppressed and discontented, Theodora abused her power a succession of bad ministers disgraced his judgment, and Justinian was neither beloved in his life nor regretted at his death The love of fame was deeply implanted in his breast but he condescended to the poor ambition of titles honours and contemporary praise and while he laboured to fix the admiration, he forfeited the esteem and affection, of the Romans The design of the African and Italian wars was boldly conceived and executed and his penetration discovered the talents of Belisarius in the camp, of Narses in the palace But the name of the emperor is eclipsed by the names of his victorious generals and Belisarius still lives to upbraid the envy and ingratitude of his sovereign The partial favour of mankind applauds the genius of a conqueror who leads and directs his subjects in the exercise of arms The characters of Philip the Second and of Justinian are distinguished by the cold ambition which delights in war and declines the dangers of the field Yet a colossal statue of bronze represented the emperor on horseback preparing to march against the Persians in the habit and armour of Achilles In the great square before the church of St Sophia this monument was raised on a brass column and a stone pedestal of seven steps and the pillar of Theodosius, which weighed seven thousand four hundred pounds of silver was removed from the same place by the avarice and vanity of Justinian Future princes were more just or indulgent to his memory the elder Andronicus in the beginning of the fourteenth century, repaired and beautified his equestrian statue since the fall of the empire it has been melted into cannon by the victorious Turks[73]

I shall conclude this chapter with the comets the earthquakes and the plague, which astonished or afflicted the age of Justinian.

I In the fifth year of his reign, and in the month of September a comet[74] was seen during twenty days in the western quarter of the heavens, and which shot its rays into the north Eight years afterwards, while the sun was in Capricorn another comet appeared to follow in the Sagittary the size was gradually increasing the head was in the east, the tail in the west, and it remained visible above forty days The nations, who gazed with astonishment expected wars and calamities from their baleful influence and these expectations were abundantly fulfilled The astronomers dissembled their ignorance of the nature of these blazing stars which they affected to represent as the floating meteors of the air and few among them embraced the simple notion of Seneca and the Chaldæans, that they are only planets of a longer period and more eccentric motion [75] Time and science have justified the conjectures and predictions of the Roman sage the telescope has opened new worlds to the eyes of astronomers,[76] and, in the narrow space of history and fable, one and the same comet is already found to have visited the earth in seven equal revolutions of five hundred and seventy five years The first,[77] which ascends beyond the Christian era one thousand seven hundred and sixty seven years is coëval with Ogyges the father of Grecian antiquity And this appearance explains the tradition which Varro has preserved that under his reign the planet Venus changed her colour, size figure and course a prodigy without example either in past or succeeding ages [78] The second visit in the year eleven hundred and ninety three is darkly implied in the fable of Electra the seventh of the Pleiads who have been reduced to six since the time of the Trojan war That nymph the wife of Dardanus was unable to support the ruin of her country she abandoned the dances of her sister orbs fled from the zodiac to the north pole and obtained, from her dishevelled locks the name of the comet The third period expires in the year six hundred and eighteen a date that exactly agrees with the tremendous comet of the Sibyl and perhaps of Pliny which arose in the West two generations before the reign of Cyrus The fourth apparition forty four years before the birth of Christ is of all others the most splendid and important After the death of Cæsar a long haired star was conspicuous to Rome and to the nations during the games which were exhibited by young Octavian in honour of Venus and his uncle The vulgar opinion that it conveyed to heaven the divine soul of the

and emigrations and the pestilential odour which lurks for years in a bale of cotton was imported, by the abuse of trade into the most distant regions The mode of its propagation is explained by the remark of Procopius himself, that it always spread from the sea-coast to the inland country the most sequestered islands and mountains were successively visited the places which had escaped the fury of its first passage were alone exposed to the contagion of the ensuing year The winds might diffuse that subtle venom but unless the atmosphere be previously disposed for its reception, the plague would soon expire in the cold or temperate climates of the earth Such was the universal corruption of the air that the pestilence which burst forth in the fifteenth year of Justinian was not checked or alleviated by any difference of the seasons. In time its first malignity was abated and dispersed the disease alternately languished and revived but it was not till the end of a calamitous period of fifty two years that mankind recovered their health, or the air resumed its pure and salubrious quality No facts have been preserved to sustain an account or even a conjecture of the numbers that perished in this extraordinary mortality I only find that during three months five and at length ten thousand persons died each day at Constantinople that many cities of the East were l ft vacant and that in several districts of Italy the harvest and the vintage withered on the ground The triple scourge of war pestilence and famine afflicted the subjects of Justinian and his reign is disgraced by a visible decrease of the human species which has never been repaired in some of the fairest countries of the globe [95]

CHAPTER XLIV

Idea of the Roman Jurisprudence The Laws of the Kings The Twelve Tables of the Decemvirs The Laws of the People The Decrees of the Senate The Edicts of the Magistrates and Emperors Authority of the Civilians Code, Pandects, Novels, and Institutes of Justinian I Rights of Persons II Rights of Things III Private Injuries and Actions IV Crimes and Punishments

THE vain titles of the victories of Justinian are crumbled into dust but the name of the legislator is inscribed on a fair and everlasting monument Under his reign and by his care the civil jurisprudence was digested in the immortal works of the CODE the PANDECTS, and the INSTITUTES [1] the public reason of the Romans has been silently or studiously transfused into the domestic institutions of Europe [2] and the laws of Justinian still command the respect or obedience of independ nt nations Wise or fortunate is the prince who connects his own reputation with the honour and interest of a perpetual order of men The defence of their founder is the first cause which in every age has exercised the zeal and industry of the civilians They piously comm morate his virtues dissemble or deny his failings and fi rcely chastise the guilt or folly of the rebels who presume to sully the ma esty of the purple Th idolatry of love has provoked as it usually happens the rancour of opposition the character of Justinian has been exposed to the blind vehemence of flattery and invective and the injustice of a sect (the Anti Tribonians) has refused all praise and merit to the prince his ministers and his laws [3] Attached to no party interested only for the truth and candour of history and directed by the most temperate and skilful guides [4] I enter with just diffidence on the subject of civil law, which has exhausted so many learned lives and clothed the walls of such spacious libraries In a single if possible in a short chapter I shall trace the Roman jurisprudence from Romulus to Justinian,[5] appreciate the labours of that emperor and pause to contemplate the principles of a science so important to the peace and happiness of society The laws of a nation form the most instructive portion of its history and although I have devoted myself to write the annals of a declining monarchy I shall embrace the occasion to breathe the pure and invigorating air of the republic.

The primitive government of Rome[6] was composed with some political skill of an elective king a council of nobles and a general assembly of the people War and religion were administered by the supreme magistrate and he alone proposed the laws which were debated in the senate and finally ratified or rejected by a

III Æthiopia and Egypt have been stigmatised in every age as the original source and seminary of the plague [87] In a damp hot stagnating air this African fever is generated from the putrefaction of animal substances and especially from the swarms of locusts not less destructive to mankind in their death than in their lives The fatal disease which depopulated the earth in the time of Justinian and his successors [88] first appeared in the neighbourhood of Pelusium, between the Serbonian bog and the eastern channel of the Nile From thence tracing as it were a double path it spread to the East, over Syria Persia and the Indies, and penetrated to the West, along the coast of Africa and over the continent of Europe In the spring of the second year Constantinople, during three or four months was visited by the pestilence, and Procopius who observed its progress and symptoms with the eyes of a physician,[89] has emulated the skill and diligence of Thucydides in the description of the plague of Athens [90] The infection was sometimes announced by the visions of a distempered fancy and the victim despaired as soon as he had heard the menace and felt the stroke of an invisible spectre But the greater number in their beds in the streets, in their usual occupation were surprised by a slight fever, so slight indeed, that neither the pulse nor the colour of the patient gave any signs of the approaching danger The same the next, or the succeeding day it was declared by the swelling of the glands particularly those of the groin of the armpits and under the ear, and when these buboes or tumours were opened, they were found to contain a coal or black substance, of the size of a lentil If they came to a just swelling and suppuration the patient was saved by this kind and natural discharge of the morbid humour but if they continued hard and dry a mortification quickly ensued and the fifth day was commonly the term of his life The fever was often accompanied with lethargy or delirium the bodies of the sick were covered with black pustules or carbuncles, the symptoms of immediate death and in the constitutions too feeble to produce an eruption the vomiting of blood was followed by a mortification of the bowels To pregnant women the plague was generally mortal yet one infant was drawn alive from his dead mother, and three mothers survived the loss of their infected fœtus Youth was the most perilous season and the female sex was less susceptible than the male but every rank and profession was attacked with indiscriminate rage and many of those who escaped were deprived of the use of their speech, without being secure from a return of the disorder [91] The physicians of Constantinople were zealous and skilful but their art was baffled by the various symptoms and pertinacious vehemence of the disease the same remedies were productive of contrary effects, and the event capriciously disappointed their prognostics of death or recovery The order of funerals and the right of sepulchres were confounded those who were left without friends or servants lay unburied in the streets, or in their desolate houses and a magistrate was authorised to collect the promiscuous heaps of dead bodies, to transport them by land or water, and to inter them in deep pits beyond the precincts of the city Their own danger and the prospect of public distress awakened some remorse in the minds of the most vicious of mankind the confidence of health again revived their passions and habits, but philosophy must disdain the observation of Procopius that the lives of such men were guarded by the peculiar favour of fortune or Providence He forgot or perhaps he secretly recollected that the plague had touched the person of Justinian himself but the abstemious diet of the emperor may suggest as in the case of Socrates a more rational and honourable cause for his recovery [92] During his sickness the public consternation was expressed in the habits of the citizens and their idleness and despondence occasioned a general scarcity in the capital of the East

Contagion is the inseparable symptom of the plague which, by mutual respiration is transfused from the infected persons to the lungs and stomach of those who approach them While philosophers believe and tremble, it is singular that the existence of a real danger should have been denied by a people most prone to vain and imaginary terrors [93] Yet the fellow-citizens of Procopius were satisfied by some short and partial experience that the infection could not be gained by the closest conversation [94] and this persuasion might support the assiduity of friends or physicians in the care of the sick whom inhuman prudence would have condemned to solitude and despair But the fatal security like the predestination of the Turks must have aided the progress of the contagion and those salutary precautions to which Europe is indebted for her safety were unknown to the government of Justinian No restraints were imposed on the free and frequent intercourse of the Roman provinces from Persia to France the nations were mingled and infected by wars

fous jurisprudence of Draco of Solon and of Lycurgus The Twelve Tables were committed to the memory of the young and the meditation of the old they were transcribed and illustrated with learned diligence they had escaped the flames of the Gauls they subsisted in the age of Justinian and their subsequent loss has been imperfectly restored by the labours of modern critics [32] But although these venerable monuments were considered as the rule of right and the fountain of justice [33] they were overwhelmed by the weight and variety of new laws which, at the end of five centuries became a grievance more intolerable than the vices of the city [34] Three thousand brass plates, the acts of the senate and people were deposited in the Capitol [35] and some of the acts, as the Julian law against extortion surpassed the number of a hundred chapters [36] The Decemvirs had neglected to import the sanction of Zaleucus which so long maintained the integrity of his republic. A Locrian who proposed any new law stood forth in the assembly of the people with a cord round his neck and if the law was rejected the innovator was instantly strangled

The Decemvirs had been named and their tables were approved by an assembly of the centuries in which riches preponderated against numbers To the first class of Romans the proprietors of one hundred thousand pounds of copper [37] ninety-eight votes were assigned and only ninety five were left for the six inferior classes distributed according to their substance by the artful policy of Servius But the tribunes soon established a more specious and popular maxim, that every citizen has an equal right to enact the laws which he is bound to obey Instead of the centuries they convened the tribes and the patricians after an impotent struggle submitted to the decrees of an assembly in which their votes were confounded with those of the meanest plebeians. Yet as long as the tribes successively passed over narrow bridges [38] and gave their voices aloud the conduct of each citizen was exposed to the eyes and ears of his friends and countrymen The insolvent debtor consulted the wishes of his creditor the client would have blushed to oppose the views of his patron, the general was followed by his *veter*ans and the aspect of a grave magistrate was a living lesson to the multitude A new method of secret ballot abolished the influence of fear and shame of honour and interest and the abuse of freedom accelerated the progress of anarchy and despotism [39] The Romans had aspired to be equal, they were levelled by the equality of servitude and the dictates of Augustus were patiently ratified by the formal consent of the tribes or centuries Once and once only he experienced a sincere and strenuous opposition. His subjects had resigned all political liberty they defended the freedom of domestic life A law which enforced the obligation and strengthened the bonds of marriage was clamorously rejected Propertius in the arms of Delia applauded the victory of licentious love and the project of reform was suspended till a new and more tractable generation had arisen in the world [40] Such an example was not necessary to instruct a prudent usurper of the mischief of popular assemblies and their abolition which Augustus had silently prepared was accomplished without resistance and almost without notice on the accession of his successor [41] Sixty thousand plebeian legislators whom numbers made formidable and poverty secure were supplanted by six hundred senators who held their honours their fortunes and their lives by the clemency of the emperor The loss of executive power was alleviated by the gift of legislative authority and Ulpian might assert after the practice of two hundred years, that the decrees of the senate obtained the force and validity of laws In the times of freedom the resolves of the people had often been dictated by the passion or error of the moment the Cornelian Pompeian and Julian laws were adapted by a single hand to the prevailing disorders but the senate under the reign of the Cæsars was composed of magistrates and lawyers and in questions of private jurisprudence the integrity of their judgment was seldom perverted by fear or interest [42]

The silence or ambiguity of the laws was supplied by the occasional edicts of those magistrates who were invested with the honours of the state [43] This ancient prerogative of the Roman kings was transferred in their respective offices to the consuls and dictators the censors and prætors and a similar right was assumed by the tribunes of the people the ædiles and the pro*consuls* At Rome, and in the provinces the duties of the subject and the intentions of the governor were proclaimed and the civil jurisprudence was reformed by the annual edicts of the supreme judge the prætor of the city As soon as he ascended his tribunal he announced by the voice of the crier and afterwards inscribed on a white wall the rules which he proposed to follow in the decision of doubtful cases and the relief which his equity would afford from the precise rigour of ancient statutes A majority of votes in the thirty curiæ or parishes of the city Romulus Numa and Servius Tullius are celebrated as the most ancient legislators and each of them claims his peculiar part in the threefold division of jurisprudence [7] The laws of marriage the education of children and the authority of parents, which may seem to draw their origin from nature itself are ascribed to the untutored wisdom of Romulus The law of nations and of religious worship, which Numa introduced was derived from his nocturnal converse with the nymph Egeria The civil law is attributed to the experience of Servius he balanced the rights and fortunes of the seven classes of citizens and guarded by fifty new regulations the observance of contracts and the punishment of crimes The state which he had inclined towards a democracy, was changed by the last Tarquin into lawless despotism and when the kingly office was abolished the patricians engrossed the benefits of freedom The royal laws became odious or obsolete, the mysterious deposit was silently preserved by the priests and nobles and at the end of sixty years the citizens of Rome still complained that they were ruled by the arbitrary sentence of the magistrates Yet the positive institutions of the kings had blended themselves with the public and private manners of the city some fragments of that venerable jurisprudence[8] were compiled by the diligence of antiquarians [9] and above twenty texts still speak the rudeness of the Pelasgic idiom of the Latins [10]

I shall not repeat the well known story of the Decemvirs [11] who sullied by their actions the honour of inscribing on brass or wood, or ivory, the TWELVE TABLES of the Roman laws [12] They were dictated by the rigid and jealous spirit of an aristocracy which had yielded with reluctance to the just demands of the people But the substance of the Twelve Tables was adapted to the state of the city, and the Romans had emerged from barbarism since they were capable of studying and embracing the institutions of their more enlightened neighbours A wise Ephesian was driven by envy from his native country before he could reach the shores of Latium he had observed the various forms of human nature and civil society he imparted his knowledge to the legislators of Rome and a statue was erected in the forum to the perpetual memory of Hermodorus [13] The names and divisions of the copper money the sole coin of the infant state were of Dorian origin [14] the harvests of Campania and Sicily relieved the wants of a people whose agriculture was often interrupted by war and faction and since the trade was established [15] the deputies who sailed from the Tiber might return from the same harbours with a more precious cargo of political wisdom. The colonies of Great Greece had transported and improved the arts of their mother-country Cumæ and Rhegium Crotona and Tarentum, Agrigentum and Syracuse were in the rank of the most flourishing cities The disciples of Pythagoras applied philosophy to the use of government the unwritten laws of Charondas accepted the aid of poetry and music [16] and Zaleucus framed the republic of the Locrains which stood without alteration above two hundred years [17] From a similar motive of national pride both Livy and Dionysius are willing to believe that the deputies of Rome visited Athens under the wise and splendid administration of Pericles and the laws of Solon were transfused into the Twelve Tables If such an embassy had indeed been received from the barbarians of Hesperia the Roman name would have been familiar to the Greeks before the reign of Alexander [18] and the faintest evidence would have been explored and celebrated by the curiosity of succeeding times But the Athenian monuments are silent nor will it seem credible that the patricians should undertake a long and perilous navigation to copy the purest model of a democracy In the comparison of the tables of Solon with those of the Decemvirs some casual resemblance may be found some rules which nature and reason have revealed to every society some proofs of a common descent from Egypt or Phœnicia [19] But in all the great lines of public and private jurisprudence the legislators of Rome and Athens appear to be strangers or adverse to each other

Whatever might be the origin or the merit of the Twelve Tables [20] they obtained among the Romans that blind and partial reverence which the lawyers of every country delight to bestow on their municipal institutions The study is recommended by Cicero [1] as equally pleasant and instructive They amuse the mind by the remembrance of old words and the portrait of ancient manners they inculcate the soundest principles of government and morals and I am not afraid to affirm that the brief composition of the Decemvirs surpasses in genuine value the libraries of Grecian philosophy How admirable says Tully with honest or affected prejudice is the wisdom of our ancestors! We alone are the masters of civil prudence and our superiority is the more conspicuous if we deign to cast our eyes on the rude and almost ridicu jurisprudence the absolute sovereign of a great empire can seldom be influenced by any personal considerations Virtue or even reason, will suggest to his impartial mind that he is the guardian of peace and equity and that the interest of society is inseparably connected with his own. Under the weakest and most vicious reign the seat of justice was filled by the wisdom and integrity of Papinian and Ulpian,[43] and the purest materials of the Code and Pandects are inscribed with the names of Caracalla and his ministers [44] The tyrant of Rome was sometimes the benefactor of the provinces. A dagger terminated the crimes of Domitian but the prudence of Nerva confirmed his acts which in the joy of their deliverance, had been rescinded by an indignant senate [45] Yet in the rescripts [46] replies to the consultations of the magistrates, the wisest of princes might be deceived by a partial exposition of the case. And this abuse which placed their hasty decisions on the same level with mature and deliberate acts of legislation was ineffectually condemned by the sense and example of Trajan. The rescripts of the emperor his grants and decrees his edicts and pragmatic sanctions were subscribed in purple ink,[47] and transmitted to the provinces as general or special laws which the magistrates were bound to execute and the people to obey But as their number continually multiplied the rule of obedience became each day more doubtful and obscure till the will of the sovereign was fixed and ascertained in the Gregorian, the Hermogenian and the Theodosian codes The two first of which some fragments have escaped, were framed by two private lawyers to preserve the constitutions of the Pagan emperors from Hadrian to Constantine The third which is still extant was digested in sixteen books by the order of the younger Theodosius to consecrate the laws of the Christian princes from Constantine to his own reign But the three codes obtained an equal authority in the tribunals and any act which was not included in the sacred deposit might be disregarded by the judge as spurious or obsolete [48]

Among savage nations the want of letters is imperfectly supplied by the use of visible signs, which awaken attention and perpetuate the remembrance of any public or private transaction The jurisprudence of the first Romans exhibited the scenes of a pantomime the words were adapted to the gesture and the slightest error or neglect in the forms of proceeding was sufficient to annul the substance of the fairest claim. The communion of the marriage life was denoted by the necessary elements of fire and water [49] and the divorced wife resigned the bunch of keys by the delivery of which she had been invested with the government of the family The manumission of a son or a slave was performed by turning him round with a gentle blow on the cheek a work was prohibited by the casting of a stone prescription was interrupted by the breaking of a branch the clenched fist was the symbol of a pledge or deposit the right hand was the gift of faith and confidence The indenture of covenants was a broken straw weights and scales were introduced into every payment and the heir who accepted a testament was sometimes obliged to snap his fingers, to cast away his garments and to leap and dance with real or affected transport [50] If a c[illegible] pursued any stolen goods into a neighbour's house he concealed his nakedness with a linen towel and hid his face with a mask or basin lest he should encounter the eyes of a virgin or a matron [51] In a civil action the plaintiff touched the ear of his witness seized his reluctant adversary by the neck, and implored in solemn lamentation the aid of his fellow-citizens The two competitors grasped each other's hand as if they stood prepared for combat before the tribunal of the prætor he commanded them to produce the object of the dispute they went they returned with measured steps and a clod of earth was cast at his feet to represent the field for which they contended This occult science of the words and actions of law was the inheritance of the pontiffs and patricians Like the Chaldæan astrologers, they announced to their clients the days of business and repose these important trifles were interwoven with the religion of Numa and after the publication of the Twelve Tables the Roman people was still enslaved by the ignorance of judicial proceedings. The treachery of some plebeian officers at length revealed the profitable mystery in a more enlightened age the legal actions were derided and observed and the same antiquity which sanctified the practice obliterated the use and meaning of this primitive language [52]

A more liberal art was cultivated however by the sages of Rome who in a stricter sense may be considered as the authors of the civil law The alteration of the idiom and manners of the Romans rendered the style of the Twelve Tables less familiar to each rising generation, and the doubtful passages were imperfectly explained by the study of legal antiquarians To define the ambiguities to circumscribe the latitude to apply the principles to extend the con

principle of discretion more congenial to monarchy was introduced into the republic the art of respecting the name and eluding the efficacy of the laws was improved by successive prætors subtleties and fictions were invented to defeat the plainest meaning of the Decemvirs and where the end was salutary, the means were frequently absurd The secret or probable wish of the dead was suffered to prevail over the order of succession and the forms of testaments, and the claimant who was excluded from the character of heir, accepted with equal pleasure from an indulgent prætor the possession of the goods of his late kinsman or benefactor In the redress of private wrongs compensations and fines were substituted to the obsolete rigour of the Twelve Tables time and space were annihilated by fanciful suppositions and the plea of youth or fraud or violence annulled the obligation or excused the performance of an inconvenient contract A jurisdiction thus vague and arbitrary was exposed to the most dangerous abuse the substance as well as the form of justice were often sacrificed to the prejudices of virtue the bias of laudable affection and the grosser seductions of interest or resentment But the errors or vices of each prætor expired with his annual office such maxims alone as had been approved by reason and practice were copied by succeeding judges the rule of proceeding was defined by the solution of new cases and the temptations of injustice were removed by the Cornelian law which compelled the prætor of the year to adhere to the letter and spirit of his first proclamation [34] It was reserved for the curiosity and learning of Hadrian to accomplish the design which had been conceived by the genius of Cæsar and the prætorship of Salvius Julian an eminent lawyer was immortalised by the composition of the PERPETUAL EDICT This well digested code was ratified by the emperor and the senate the long divorce of law and equity was at length reconciled and instead of the Twelve Tables the Perpetual Edict was fixed as the invariable standard of civil jurisprudence [35]

From Augustus to Trajan the modest Cæsars were content to promulgate their edicts in the various characters of a Roman magistrate and in the decrees of the senate the epistles and orations of the prince were respectfully inserted Hadrian[36] appears to have been the first who assumed without disguise the plenitude of legislative power And this innovation so agreeable to his active mind was countenanced by the patience of the times and his long absence from the seat of government The same policy was embraced by succeeding monarchs, and according to the harsh metaphor of Tertullian, "the gloomy and intricate forest of ancient laws was cleared away by the axe of royal mandates and constitutions" [37] During four centuries from Hadrian to Justinian the public and private jurisprudence was moulded by the will of the sovereign and few institutions, either human or divine were permitted to stand on their former basis The origin of Imperial legislation was concealed by the darkness of ages and the terrors of armed despotism and a double fiction was propagated by the servility, or perhaps the ignorance of the civilians who basked in the sunshine of the Roman and Byzantine courts. 1 To the prayer of the ancient Cæsars the people or the senate had sometimes granted a personal exemption from the obligation and penalty of particular statutes and each indulgence was an act of jurisdiction exercised by the republic over the first of her citizens His humble privilege was at length transformed into the prerogative of a tyrant, and the Latin expression of released from the laws [38] was supposed to exalt the emperor above all human restraints and to leave his conscience and reason as the sacred measure of his conduct 2 A similar dependence was implied in the decrees of the senate which in every reign defined the titles and powers of an elective magistrate But it was not before the ideas and even the language of the Romans had been corrupted that a royal law [39] and an irrevocable gift of the people were created by the fancy of Ulpian or more probably of Tribonian himself [40] and the origin of Imperial power though false in fact and slavish in its consequence was supported on a principle of freedom and justice The pleasure of the emperor has the vigour and effect of law since the Roman people by the royal law have transferred to their prince the full extent of their own power and sovereignty [41] The will of a single man of a child perhaps was allowed to prevail over the wisdom of ages and the inclinations of millions and the degenerate Greeks were proud to declare that in his hands alone the arbitrary exercise of legislation could be safely deposited

What interest or passion exclaims Theophilus in the court of Justinian can reach the calm and sublime elevation of the monarch? he is already master of the lives and fortunes of his subjects and those who have incurred his displeasure are already numbered with the dead [42] Disdaining the language of flattery the historian may confess that in questions of private gin the wisdom and justice of the Roman constitution. The whole universe according to his sublime hypothesis forms one immense commonwealth gods and men who participate of the same essence are members of the same community reason prescribes the law of nature and nations and all positive institutions, however modified by accident or custom are drawn from the rule of right which the Deity has inscribed on every virtuous mind From these philosophical mysteries he mildly excludes the sceptics who refuse to believe and the epicureans who are unwilling to act The latter disdain the care of the republic he advises them to slumber in their shady gardens But he humbly entreats that the new Academy would be silent since her bold objections would too soon destroy the fair and well-ordered structure of his lofty system [51] Plato Aristotle and Zeno he represents as the only teachers who arm and instruct a citizen for the duties of social life Of these the armour of the stoics[16] was found to be of the firmest temper and it was chiefly worn both for use and ornament in the schools of jurisprudence From the Portico the Roman civilians learned to live to reason and to die but they imbibed in some degree the prejudices of the sect the love of paradox the pertinacious habits of dispute and a minute attachment to words and verbal distinctions The superiority of form to matter was introduced to ascertain the right of property and the equality of crimes is countenanced by an opinion of Trebatius [53] that he who touches the ear touches the whole body and that he who steals from a heap of corn or a hogshead of wine is guilty of the entire theft [54]

Arms eloquence and the study of the civil law promoted a citizen to the honours of the Roman state and the three professions were sometimes more conspicuous by their union in the same character In the composition of the edict a learned praetor gave a sanction and preference to his private sentiments the opinion of a censor or a consul was entertained with respect and a doubtful interpretation of the laws might be supported by the virtues or triumphs of the civilian The patrician arts were long protected by the veil of mystery and in more enlightened times the freedom of inquiry established the general principles of jurisprudence Subtle and intricate cases were elucidated by the disputes of the forum rules axioms and definitions[59] were admitted as the genuine dictates of reason and the consent of the legal professors was interwoven into the practice of the tribunals But these interpreters could neither enact nor execute the laws of the republic and the judges might disregard the authority of the Scaevolas themselves which was often overthrown by the eloquence or sophistry of an ingenious pleader [56] Augustus and Tiberius were the first to adopt as a useful engine the science of the civilians and their servile labours accommodated the old system to the spirit and views of despotism Under the fair pretence of securing the dignity of the art the privilege of subscribing legal and valid opinions was confined to the sages of senatorian or equestrian rank who had been previously approved by the judgment of the prince and this monopoly prevailed till Hadrian restored the freedom of the profession to every citizen conscious of his abilities and knowledge The discretion of the praetor was now governed by the lessons of his teachers the judges were enjoined to obey the comment as well as the text of the law and the use of codicils was a memorable innovation which Augustus ratified by the advice of the civilians [57]

The most absolute mandate could only require that the judges should agree with the civilians if the civilians agreed among themselves But positive institutions are often the result of custom and prejudice laws and language are ambiguous and arbitrary where reason is incapable of pronouncing the love of argument is inflamed by the envy of rivals the vanity of masters the blind attachment of their disciples and the Roman jurisprudence was divided by the once famous sects of the Proculians and Sabinians [58] Two sages of the law Ateius Capito and Antistius Labeo [59] adorned the peace of the Augustan age the former distinguished by the favour of his sovereign the latter more illustrious by his contempt of that favour and his stern though harmless opposition to the tyrant of Rome. Their legal studies were influenced by the various colours of their temper and principles Labeo was attached to the form of the old republic his rival embraced the more profitable substance of the rising monarchy But the disposition of a courtier is tame and submissive and Capito seldom presumed to deviate from the sentiments or at least from the words of his predecessors while the bold republican pursued his independent ideas without fear of paradox or innovations The freedom of Labeo was enslaved however by the rigour of his own conclusions and he decided according to the letter of the law the same questions which his indulgent competitor resolved with a

sequences, to reconcile the real or apparent contradictions was a much nobler and more important task and the province of legislation was silently invaded by the expounders of ancient statutes Their subtle interpretations concurred with the equity of the prætor to reform the tyranny of the darker ages however strange or intricate the means it was the aim of artificial jurisprudence to restore the simple dictates of nature and reason and the skill of private citizens was usefully employed to undermine the public institutions of their country The revolution of almost one thousand years from the Twelve Tables to the reign of Justinian, may be divided into three periods almost equal in duration and distinguished from each other by the mode of instruction and the character of the civilians [53] Pride and ignorance contributed during the first period to confine within narrow limits the science of the Roman law On the public days of market or assembly the masters of the art were seen walking in the forum ready to impart the needful advice to the meanest of their fellow citizens from whose votes on a future occasion they might solicit a grateful return As their years and honours increased they seated themselves at home on a chair or throne to expect with patient gravity the visits of their clients who at the dawn of day from the town and country, began to thunder at their door The duties of social life and the incidents of judicial proceeding were the ordinary subject of these consultations and the verbal or written opinions of the juris consults was framed according to the rules of prudence and law The youths of their own order and family were permitted to listen their children enjoyed the benefit of more private lessons and the Mucian race was long renowned for the hereditary knowledge of the civil law The second period, the learned and splendid age of jurisprudence may be extended from the birth of Cicero to the reign of Severus Alexander A system was formed schools were instituted books were composed and both the living and the dead became subservient to the instruction of the student The tripartite of Ælius Pætus surnamed Catus or the Cunning was preserved as the oldest work of jurisprudence Cato the censor derived some additional fame from his legal studies and those of his son the kindred appellation of Mucius Scævola was illustrated by three sages of the law, but the perfection of the science was ascribed to Servius Sulpicius their disciple and the friend of Tully and the long succession which shone with equal lustre under the republic and under the Cæsars is finally closed by the respectable characters of Papinian of Paul, and of Ulpian Their names and the various titles of their productions, have been minutely preserved and the example of Labeo may suggest some idea of their diligence and fecundity That eminent lawyer of the Augustan age divided the year between the city and country between business and composition, and four hundred books are enumerated as the fruit of his retirement Of the collections of his rival Capito the two hundred and fifty ninth book is expressly quoted, and few teachers could deliver their opinions in less than a century of volumes In the third period, between the reigns of Alexander and Justinian the oracles of jurisprudence were almost mute The measure of curiosity had been filled the throne was occupied by tyrants and barbarians the active spirits were diverted by religious disputes and the professors of Rome Constantinople and Berytus were humbly content to repeat the lessons of their more enlightened predecessors From the slow advances and rapid decay of these legal studies it may be inferred that they require a state of peace and refinement From the multitude of voluminous civilians who fill the intermediate space it is evident that such studies may be pursued and such works may be performed with a common share of judgment experience and industry The genius of Cicero and Virgil was more sensibly felt as each revolving age had been found incapable of producing a similar or a second but the most eminent teachers of the law were assured of leaving disciples equal or superior to themselves in merit and reputation

The jurisprudence which had been grossly adapted to the wants of the first Romans was polished and improved in the seventh century of the city by the alliance of Grecian philosophy The Scævolas had been taught by use and experience but Servius Sulpicius was the first civilian who established his art on a certain and general theory [54] For the discernment of truth and falsehood he applied as an infallible rule the logic of Aristotle and the stoics reduced particular cases to general principles and diffused over the shapeless mass the light of order and eloquence Cicero his contemporary and friend declined the reputation of a professed lawyer but the jurisprudence of his country was adorned by his incomparable genius which converts into gold every object that it touches After the example of Plato he composed a republic and for the use of his republic a treatise of laws in which he labours to deduce from a celestial ori stored and till the hour of his death, he possessed above twenty years the favour and confidence of the emperor His passive and dutiful submission has been honoured with the praise of Justinian himself whose vanity was incapable of discerning how often that submission degenerated into the grossest adulation. Tribonian adored the virtues of his gracious master the earth was unworthy of such a prince and he affected a pious fear that Justinian like Elijah or Romulus would be snatched into the air and translated alive to the mansions of celestial glory[73]

If Cæsar had achieved the reformation of the Roman law his creative genius enlightened by reflection and study would have given to the world a pure and original system of jurisprudence Whatever flattery might suggest the emperor of the East was afraid to establish his private judgment as the standard of equity in the possession of legislative power he borrowed the aid of time and opinion and his laborious compilations are guarded by the sages and legislators of past times Instead of a statue cast in a simple mould by the hand of an artist the works of Justinian represent a tesselated pavement of antique and costly but too often of incoherent, fragments. In the first year of his reign, he directed the faithful Tribonian and nine learned associates to revise the ordinances of his predecessors, as they were contained since the time of Hadrian in the Gregorian Hermogenian and Theodosian codes to purge the errors and contradictions to retrench whatever was obsolete or superfluous and to select the wise and salutary laws best adapted to the practice of the tribunals and the use of his subjects. The work was accomplished in fourteen months and the twelve books or tables which the new decemvirs produced might be designed to imitate the labours of their Roman predecessors The new CODE of Justinian was honoured with his name and confirmed by his royal signature authentic transcripts were multiplied by the pens of notaries and scribes they were transmitted to the magistrates of the European, the Asiatic and afterwards the African provinces and the law of the empire was proclaimed on solemn festivals at the doors of churches A more arduous operation was still behind—to extract the spirit of jurisprudence from the decisions and conjectures the questions and disputes, of the Roman civilians Seventeen lawyers, with Tribonian at their head, were appointed by the emperor to exercise an absolute jurisdiction over the works of their predecessors If they had obeyed his commands in ten years Justinian would have been satisfied with their diligence and the rapid composition of the DIGEST or PANDECTS[75] in three years will deserve praise or censure according to the merit of the execution From the library of Tribonian they chose forty, the most eminent civilians of former times[76] two thousand treatises were comprised in an abridgment of fifty books and it has been carefully recorded that three millions of lines or sentences[77] were reduced in this abstract to the moderate number of one hundred and fifty thousand. The edition of this great work was delayed a month after that of the INSTITUTES and it seemed reasonable that the elements should precede the digest of the Roman law As soon as the emperor had approved their labours he ratified by his legislative power the speculations of these private citizens their commentaries on the Twelve Tables the Perpetual Edict the laws of the people and the decrees of the senate succeeded to the authority of the text and the text was abandoned as a useless though venerable relic of antiquity The Code the Pandects and the Institutes were declared to be the legitimate system of civil jurisprudence they alone were admitted in the tribunals and they alone were taught in the academies of Rome Constantinople and Berytus Justinian addressed to the senate and provinces his eternal oracles and his pride under the mask of piety ascribed the consummation of this great design to the support and inspiration of the Deity

Since the emperor declined the fame and envy of original composition, we can only require at his hands method choice and fidelity —the humble though indispensable virtues of a compiler Among the various combinations of ideas it is difficult to assign any reasonable preference but as the order of Justinian is different in his three works it is possible that all may be wrong and it is certain that two can not be right In the selection of ancient laws he seems to have viewed his predecessors without jealousy and with equal regard the series could not ascend above the reign of Hadrian and the narrow distinction of Paganism and Christianity introduced by the superstition of Theodosius had been abolished by the consent of mankind But the jurisprudence of the Pandects is circumscribed within a period of a hundred years from the Perpetual Edict to the death of Severus Alexander the civilians who lived under the first Cæsars are seldom permitted to speak, and only three names can be attributed

latitude of equity more suitable to the common sense and feelings of mankind If a fair exchange had been substituted to the payment of money, Capito still considered the transaction as a legal sale,[64] and he consulted nature for the age of puberty without confining his definition to the precise period of twelve or fourteen years [65] This opposition of sentiments was propagated in the writings and lessons of the two founders the schools of Capito and Labeo maintained their inveterate conflict from the age of Augustus to that of Hadrian [66] and the two sects derived their appellations from Sabinus and Proculus their most celebrated teachers The names of Cassians and Pegasians were likewise applied to the same parties but by a strange reverse the popular cause was in the hands of Pegasus [67] a timid slave of Domitian, while the favourite of the Cæsars was represented by Cassius [68] who gloried in his descent from the patriotic assassin By the perpetual edict the controversies of the sects were in a great measure determined For that important work the emperor Hadrian preferred the chief of the Sabinians the friends of monarchy prevailed but the moderation of Salvius Julian insensibly reconciled the victors and the vanquished Like the contemporary philosophers, the lawyers of the age of the Antonines disclaimed the authority of a master and adopted from every system the most probable doctrines [69] But their writings would have been less voluminous, had their choice been more unanimous The conscience of the judge was perplexed by the number and weight of discordant testimonies and every sentence that his passion or interest might pronounce was justified by the sanction of some venerable name An indulgent edict of the younger Theodosius excused him from the labour of comparing and weighing their arguments Five civilians Caius Papinian Paul Ulpian and Modestinus were established as the oracles of jurisprudence a majority was decisive but if their opinions were equally divided a casting vote was ascribed to the superior wisdom of Papinian [70]

When Justinian ascended the throne the reformation of the Roman jurisprudence was an arduous but indispensable task In the space of ten centuries the infinite variety of laws and legal opinions had filled many thousand volumes which no fortune could purchase and no capacity could digest Books could not easily be found, and the judges poor in the midst of riches were reduced to the exercise of their illiterate discretion The subjects of the Greek provinces were ignorant of the language that disposed of their lives and properties and the barbarous dialect of the Latins was imperfectly studied in the academies of Berytus and Constantinople As an Illyrian soldier that idiom was familiar to the infancy of Justinian his youth had been instructed by the lessons of jurisprudence and his Imperial choice selected the most learned civilians of the East to labour with their sovereign in the work of reformation.[71] The theory of professors was assisted by the practice of advocates and the experience of magistrates and the whole undertaking was animated by the spirit of Tribonian [72] This extraordinary man, the object of so much praise and censure, was a native of Side in Pamphilia and his genius like that of Bacon embraced as his own all the business and knowledge of the age Tribonian composed both in prose and verse, on a strange diversity of curious and abstruse subjects [73] a double panegyric of Justinian and the Life of the philosopher Theodotus, the nature of happiness and the duties of government Homer s catalogue and the four and twenty sorts of metre the astronomical canon of Ptolemy, the changes of the months the houses of the planets and the harmonic system of the world To the literature of Greece he added the use of the Latin tongue the Roman civilians were deposited in his library and in his mind and he most assiduously cultivated those arts which opened the road of wealth and preferment From the bar of the prætorian præfects he raised himself to the honours of quæstor, of consul and of master of the offices the council of Justinian listened to his eloquence and wisdom and envy was mitigated by the gentleness and affability of his manners The reproaches of impiety and avarice have stained the virtues or the reputation of Tribonian In a bigoted and persecuting court the principal minister was accused of a secret aversion to the Christian faith and was supposed to entertain the sentiments of an Atheist and a Pagan which have been imputed inconsistently enough to the last philosophers of Greece His avarice was more clearly proved and more sensibly felt If he were swayed by gifts in the administration of justice, the example of Bacon will again occur nor can the merit of Tribonian atone for his baseness, if he degraded the sanctity of his profession and if laws were every day enacted modified or repealed for the base consideration of his private emolument In the sedition of Constantinople his removal was granted to the clamours perhaps to the just indignation of the people but the quæstor was speedily re-

the Perpetual Edict had been buried under the weight of commentators he denounced the punishment of forgery against the rash civilians who should presume to interpret or pervert the will of their sovereign The scholars of Accursius of Bartolus of Cujacius should blush for their accumulated guilt unless they dare to dispute his right of binding the authority of his successors and the native freedom of the mind But the emperor was unable to fix his own inconstancy and, while he boasted of renewing the exchange of Diomede, of transmuting brass into gold[82] he discovered the necessity of purifying his gold from the mixture of baser alloy Six years had not elapsed from the publication of the Code before he condemned the imperfect attempt by a new and more accurate edition of the same work, which he enriched with two hundred of his own laws and fifty decisions of the darkest and most intricate points of jurisprudence Every year or according to Procopius each day of his long reign was marked by some legal innovation Many of his acts were rescinded by himself many were rejected by his successors many have been obliterated by time but the number of sixteen EDICTS, and one hundred and sixty-eight NOVELS[84] has been admitted into the authentic body of the civil jurisprudence In the opinion of a philosopher superior to the prejudices of his profession these incessant and for the most part trifling alterations, can be only explained by the venal spirit of a prince who sold without shame his judgments and his laws[85] The charge of the secret historian is indeed explicit and vehement but the sole instance which he produces may be ascribed to the devotion as well as to the avarice of Justinian. A wealthy bigot had bequeathed his inheritance to the church of Emesa, and its value was enhanced by the dexterity of an artist who subscribed confessions of debt and promises of payment with the names of the richest Syrians They pleaded the established prescription of thirty or forty years but their defence was overruled by a retrospective edict, which extended the claims of the church to the term of a century—an edict so pregnant with injustice and disorder that, after serving this occasional purpose it was prudently abolished in the same reign.[86] If candour will acquit the emperor himself and transfer the corruption to his wife and favourites the suspicion of so foul a vice must still degrade the majesty of his laws and the advocates of Justinian may acknowledge that such levity whatsoever be the motive, is unworthy of a legislator and a man.

Monarchs seldom condescend to become the preceptors of their subjects and some praise is due to Justinian, by whose command an ample system was reduced to a short and elementary treatise Among the various institutes of the Roman law[87] those of Caius[88] were the most popular in the East and West and their use may be considered as an evidence of their merit. They were selected by the Imperial delegates Tribonian Theophilus, and Dorotheus and the freedom and purity of the Antonines was incrusted with the coarser materials of a degenerate age The same volume which introduced the youth of Rome Constantinople and Berytus to the gradual study of the Code and Pandects, is still precious to the historian, the philosopher and the magistrate The INSTITUTES of Justinian are divided into four books they proceed with no contemptible method from, I Persons to II Things and from things to III Actions and the article IV of Private Wrongs is terminated by the principles of Criminal Law

I The distinction of ranks and persons is the firmest basis of a mixed and limited government In France the remains of liberty are kept alive by the spirit the honours and even the prejudices of fifty thousand nobles[89] Two hundred families supply in lineal descent the second branch of the English legislature which maintains between the king and commons, the balance of the constitution A gradation of patricians and plebeians, of strangers and subjects, has supported the aristocracy of Genoa, Venice and ancient Rome The perfect equality of men is the point in which the extremes of democracy and despotism are confounded since the majesty of the prince or people would be offended if any heads were exalted above the level of their fellow slaves or fellow-citizens. In the decline of the Roman empire the proud distinctions of the republic were gradually abolished and the reason or instinct of Justinian completed the simple form of an absolute monarchy The emperor could not eradicate the popular reverence which always waits on the possession of hereditary wealth or the memory of famous ancestors He delighted to honour with titles and emoluments his generals magistrates and senators and his precarious indulgence communicated some rays of their glory to the persons of their wives and children. But in the eye of the law all Roman citizens were equal and all subjects of the empire were citizens of Rome That inestimable character was degraded to an obsolete and empty name to the age of the republic The favourite of Justinian (it has been fiercely urged) was fearful of encountering the light of freedom and the gravity of Roman sages Tribonian condemned to oblivion the genuine and native wisdom of Cato, the Scævolas and Sulpicius, while he invoked spirits more congenial to his own, the Syrians, Greeks and Africans who flocked to the Imperial court to study Latin as a foreign tongue, and jurisprudence as a lucrative profession But the ministers of Justinian[78] were instructed to labour not for the curiosity of antiquarians but for the immediate benefit of his subjects It was their duty to select the useful and practical parts of the Roman law and the writings of the old republicans however curious or excellent, were no longer suited to the new system of manners religion, and government Perhaps if the preceptors and friends of Cicero were still alive, our candour would acknowledge that except in purity of language[79] their intrinsic merit was excelled by the school of Papinian and Ulpian The science of the laws is the slow growth of time and experience, and the advantage both of method and materials is naturally assumed by the most recent authors The civilians of the reign of the Antonines had studied the works of their predecessors their philosophic spirit had mitigated the rigour of antiquity, simplified the forms of proceeding, and emerged from the jealousy and prejudice of the rival sects The choice of the authorities that compose the Pandects depended on the judgment of Tribonian, but the power of his sovereign could not absolve him from the sacred obligations of truth and fidelity As the legislator of the empire Justinian might repeal the acts of the Antonines or condemn as seditious the free principles which were maintained by the last of the Roman lawyers[80] But the existence of past facts is placed beyond the reach of despotism and the emperor was guilty of fraud and forgery when he corrupted the integrity of their text inscribed with their venerable names the words and ideas of his servile reign,[81] and suppressed by the hand of power the pure and authentic copies of their sentiments The changes and interpolations of Tribonian and his colleagues are excused by the pretence of uniformity but their cares have been insufficient and the antinomies or contradictions, of the Code and Pandects still exercise the patience and subtlety of modern civilians[82]

A rumour devoid of evidence has been propagated by the enemies of Justinian that the jurisprudence of ancient Rome was reduced to ashes by the author of the Pandects from the vain persuasion that it was now either false or superfluous Without usurping an office so invidious the emperor might safely commit to ignorance and time the accomplishment of this destructive wish Before the invention of printing and paper the labour and the materials of writing could be purchased only by the rich and it may reasonably be computed that the price of books was a hundred fold their present value[83] Copies were slowly multiplied and cautiously renewed the hopes of profit tempted the sacrilegious scribes to erase the characters of antiquity, and Sophocles or Tacitus were obliged to resign the parchment to missals, homilies and the golden legend[84] If such was the fate of the most beautiful compositions of genius what stability could be expected for the dull and barren works of an obsolete science? The books of jurisprudence were interesting to few and entertaining to none, their value was connected with present use and they sunk for ever as soon as that use was superseded by the innovations of fashion superior merit or public authority In the age of peace and learning between Cicero and the last of the Antonines, many losses had been already sustained and some luminaries of the school or forum were known only to the curious by tradition and report Three hundred and sixty years of disorder and decay accelerated the progress of oblivion and it may fairly be presumed that of the writings which Justinian is accused of neglecting many were no longer to be found in the libraries of the East[85] The copies of Papinian or Ulpian which the reformer had proscribed were deemed unworthy of future notice the Twelve Tables and prætorian edict insensibly vanished and the monuments of ancient Rome were neglected or destroyed by the envy and ignorance of the Greeks Even the Pandects themselves have escaped with difficulty and danger from the common shipwreck and criticism has pronounced that all the editions and manuscripts of the West are derived from one original[86] It was transcribed at Constantinople in the beginning of the seventh century[87] was successively transported by the accidents of war and commerce to Amalphi[88] Pisa[89] and Florence[90] and is now deposited as a sacred relic[91] in the ancient palace of the republic[92]

It is the first care of a reformer to prevent any future reformation To maintain the text of the Pandects the Institutes and the Code the use of ciphers and abbreviations was rigorously proscribed and as Justinian recollected that espoused a freeman was protected from the disgrace of becoming the wife of a slave In the first ages when the city was pressed and often famished by her Latin and Tuscan neighbours the sale of children might be a frequent practice but as a Roman could not legally purchase the liberty of his fellow-citizen the market must gradually fail and the trade would be destroyed by the conquests of the republic. An imperfect right of property was at length communicated to sons and the threefold distinction of profectitious adventitious and professional was ascertained by the jurisprudence of the Code and Pandects[108] Of all that proceeded from the father he imparted only the use and reserved the absolute dominion yet if his goods were sold the filial portion was excepted by a favourable interpretation from the demands of the creditors In whatever accrued by marriage gift or collateral succession the property was secured to the son but the father unless he had been specially excluded enjoyed the usufruct during his life As a just and prudent reward of military virtue the spoils of the enemy were acquired possessed and bequeathed by the soldier alone and the fair analogy was extended to the emoluments of any liberal profession, the salary of public service, and the sacred liberality of the emperor or the empress. The life of a citizen was less exposed than his fortune to the abuse of paternal power Yet his life might be adverse to the interest or passions of an unworthy father the same crimes that flowed from the corruption were more sensibly felt by the humanity of the Augustan age and the cruel Erixo who whipped his son till he expired was saved by the emperor from the just fury of the multitude[109] The Roman father from the licence of servile dominion, was reduced to the gravity and moderation of a judge The presence and opinion of Augustus confirmed the sentence of exile pronounced against an intentional parricide by the domestic tribunal of Arius Hadrian transported to an island the jealous parent who like a robber had seized the opportunity of hunting to assassinate a youth the incestuous lover of his stepmother[110] A private jurisdiction is repugnant to the spirit of monarchy the parent was again reduced from a judge to an accuser and the magistrates were enjoined by Severus Alexander to hear his complaints and execute his sentence. He could no longer take the life of a son without incurring the guilt and punishment of murder and the pains of parricide from which he had been excepted by the Pompeian law were finally inflicted by the justice of Constantine[111] The same protection was due to every period of existence and reason must applaud the humanity of Paulus for imputing the crime of murder to the father who strangles, or starves or abandons his new born infant, or exposes him in a public place to find the mercy which he himself had denied But the exposition of children was the prevailing and stubborn vice of antiquity It was sometimes prescribed often permitted almost always practised with impunity by the nations who never entertained the Roman ideas of paternal power and the dramatic poets, who appeal to the human heart, represent with indifference a popular custom which was palliated by the motives of economy and compassion.[112] If the father could subdue his own feelings he might escape, though not the censure at least the chastisement, of the laws and the Roman empire was stained with the blood of infants till such murders were included by Valentinian and his colleagues in the letter and spirit of the Cornelian law The lessons of jurisprudence[113] and Christianity had been insufficient to eradicate this inhuman practice till their gentle influence was fortified by the terrors of capital punishment[114]

Experience has proved that savages are the tyrants of the female sex and that the condition of women is usually softened by the refinements of social life In the hope of a robust progeny Lycurgus had delayed the season of marriage it was fixed by Numa at the tender age of twelve years, that the Roman husband might educate to his will a pure and obedient virgin[115] According to the custom of antiquity he bought his bride of her parents and she fulfilled the coemption by purchasing with three pieces of copper a just introduction to his house and household deities. A sacrifice of fruits was offered by the pontiffs in the presence of ten witnesses the contracting parties were seated on the same sheepskin they tasted a salt cake of far or rice and this confarreation[116] which denoted the ancient food of Italy, served as an emblem of their mystic union of mind and body But this union on the side of the woman was rigorous and unequal and she renounced the name and worship of her father's house to embrace a new servitude, decorated only by the title of adoption a fiction of the law neither rational nor elegant, bestowed on the mother of a family[117] (her proper appellation) the strange characters of sister to her own children and of daughter to her husband or master who was invested with the plenitude of paternal

The voice of a Roman could no longer enact his laws or create the annual ministers of his power his constitutional rights might have checked the arbitrary will of a master and the bold adventurer from Germany or Arabia was admitted with equal favour, to the civil and military command which the citizen alone had been once entitled to assume over the conquests of his fathers The first Cæsars had scrupulously guarded the distinction of ingenuous and servile birth, which was decided by the condition of the mother and the candour of the laws was satisfied if her freedom could be ascertained, during a single moment, between the conception and the delivery The slaves who were liberated by a generous master immediately entered into the middle class of libertines or freedmen but they could never be enfranchised from the duties of obedience and gratitude whatever were the fruits of their industry their patron and his family inherited the third part, or even the whole of their fortune if they died without children and without a testament Justinian respected the rights of patrons but his indulgence removed the badge of disgrace from the two inferior orders of freedmen who ever ceased to be a slave obtained without reserve or delay the station of a citizen, and at length the dignity of an ingenuous birth which nature had refused was created or supposed by the omnipotence of the emperor Whatever restraints of age or forms or numbers had been formerly introduced to check the abuse of manumissions and the too rapid increase of vile and indigent Romans he finally abolished and the spirit of his laws promoted the extinction of domestic servitude Yet the eastern provinces were filled in the time of Justinian, with multitudes of slaves either born or purchased for the use of their masters and the price from ten to seventy pieces of gold was determined by their age their strength and their education [100] But the hardships of this dependent state were continually diminished by the influence of government and religion and the pride of a subject was no longer elated by his absolute dominion over the life and happiness of his bondsman [101]

The law of nature instructs most animals to cherish and educate their infant progeny The law of reason inculcates to the human species the returns of filial piety But the exclusive absolute and perpetual dominion of the father over his children is peculiar to the Roman jurisprudence [102] and seems to be coeval with the foundation of the city [103] The paternal power was instituted or confirmed by Romulus himself and after the practice of three centuries, it was inscribed on the fourth table of the Decemvirs In the forum the senate or the camp the adult son of a Roman citizen enjoyed the public and private rights of a person in his father's house he was a mere thing confounded by the laws with the movables the cattle and the slaves whom the capricious master might alienate or destroy without being responsible to any earthly tribunal The hand which bestowed the daily sustenance might resume the voluntary gift, and whatever was acquired by the labour or fortune of the son was immediately lost in the property of the father His stolen goods (his oxen or his children) might be recovered by the same action of theft [104] and if either had been guilty of a trespass it was in his own option to compensate the damage or resign to the injured party the obnoxious animal At the call of indigence or avarice the master of a family could dispose of his children or his slaves But the condition of the slave was far more advantageous since he regained by the first manumission his alienated freedom the son was again restored to his unnatural father he might be condemned to servitude a second and a third time, and it was not till after the third sale and deliverance [105] that he was enfranchised from the domestic power which had been so repeatedly abused According to his descretion a father might chastise the real or imaginary faults of his children by stripes by imprisonment by exile, by sending them to the country to work in chains among the meanest of his servants The majesty of a parent was armed with the power of life and death [106] and the examples of such bloody executions which were sometimes praised and never punished may be traced in the annals of Rome beyond the times of Pompey and Augustus Neither age nor rank nor the consular office nor the honours of a triumph could exempt the most illustrious citizen from the bonds of filial subjection [107] his own descendants were included in the family of their common ancestor and the claims of adoption were not less sacred or less rigorous than those of nature Without fear though not without danger of abuse the Roman legislators had reposed an unbounded confidence in the sentiments of paternal love and the oppression was tempered by the assurance that each generation must succeed in its turn to the awful dignity of parent and master

The first limitation of paternal power is ascribed to the justice and humanity of Numa and the maid who with his father's consent had

The freedom of love and marriage was re strained among the Romans by natural and civil impediments An instinct almost innate and universal appears to prohibit the incestuous commerce[132] of parents and children in the infinite series of ascending and descending gen erations Concerning the oblique and collateral branches nature is indifferent reason mute and custom various and arbitrary In Egypt the marriage of brothers and sisters was admitted without scruple or exception a Spartan might espouse the daughter of his father an Athenian that of his mother and the nuptials of an uncle with his niece were applauded at Athens as a happy union of the dearest relations The pro fane lawgivers of Rome were never tempted by interest or superstition to multiply the forbidden degrees but they inflexibly condemned the marriage of sisters and brothers, hesitated whether first-cousins should be touched by the same interdict revered the parental character of aunts and uncles and treated affinity and adoption as a just imitation of the ties of blood. According to the proud maxims of the republic, a legal marriage could only be contracted by free citizens an honourable at least an in genuous birth was required for the spouse of a senator but the blood of kings could never mingle in legitimate nuptials with the blood of a Roman and the name of Stranger degraded Cleopatra and Berenice[133] to live the concubines of Mark Antony and Titus [134] This appellation indeed so injurious to the majesty cannot with out indulgence be applied to the manners of

After the Punic triumphs the matrons of Rome aspired to the common benefits of a free and opulent republic their wishes were gratified by the indulgence of fathers and lovers and their ambition was unsuccessfully resisted by the gravity of Cato the Censor [120] They declined the solemnities of the old nuptials defeated the annual prescription by an absence of three days, and, without losing their name or independence, subscribed the liberal and definite terms of a marriage contract Of their private fortunes they communicated the use and secured the property the estates of a wife could neither be alienated nor mortgaged by a prodigal husband their mutual gifts were prohibited by the jealousy of the laws, and the misconduct of either party might afford under another name a future subject for an action of theft To this loose and voluntary compact religious and civil rites were no longer essential and between persons of a similar rank the apparent com*munity of life was allowed as sufficient evidence* of their nuptials The dignity of marriage was restored by the Christians who derived all spiritual grace from the prayers of the faithful and the benediction of the priest or bishop The origin validity and duties of the holy institution were regulated by the tradition of the synagogue the precepts of the Gospel and the canons of general or provincial synods [121] and the conscience of the Christians was awed by the decrees and censures of their ecclesiastical rulers Yet the magistrates of Justinian were not subject to the authority of the church the emperor consulted the unbelieving civilians of antiquity, and the choice of matrimonial laws in the Code and Pandects is directed by the earthly motives of justice, policy and the natural freedom of both sexes [122]

Besides the agreement of the parties, the essence of every rational contract, the Roman marriage required the previous approbation of the parents A father might be forced by some recent laws to supply the wants of a mature daughter but even his insanity was not generally allowed to supersede the necessity of his consent The causes of the dissolution of matrimony have varied among the Romans [123] but the most solemn sacrament, the confarreation itself, might always be done away by rites of a contrary tendency In the first ages the father of a family might sell his children and his wife was reckoned in the number of his children the domestic judge might pronounce the death of the offender, or his mercy might expel her from his bed and house but the slavery of the wretched female was hopeless and perpetual unless he asserted for his own convenience the manly prerogative of divorce The warmest applause has been lavished on the virtue of the Romans, who abstained from the exercise of this tempting privilege above five hundred years [124] but the same fact evinces the unequal terms of a connection in which the slave was unable to renounce her tyrant and the tyrant was unwilling to relinquish his slave When the Roman matrons became the equal and voluntary companions of their lords a new jurisprudence was introduced that marriage, like other partnerships might be dissolved by the abdication of one of the associates In three centuries of prosperity and corruption this principle was enlarged to frequent practice and pernicious abuse Passion interest or caprice suggested daily motives for the dissolution of marriage a word a sign a message a letter the mandate of a freedman declared the separation the most tender of human connections was degraded to a transient society of profit or pleasure According to the various conditions of life both sexes alternately felt the disgrace and injury an inconstant spouse transferred her wealth to a new family abandoning a numerous perhaps a spurious progeny to the paternal authority and care of her late husband a beautiful virgin might be dismissed to the world old indigent and friendless but the reluctance of the Romans, when they were pressed to marriage by Augustus sufficiently marks that the prevailing institutions were least favourable to the males A specious theory is confuted by this free and perfect experiment which demonstrates that the liberty of divorce does not contribute to happiness and virtue The facility of separation would destroy all mutual confidence and in

The active insatiate principle of self love can alone supply the arts of life and the wages of industry and as soon as civil government and exclusive property have been introduced they become necessary to the existence of the human race Except in the singular institutions of Sparta, the wisest legislators have disapproved an agrarian law as a false and dangerous innovation Among the Romans the enormous disproportion of wealth surmounted the ideal restraints of a doubtful tradition and an obsolete statute—a tradition that the poorest follower of Romulus had been endowed with the perpetual inheritance of two jugera [138] a statute which confined the richest citizen to the measure of five hundred jugera, or three hundred and twelve acres of land. these Oriental queens A concubine in the strict sense of the civilians was a woman of servile or plebeian extraction the sole and faithful companion of a Roman citizen who continued in a state of celibacy Her modest station below the honours of a wife above the infamy of a prostitute was acknowledged and approved by the laws from the age of Augustus to the tenth century the use of this secondary marriage prevailed both in the West and East and the humble virtues of a concubine were often preferred to the pomp and insolence of a noble matron In this connection the two Antonines the best of princes and of men enjoyed the comforts of domestic love, the example was imitated by many citizens impatient of celibacy but regardful of their families If at any time they desired to legitimate their natural children the conversion was instantly performed by the celebration of their nuptials with a partner whose fruitfulness and fidelity they had already tried By this epithet of natural the offspring of the concubine were distinguished from the spurious brood of adultery prostitution and incest, to whom Justinian reluctantly grants the necessary aliments of life and these natural children alone were capable of succeeding to a sixth part of the inheritance of their reputed father According to the rigour of law bastards were entitled only to the name and condition of their mother, from whom they might derive the character of a slave a stranger, or a citizen The outcasts of every family were adopted without reproach as the children of the state [125]

If the deceased father had not signified his choice the agnats, or paternal kindred of the nearest degree, were compelled to act as the natural guardians the Athenians were apprehensive of exposing the infant to the power of those most interested in his death but an axiom of Roman jurisprudence has pronounced that the charge of tutelage should constantly attend the emolument of succession If the choice of the father and the line of consanguinity afforded no efficient guardian, the failure was supplied by the nomination of the prætor of the city or the president of the province but the person whom they named to this public office might be legally excused by insanity or blindness, by ignorance or inability, by previous enmity or adverse interest by the number of children guardianships with which he was already bu thened and by the immunities which we granted to the useful labours of magistrat lawyers physicians and professors Till the i fant could speak and think, he was represent by the tutor, whose authority was finally c termined by the age of puberty Without l consent no act of the pupil could bind hims to his own prejudice though it might obl others for his personal benefit It is needless observe that the tutor often gave security a always rendered an account and that the wa of diligence or integrity exposed him to a cr and almost criminal action for the violation his sacred trust The age of puberty had be rashly fixed by the civilians at fourteen but the faculties of the mind ripen more slowly th those of the body a curator was interposed guard the fortunes of a Roman youth from l own inexperience and headstrong passio Such a trustee had been first instituted by t prætor to save the family from the blind hav of a prodigal or madman and the minor w compelled by the laws to solicit the same pr tection to give validity to his acts till he a complished the full period of twenty five yea Women were condemned to the perpetu tutelage of parents husbands or guardians sex created to please and obey was never su posed to have attained the age of reason a experience Such at least was the stern a haughty spirit of the ancient law which h been insensibly mollified before the time Justinian

The personal title of the first proprietor must be determined by his death but the possession without any appearance of change is peaceably continued in his children the associates of his toil and the partners of his wealth. This natural inheritance has been protected by the legislators of every climate and age and the father is encouraged to persevere in slow and distant improvements by the tender hope that a long posterity will enjoy the fruits of his labour The principle of hereditary succession is universal but the order has been variously established by convenience or caprice by the spirit of national institutions or by some partial example which was originally decided by fraud or violence The jurisprudence of the Romans appears to have deviated from the equality of nature much less than the Jewish [143] the Athenian,[144] or the English institutions [145] On the death of a citizen all his descendants unless they were already freed from his paternal power were called to the inheritance of his possessions The insolent prerogative of primogeniture was unknown the two sexes were placed on a just level all the

these Oriental queens A concubine in the strict sense of the civilians, was a woman of servile or plebeian extraction the sole and faithful companion of a Roman citizen who continued in a state of celibacy Her modest station below the honours of a wife above the infamy of a prostitute was acknowledged and approved by the laws from the age of Augustus to the tenth century the use of this secondary marriage prevailed both in the West and East and the humble virtues of a concubine were often preferred to the pomp and insolence of a noble matron In this connection the two Antonines the best of princes and of men enjoyed the comforts of domestic love the example was imitated by many citizens impatient of celibacy, but regardful of their families If at any time they desired to legitimate their natural children, the conversion was instantly performed by the celebration of their nuptials with a partner whose fruitfulness and fidelity they had already tried By this epithet of natural the offspring of the concubine were distinguished from the spurious brood of adultery prostitution and incest, to whom Justinian reluctantly grants the necessary aliments of life and these natural children alone were capable of succeeding to a sixth part of the inheritance of their reputed father According to the rigour of law bastards were entitled only to the name and condition of their mother from whom they might derive the character of a slave a stranger or a citizen The outcasts of every family were adopted without reproach as the children of the state [135]

The relation of guardian and ward or in Roman words, of tutor and pupil which covers so many titles of the Institutes and Pandects [136] is of a very simple and uniform nature The person and property of an orphan must always be trusted to the custody of some discreet friend If the deceased father had not signified his choice the agnats or paternal kindred of the nearest degree were compelled to act as the natural guardians the Athenians were apprehensive of exposing the infant to the power of those most interested in his death but an axiom of Roman jurisprudence has pronounced that the charge of tutelage should constantly attend the emolument of succession If the choice of the father and the line of consanguinity afforded no efficient guardian the failure was supplied by the nomination of the prætor of the city or the president of the province but the person whom they named to this public office might be legally excused by insanity or blindness by ignorance or inability, by previous enmity or adverse interest, by the number of children or guardianships with which he was already burthened and by the immunities which were granted to the useful labours of magistrates, lawyers, physicians and professors Till the infant could speak and think he was represented by the tutor, whose authority was finally determined by the age of puberty Without his consent no act of the pupil could bind himself to his own prejudice though it might oblige others for his personal benefit It is needless to observe that the tutor often gave security and always rendered an account and that the want of diligence or integrity exposed him to a civil and almost criminal action for the violation of his sacred trust The age of puberty had been rashly fixed by the civilians at fourteen but, as the faculties of the mind ripen more slowly than those of the body a curator was interposed to guard the fortunes of a Roman youth from his own inexperience and headstrong passions. Such a trustee had been first instituted by the prætor to save the family from the blind havoc of a prodigal or madman and the minor was compelled by the laws to solicit the same protection to give validity to his acts till he accomplished the full period of twenty five years. Women were condemned to the perpetual tutelage of parents husbands or guardians a sex created to please and obey was never supposed to have attained the age of reason and experience Such at least was the stern and haughty spirit of the ancient law which had been insensibly mollified before the time of Justinian

II The original right of property can only be justified by the accident or merit of prior occupancy and on this foundation it is wisely established by the philosophy of the civilians.[137] The savage who hollows a tree, inserts a sharp stone into a wooden handle or applies a string to an elastic branch, becomes in a state of nature the just proprietor of the canoe the bow, or the hatchet The materials were common to all the new form the produce of his time and simple industry belongs solely to himself His hungry brethren cannot without a sense of their own injustice extort from the hunter the game of the forest overtaken or slain by his personal strength and dexterity If his provident care preserves and multiplies the tame animals whose nature is tractable to the arts of education he acquires a perpetual title to the use and service of their numerous progeny which derives its existence from him alone If he encloses and cultivates a field for their sustenance and his own a barren is converted into a fertile soil the seed manure the labour create a new value and rewards of harvest are painfully earned by fatigues of the revolving year In the successive states of society the hunter the shepherd the husbandman may defend their possessions by two reasons which forcibly appeal to the feelings of the human mind that what they enjoy is the fruit of their own industry that every man who envies their felicity may purchase similar acquisitions by the exercise of similar diligence Such in truth may be the freedom and plenty of a small colony cast on a fruitful island But the colony multiplies, while the space still continues the same the common rights, the equal inheritance of mankind are engrossed by the bold and crafty each field and forest is circumscribed by the landmarks of a jealous master and it is the peculiar praise of the Roman jurisprudence that it asserts the claim of the first occupant to the wild animals of the earth the air and the waters In the progress from primitive equity to final injustice the steps are silent the shades are almost imperceptible and the absolute monopoly is guarded by positive laws and artificial reason. The active insatiate principle of self love can alone supply the arts of life and the wages of industry and as soon as civil government and exclusive property have been introduced they become necessary to the existence of the human race Except in the singular institutions of Sparta the wisest legislators have disapproved an agrarian law as a false and dangerous innovation Among the Romans the enormous disproportion of wealth surmounted the ideal restraints of a doubtful tradition and an obsolete statute—a tradition that the poorest follower of Romulus had been endowed with the perpetual inheritance of two jugera [138] a statute which confined the richest citizen to the measure of five hundred jugera or three hundred and twelve acres of land The original territory of Rome consisted only of some miles of wood and meadow along the banks of the Tiber and domestic exchange could add nothing to the national stock. But the goods of an alien or enemy were lawfully exposed to the first hostile occupier the city was enriched by the profitable trade of war and the blood of her sons was the only price that was paid for the Volscian sheep the slaves of Britain or the gems and gold of Asiatic kingdoms In the language of ancient jurisprudence, which was corrupted and forgotten before the age of Justinian these spoils were distinguished by the name of manceps or mancipium taken with the hand and whenever they were sold or emancipated the purchaser required some assurance that they had been the property of an enemy and not of a fellow-citizen [139] A citizen could only forfeit his rights by apparent dereliction and such dereliction of a valuable interest could not easily be presumed Yet according to the Twelve Tables a prescription of one year for movables, and of two years for immovables, abolished the claim of the ancient master, if the actual possessor had acquired them by a fair transaction from the person whom he believed to be the lawful proprietor [140] Such conscientious injustice without any mixture of fraud or force could seldom injure the members of a small republic but the various periods of three of ten or of twenty years, determined by Justinian are more suitable to the latitude of a great empire. It is only in the term of prescription that the distinction of real and personal fortune has been remarked by the civilians and their general idea of property is that of simple uniform and absolute dominion The subordinate exceptions of use of usufruct [141] of servitudes [142] imposed for the benefit of a neighbour on lands and houses are abundantly explained by the professors of jurisprudence The claims of property as far as they are altered by the mixture the division or the transformation of substances, are investigated with metaphysical subtlety by the same civilians.

The personal title of the first proprietor must be determined by his death but the possession without any appearance of change is peaceably continued in his children, the associates of his toil and the partners of his wealth This natural inheritance has been protected by the legislators of every climate and age and the father is encouraged to persevere in slow and distant improvements, by the tender hope that a long posterity will enjoy the fruits of his labour The principle of hereditary succession is universal but the order has been variously established by convenience or caprice by the spirit of national institutions or by some partial example which was originally decided by fraud or violence The jurisprudence of the Romans appears to have deviated from the equality of nature much less than the Jewish [143] the Athenian [144] or the English institutions [145] On the death of a citizen, all his descendants unless they were already freed from his paternal power were called to the inheritance of his possessions The insolent prerogative of primogeniture was unknown the two sexes were placed on a just level all the

sons and daughters were entitled to an equal portion of the patrimonial estate, and if any of the sons had been intercepted by a premature death, his person was represented, and his share was divided by his surviving children On the failure of the direct line the right of succession must diverge to the collateral branches The degrees of kindred [148] are numbered by the civilians ascending from the last possessor to a common parent, and descending from the com mon parent to the next heir my father stands in the first degree, my brother in the second his children in the third, and the remainder of the series may be conceived by fancy, or pic tured in a genealogical table In this computation a distinction was made, essential to the laws and even the constitution of Rome the agnats or persons connected by a line of males, were called as they stood in the nearest degree, to an equal partition but a female was incapable of transmitting any legal claims and the cognats of every rank without excepting the dear relation of a mother and a son were disinherited by the Twelve Tables as strangers and aliens Among the Romans a gens or lineage was united by a common name and domestic rites the various cognomens or surnames of Scipio or Mar cellus distinguished from each other the sub ordinate branches or families of the Cornelian or Claudian race the default of the agnats of the same surname was supplied by the larger denomination of gentiles and the vigilance of the laws maintained, in the same name the perpetual descent of religion and property A similar principle dictated the Voconian law,[147] which abolished the right of female inheritance As long as virgins were given or sold in marriage the adoption of the wife extinguished the hopes of the daughter But the equal succession of independent matrons supported their pride and luxury and might transport into a foreign house the riches of their fathers While the maxims of Cato [148] were revered, they tended to perpetuate in each family a just and virtuous mediocrity till female blandishments insensibly triumphed and every salutary restraint was lost in the dissolute greatness of the republic. The rigour of the decemvirs was tempered by the equity of the prætors Their edicts restored emancipated and posthumous children to the rights of nature and upon the failure of the agnats they preferred the blood of the cognats to the name of the gentiles, whose title and character were insensibly covered with oblivion. The reciprocal inheritance of mothers and sons was established in the Tertullian and Orphitian decrees by the humanity of the senate A new and more impartial order was introduced by the novels of Justinian, who affected to revive the jurisprudence of the Twelve Tables The lines of masculine and female kindred were confounded the descending ascending and collateral series was accurately defined and each degree, according to the proximity of blood and affection succeeded to the vacant possessions of a Roman citizen [149]

The order of succession is regulated by nature or at least by the general and permanent reason of the lawgiver, but this order is frequently violated by the arbitrary and partial wills which prolong the dominion of the testator beyond the grave [150] In the simple state of society this last use or abuse of the right of property is seldom indulged it was introduced at Athens by the laws of Solon and the private testaments of the father of a family are authorised by the Twelve Tables Before the time of the decem virs [151] a Roman citizen exposed his wishes and motives to the assembly of the thirty curiæ or parishes and the general law of inheritance was suspended by an occasional act of the legislature After the permission of the decemvirs each private law giver promulgated his verbal or written testament in the presence of five citizens, who represented the five classes of the Roman people a sixth witness attested their concurrence a seventh weighed the copper money, which was paid by an imaginary pur chaser and the estate was emancipated by a fictitious sale and immediate release This sing ular ceremony [152] which excited the wonder of the Greeks was still practised in the age of Severus, but the prætors had already approved a more simple testament for which they re quired the seals and signatures of seven wit nesses free from all legal exception and purposely summoned for the execution of that important act A domestic monarch who reigned over the lives and fortunes of his children might dis tribute their respective shares according to the degrees of their merit or his affection his arbitrary displeasure chastised an unworthy son by the loss of his inheritance and the mortifying pref erence of a stranger But the experience of unnatural parents recommended some limita tions of their testamentary powers A son or by the laws of Justinian even a daughter could no longer be disinherited by their silence they were compelled to name the criminal and to specify the offence and the justice of the em peror enumerated the sole causes that could justify such a violation of the first principles of nature and society[113] Unless a legitimate portion a fourth part, had been reserved for the children they were entitled to institute an action or complaint of inofficious testament—to suppose that their father's understanding was impaired by sickness or age and respectfully to appeal from his rigorous sentence to the deliberate wisdom of the magistrate. In the Roman jurisprudence an essential distinction was admitted between the inheritance and the legacies. The heirs who succeeded to the entire unity or to any of the twelve fractions of the substance of the testator represented his civil and religious character asserted his rights, fulfilled his obligations, and discharged the gifts of friendship or liberality which his last will had bequeathed under the name of legacies But as the imprudence or prodigality of a dying man might exhaust the inheritance and leave only risk and labour to his successor he was empowered to retain the Falcidian portion to deduct before the payment of the legacies a clear fourth for his own emolument A reasonable time was allowed to examine the proportion between the debts and the estate to decide whether he should accept or refuse the testament and if he used the benefit of an inventory the demands of the creditors could not exceed the valuation of the effects The last will of a citizen might be altered during his life, or rescinded after his death the persons whom he named might die before him, or reject the inheritance or be exposed to some legal disqualification. In the contemplation of these events, he was permitted to substitute second and third heirs to replace each other according to the order of the testament and the incapacity of a madman or an infant to bequeath his property might be supplied by a similar substitution.[114] But the power of the testator expired with the acceptance of the testament each Roman of mature age and discretion acquired the absolute dominion of his inheritance and the simplicity of the civil law was never clouded by the long and intricate entails which confine the happiness and freedom of unborn generations

Conquest and the formalities of law established the use of codicils If a Roman was surprised by death in a remote province of the empire he addressed a short epistle to his legitimate or testamentary heir who fulfilled with honour or neglected with impunity this last request, which the judges before the age of Augustus were not authorised to enforce A codicil might be expressed in any mode or in any language but the subscription of five witnesses must declare that it was the genuine composition of the author His intention however laudable was sometimes illegal and the invention of fidei-commissa or trusts arose from the struggle between natural justice and positive jurisprudence. A stranger of Greece or Africa might be the friend or benefactor of a childless Roman but none, except a fellow-citizen could act as his heir The Voconian law which abolished female succession restrained the legacy or inheritance of a woman to the sum of one hundred thousand sesterces[115] and an only daughter was condemned almost as an alien in her father's house The zeal of friendship and parental affection suggested a liberal artifice a qualified citizen was named in the testament with a prayer or injunction that he would restore the inheritance to the person for whom it was truly intended Various was the conduct of the trustees in this painful situation they had sworn to observe the laws of their country but honour prompted them to violate their oath and if they preferred their interest under the mask of patriotism, they forfeited the esteem of every virtuous mind. The declaration of Augustus relieved their doubts, gave a legal sanction to confidential testaments and codicils, and gently unravell'ed the forms and restraints of the republican jurisprudence[116] But as the new practice of trusts degenerated into some abuse the trustee was enabled by the Trebellian and Pegasian decrees, to reserve one fourth of the estate or to transfer on the head of the real heir all the debts and actions of the succession. The interpretation of testaments was strict and literal but the language of trusts and codicils was delivered from the minute and technical accuracy of the civilians[117]

III The general duties of mankind are imposed by their public and private relations but their specific obligations to each other can only be the effect of 1 a promise 2 a benefit or 3 an injury and when these obligations are ratified by law the interested party may compel the performance by a judicial action On this principle the civilians of every country have erected a similar jurisprudence, the fair conclusion of universal reason and justice[118]

1 The goddess of faith (of human and social faith) was worshipped not only in her temples, but in the lives of the Romans and if that nation was deficient in the more amiable qualities of benevolence and generosity they astonished the Greeks by their sincere and simple performance of the most burdensome engagements.[119] Yet among the same people according to the rigid maxims of the patricians and decemvirs a naked pact, a promise or even an oath, did not create any civil obligation unless it was confirmed by the legal form of a stipulation Whatever might be the etymology of the Latin word, it conveyed the idea of a firm and irrevocable contract which was always expressed in the mode of a question and answer Do you promise to pay me one hundred pieces of gold? was the solemn interrogation of Seius I do promise—was the reply of Sempronius The friends of Sempronius, who answered for his ability and inclination might be separately sued at the option of Seius, and the benefit of partition or order of reciprocal actions insensibly deviated from the strict theory of stipulation The most cautious and deliberate consent was justly required to sustain the validity of a gratuitous promise and the citizen who might have obtained a legal security incurred the suspicion of fraud, and paid the forfeit of his neglect But the ingenuity of the civilians successfully laboured to convert simple engagements into the form of solemn stipulations The prætors as the guardians of social faith admitted every rational evidence of a voluntary and deliberate act which in their tribunal produced an equitable obligation, and for which they gave an action and a remedy [160]

2 The obligations of the second class as they were contracted by the delivery of a thing are marked by the civilians with the epithet of real [161] A grateful return is due to the author of a benefit and whoever is intrusted with the property of another has bound himself to the sacred duty of restitution In the case of a friendly loan the merit of generosity is on the side of the lender only in a deposit on the side of the receiver but in a pledge and the rest of the selfish commerce of ordinary life the benefit is compensated by an equivalent and the obligation to restore is variously modified by the nature of the transaction The Latin language very happily expresses the fundamental difference between the commodatum and the mutuum which our poverty is reduced to confound under the vague and common appellation of a loan In the former the borrower was obliged to restore the same individual thing with which he had been accommodated for the temporary supply of his wants, in the latter it was destined for his use and consumption and he discharged this mutual engagement by substituting the same specific value according to a just estimation of number, of weight and of measure In the contract of sale, the absolute dominion is transferred to the purchaser and he repays the benefit with an adequate sum of gold or silver, the price and universal standard of all earthly possessions The obligation of another contract that of location, is of a more complicated kind Lands or houses labour or talents, may be hired for a definite term, at the expiration of the time the thing itself must be restored to the owner with an additional reward for the beneficial occupation and employment In these lucrative contracts, to which may be added those of partnership and commissions, the civilians sometimes imagine the delivery of the object, and sometimes presume the consent of the parties The substantial pledge has been refined into the invisible rights of a mortgage or hypotheca and the agreement of sale for a certain price imputes from that moment, the chances of gain or loss to the account of the purchaser It may be fairly supposed that every man will obey the dictates of his interest and if he accepts the benefit he is obliged to sustain the expense of the transaction In this boundless subject, the historian will observe the location of land and money the rent of the one and the interest of the other, as they materially affect the prosperity of agriculture and commerce. The landlord was often obliged to advance the stock and instruments of husbandry, and to content himself with a partition of the fruits If the feeble tenant was oppressed by accident contagion or hostile violence he claimed a proportionable relief from the equity of the laws five years were the customary term, and no solid or costly improvements could be expected from a farmer who at each moment might be ejected by the sale of the estate [162] Usury [163] the inveterate grievance of the city had been discouraged by the Twelve Tables [164] and abolished by the clamours of the people It was revived by their wants and idleness tolerated by the discretion of the prætors, and finally determined by the Code of Justinian Persons of illustrious rank were confined to the moderate profit of four per cent six was pronounced to be the ordinary and legal standard of interest eight was allowed for the convenience of manufacturers and merchants twelve was granted to nautical insurance which the wiser ancients had not attempted to define but except in this perilous adventure the practice of exorbitant usury was severely restrained [165] The most simple interest was condemned by the clergy of the East and West [166] but the sense of mutual benefit which had triumphed over the laws of the republic, has resisted with equal firmness the decrees of the church, and even the prejudices of mankind [167]

3 Nature and society impose the strict obligation of repairing an injury and the sufferer by private injustice acquires a personal right and a legitimate action If the property of another be intrusted to our care, the requisite degree of care may rise and fall according to the benefit which we derive from such temporary possession we are seldom made responsible for inevitable accident but the consequences of a voluntary fault must always be imputed to the author [168] A Roman pursued and recovered his stolen goods by a civil action of theft they might pass through a succession of pure and innocent hands but nothing less than a prescription of thirty years could extinguish his original claim. They were restored by the sentence of the prætor and the injury was compensated by double or three fold or even quadruple damages as the deed had been perpetrated by secret fraud or open rapine as the robber had been surprised in the fact or detected by a subsequent research. The Aquilian law [169] defended the living property of a citizen his slaves and cattle from the stroke of malice or negligence the highest price was allowed that could be ascribed to the domestic animal at any moment of the year preceding his death a similar latitude of thirty days was granted on the destruction of any other valuable effects. A personal injury is blunted or sharpened by the manners of the times and the sensibility of the individual the pain or the disgrace of a word or blow cannot easily be appreciated by a pecuniary equivalent. The rude jurisprudence of the decemvirs had confounded all hasty insults which did not amount to the fracture of a limb by condemning the aggressor to the common penalty of twenty five asses But the same denomination of money was reduced in three centuries from a pound to the weight of half an ounce and the insolence of a wealthy Roman indulged himself in the cheap amusement of breaking and satisfying the law of the Twelve Tables Veratius ran through the streets striking on the face the inoffensive passengers and his attendant pursebearer immediately silenced their clamours by the legal tender of twenty five pieces of copper about the value of one shilling [170] The equity of the prætors examined and estimated the distinct merits of each particular complaint. In the adjudication of civil damages the magistrate assumed a right to consider the various circumstances of time and place of age and dignity which may aggravate the shame and sufferings of the injured person but if he admitted the idea of a fine a punishment an example he invaded the province though perhaps he supplied the defects, of the criminal law

The execution of the Alban dictator who was dismembered by eight horses is represented by Livy as the first and last instance of Roman cruelty in the punishment of the most atrocious crimes [171] But this act of justice or revenge was inflicted on a foreign enemy in the heat of victory and at the command of a single man The Twelve Tables afford a more decisive proof of the national spirit since they were framed by the wisest of the senate and accepted by the free voices of the people yet these laws, like the statutes of Draco [172] are written in characters of blood [173] They approve the inhuman and unequal principle of retaliation and the forfeit of an eye for an eye a tooth for a tooth, a limb for a limb is rigorously exacted unless the offender can redeem his pardon by a fine of three hundred pounds of copper The decemvirs distributed with much liberality the slighter chastisements of flagellation and servitude and nine crimes of a very different complexion are adjudged worthy of death. 1 Any act of treason against the state or of correspondence with the public enemy The mode of execution was painful and ignominious the head of the degenerate Roman was shrouded in a veil his hands were tied behind his back and after he had been scourged by the lictor he was suspended in the midst of the forum on a cross or inauspicious tree. 2 Nocturnal meetings in the city what ever might be the pretence—of pleasure or religion or the public good 3 The murder of a citizen for which the common feelings of mankind demand the blood of the murderer Poison is still more odious than the sword or dagger and we are surprised to discover in two flagitious events how early such subtle wickedness had infected the simplicity of the republic and the chaste virtues of the Roman matrons [174] The parricide who violated the duties of nature and gratitude was cast into the river or the sea, enclosed in a sack and a cock a viper a dog and a monkey were successively added as the most suitable companions [175] Italy produces no monkeys but the want could never be felt till the middle of the sixth century first revealed the guilt of a parricide [176] 4 The malice of an incendiary After the previous ceremony of whipping he himself was delivered to the flames and in this example alone our reason is tempted to applaud the justice of retaliation. 5 Judicial perjury The corrupt or malicious witness was thrown headlong from the Tarpeian rock to expiate his falsehood which was rendered still more fatal by the severity of the penal laws and the deficiency of written evidence 6 The corruption of a judge, who accepted bribes to pronounce an iniquitous sentence 7 Libels and satires, whose rude strains sometimes disturbed the peace of an illiterate city The author was beaten with clubs, a worthy chastisement but it is not certain that he was left to expire under the blows of the executioner [177] 8 The nocturnal mischief of damaging or destroying a neighbour s corn The criminal was suspended as a grateful victim to Ceres But the sylvan deities were less implacable and the extirpation of a more valuable tree was compensated by the moderate fine of twenty five pounds of copper 9 Magical incantations which had power in the opinion of the Latian shepherds to exhaust the strength of an enemy to extinguish his life, and to remove from their seats his deep rooted plantations The cruelty of the Twelve Tables against insolvent debtors still remains to be told, and I shall dare to prefer the literal sense of antiquity to the specious refinements of modern criticism [178] After the judicial proof or confession of the debt, thirty days of grace were allowed before a Roman was delivered into the power of his fellow citizen In this private prison twelve ounces of rice were his daily food he might be bound with a chain of fifteen pounds weight and his misery was thrice exposed in the market place to solicit the compassion of his friends and countrymen At the expiration of sixty days the debt was discharged by the loss of liberty or life the insolvent debtor was either put to death or sold in foreign slavery beyond the Tiber but if several creditors were alike obstinate and unrelenting they might legally dismember his body and satiate their revenge by this horrid partition The advocates for this savage law have insisted that it must strongly operate in deterring idleness and fraud from contracting debts which they were unable to discharge, but experience would dissipate this salutary terror by proving that no creditor could be found to exact this unprofitable penalty of life or limb As the manners of Rome were insensibly polished the criminal code of the decemvirs was abolished by the humanity of accusers witnesses, and judges and impunity became the consequence of immoderate rigour The Porcian and Valerian laws prohibited the magistrates from inflicting on a free citizen any capital or even corporal punishment, and the obsolete statutes of blood were artfully and perhaps truly, ascribed to the spirit not of patrician but of regal tyranny

In the absence of penal laws and the insufficiency of civil actions the peace and justice of the city were imperfectly maintained by the private jurisdiction of the citizens The malefactors who replenish our gaols are the outcasts of society and the crimes for which they suffer may be commonly ascribed to ignorance, poverty and brutal appetite For the perpetration of similar enormities a vile plebeian might claim and abuse the sacred character of a member of the republic but on the proof or suspicion of guilt the slave or the stranger was nailed to a cross and this strict and summary justice might be exercised without restraint over the greatest part of the populace of Rome Each family contained a domestic tribunal which was not confined like that of the prætor, to the cognisance of external actions virtuous principles and habits were inculcated by the discipline of education and the Roman father was accountable to the state for the manners of his children, since he disposed without appeal of their life, their liberty and their inheritance In some pressing emergencies the citizen was authorised to avenge his private or public wrongs The consent of the Jewish the Athenian and the Roman laws approved the slaughter of the nocturnal thief though in open daylight a robber could not be slain without some previous evidence of danger and complaint Whoever surprised an adulterer in his nuptial bed might freely exercise his revenge [179] the most bloody or wanton outrage was excused by the provocation [180] nor was it before the reign of Augustus that the husband was reduced to weigh the rank of the offender or that the parent was condemned to sacrifice his daughter with her guilty seducer After the expulsion of the kings, the ambitious Roman who should dare to assume their title or imitate their tyranny was devoted to the infernal gods each of his fellow citizens was armed with the sword of justice and the act of Brutus however repugnant to gratitude or prudence had been already sanctified by the judgment of his country [181] The barbarous practice of wearing arms in the midst of peace [182] and the bloody maxims of honour were unknown to the Romans and during the two purest ages from the establishment of equal freedom to the end of the Punic wars the city was never disturbed by sedition and rarely polluted with atrocious crimes The failure of penal laws was more sensibly felt when every vice was inflamed by faction at home and dominion abroad In the time of Cicero each private citizen enjoyed the privilege of anarchy—each minister of the republic was exalted to the temptations of regal power and their virtues are entitled to the warmest praise as the spontaneous fruits of nature or philosophy After a triennial indulgence of lust rapine and cruelty Verres the tyrant of Sicily could only be sued for the pecuniary restitution of three hundred thousand pounds sterling and such was the temper of the laws the judges and perhaps the accuser himself[183] that on refunding a thirteenth part of his plunder Verres could retire to an easy and luxurious exile[184]

IV The first imperfect attempt to restore the proportion of crimes and punishments was made by the dictator Sylla who in the midst of his sanguinary triumph, aspired to restrain the licence rather than to oppress the liberty of the Romans He gloried in the arbitrary proscription of four thousand seven hundred citizens[185] But in the character of a legislator he respected the prejudices of the times and instead of pronouncing a sentence of death against the robber or assassin the general who betrayed an army or the magistrate who ruined a province Sylla was content to aggravate the pecuniary damages by the penalty of exile or in more constitutional language by the interdiction of fire and water The Cornelian and afterwards the Pompeian and Julian laws introduced a new system of criminal jurisprudence[186] and the emperors from Augustus to Justinian, disguised their increasing rigour under the names of the original authors. But the invention and frequent use of extraordinary pains proceeded from the desire to extend and conceal the progress of despotism In the condemnation of illustrious Romans, the senate was always prepared to confound at the will of their masters the judicial and legislative powers It was the duty of the governors to maintain the peace of their province by the arbitrary and rigid administration of justice the freedom of the city evaporated in the extent of empire and the Spanish malefactor who claimed the privilege of a Roman was elevated by the command of Galba on a fairer and more lofty cross[187] Occasional rescripts issued from the throne to decide the questions which, by their novelty or importance appeared to surpass the authority and discernment of a proconsul Transportation and beheading were reserved for honourable persons meaner criminals were either hanged, or burnt or buried in the mines or exposed to the wild beasts of the amphitheatre. Armed robbers were pursued and extirpated as the enemies of society the driving away horses or cattle was made a capital offence[188] but simple theft was uniformly considered as a mere civil and private injury The degrees of guilt and the modes of punishment were too often determined by the discretion of the rulers and the subject was left in ignorance of the legal danger which he might incur by every action of his life

A sin a vice a crime are the objects of theology ethics and jurisprudence Whenever their judgments agree they corroborate each other but as often as they differ a prudent legislator appreciates the guilt and punishment according to the measure of social injury On this principle the most daring attack on the life and property of a private citizen is judged less atrocious than the crime of treason or rebellion which invades the majesty of the republic the obsequious civilians unanimously pronounced that the republic is contained in the person of its chief and the edge of the Julian law was sharpened by the incessant diligence of the emperors The licentious commerce of the sexes may be tolerated as an impulse of nature or forbidden as a source of disorder and corruption but the fame the fortunes the family of the husband are seriously injured by the adultery of the wife The wisdom of Augustus, after curbing the freedom of revenge applied to this domestic offence the animadversion of the laws and the guilty parties after the payment of heavy forfeitures and fines were condemned to long or perpetual exile in two separate islands[189] Religion pronounces an equal censure against the infidelity of the husband but as it is not accompanied by the same civil effects the wife was never permitted to vindicate her wrongs[190] and the distinction of simple or double adultery, so familiar and so important in the canon law is unknown to the jurisprudence of the Code and Pandects I touch with reluctance and despatch with impatience a more odious vice, of which modesty rejects the name and nature abominates the idea The primitive Romans were infected by the example of the Etruscans[191] and Greeks[192] in the mad abuse of prosperity and power every pleasure that is innocent was deemed insipid and the Scatinian law[193] which had been extorted by an act of violence was insensibly abolished by the lapse of time and the multitude of criminals By this law the rape perhaps the seduction of an ingenuous youth was compensated as a personal injury by the poor damages of ten thousand sesterces or four score pounds the ravisher might be slain by the resistance or revenge of chastity and I wish to believe that at Rome as in Athens, the voluntary and effeminate deserter of his sex was degraded from the honours and the rights of a citizen [194] But the practice of vice was not discouraged by the severity of opinion the indelible stain of manhood was confounded with the more venial transgressions of fornication and adultery nor was the licentious lover exposed to the same dishonour which he impressed on the male or female partner of his guilt From Catullus to Juvenal [195] the poets accuse and celebrate the degeneracy of the times, and the reformation of manners was feebly attempted by the reason and authority of the civilians till the most virtuous of the Cæsars proscribed the sin against nature as a crime against society [196]

A new spirit of legislation, respectable even in its error, arose in the empire with the religion of Constantine [197] The laws of Moses were received as the divine original of justice, and the Christian princes adapted their penal statutes to the degrees of moral and religious turpitude. Adultery was first declared to be a capital offence the frailty of the sexes was assimilated to poison or assassination, to sorcery or parricide, the same penalties were inflicted on the passive and active guilt of pæderasty and all criminals of free or servile condition were either drowned or beheaded or cast alive into the avenging flames The adulterers were spared by the common sympathy of mankind but the lovers of their own sex were pursued by general and pious indignation the impure manners of Greece still prevailed in the cities of Asia and every vice was fomented by the celibacy of the monks and clergy Justinian relaxed the punishment at least of female infidelity the guilty spouse was only condemned to solitude and penance and at the end of two years might be recalled to the arms of a forgiving husband But the same emperor declared himself the implacable enemy of unmanly lust, and the cruelty of his persecution can scarcely be excused by the purity of his motives [198] In defiance of every principle of justice he stretched to past as well as future offences the operations of his edicts with the previous allowance of a short respite for confession and pardon A painful death was inflicted by the amputation of the sinful instrument or the insertion of sharp reeds into the pores and tubes of most exquisite sensibility and Justinian defended the propriety of the execution since the criminals would have lost their hands had they been convicted of sacrilege. In this state of disgrace and agony two bishops, Isaiah of Rhodes and Alexander of Diospolis, were dragged through the streets of Constantinople, while their brethren were admonished by the voice of a crier to observe this awful lesson and not to pollute the sanctity of their character Perhaps these prelates were innocent A sentence of death and infamy was often founded on the slight and suspicious evidence of a child or a servant the guilt of the green faction of the rich and of the enemies of Theodora was presumed by the judges and pæderasty became the crime of those to whom no crime could be imputed. A French philosopher[199] has dared to remark that whatever is secret must be doubtful and that our natural horror of vice may be abused as an engine of tyranny But the favourable persuasion of the same writer that a legislator may confide in the taste and reason of mankind is impeached by the unwelcome discovery of the antiquity and extent of the disease [200]

The free citizens of Athens and Rome enjoyed in all criminal cases the invaluable privilege of being tried by their country [201] The administration of justice is the most ancient office of a prince it was exercised by the Roman kings and abused by Tarquin who alone without law or council pronounced his arbitrary judgments The first consuls succeeded to this regal prerogative but the sacred right of appeal soon abolished the jurisdiction of the magistrates and all public causes were decided by the supreme tribunal of the people But a wild democracy superior to the forms, too often disdains the essential principles of justice the pride of despotism was envenomed by plebeian envy and the heroes of Athens might sometimes applaud the happiness of the Persian, whose fate depended on the caprice of a [illegible] tyrant Some salutary restraints imposed by the people on their own passions were at once the cause and effect of the gravity and temperance of the Romans The right of accusation was confined to the magistrates A vote of the thirty five tribes could inflict a fine but the cognisance of all capital crimes was reserved by a fundamental law to the assembly of the centuries in which the weight of influence and property was sure to preponderate Repeated proclamations and adjournments were interposed to allow time for prejudice and resentment to subside the whole proceeding might be annulled by a seasonable omen or the opposition of a tribune and such popular trials were commonly less formidable to innocence than they were favourable to guilt But this union of the judicial and legislative powers left it doubtful whether the accused party was pardoned or acquitted and in the defence of an illustrious client the orators of Rome and Athens address their arguments to the policy and benevolence as well as to the justice of their sovereign 2 The task of convening the citizens for the trial of each offender became more difficult as the citizens and the offenders continually multiplied and the ready expedient was adopted of delegating the jurisdiction of the people to the ordinary magistrates or to extraordinary inquisitors In the first ages these questions were rare and occasional In the beginning of the seventh century of Rome they were made perpetual four prætors were annually empowered to sit in judgment on the state offences of treason extortion peculation and bribery and Sylla added new prætors and new questions for those crimes which more directly injure the safety of individuals By these inquisitors the trial was prepared and directed but they could only pronounce the sentence of the majority of judges who with some truth and more prejudice have been compared to the English juries[202] To discharge this important though burdensome office an annual list of ancient and respectable citizens was formed by the prætor After many constitutional struggles they were chosen in equal numbers from the senate the equestrian order and the people four hundred and fifty were appointed for single questions and the various rolls or decuries of judges must have contained the names of some thousand Romans who represented the judicial authority of the state In each particular cause a sufficient number was drawn from the urn their integrity was guarded by an oath the mode of ballot secured their independence the suspicion of partiality was removed by the mutual challenges of the accuser and defendant and the judges of Milo by the retrenchment of fifteen on each side were reduced to fifty-one voices or tablets of acquittal of condemnation, or of favourable doubt[203] 3 In the civil jurisdiction the prætor of the city was truly a judge and almost a legislator but as soon as he had prescribed the action of law he often referred to a delegate the determination of the fact With the increase of legal proceedings the tribunal of the centumvirs in which he presided acquired more weight and reputation But whether he acted alone or with the advice of his council the most absolute powers might be trusted to a magistrate who was annually chosen by the votes of the people The rules and precautions of freedom have required some explanation the order of despotism is simple and inanimate Before the age of Justinian or perhaps of Diocletian the decuries of Roman judges had sunk to an empty title the humble advice of the assessors might be accepted or despised and in each tribunal the civil and criminal jurisdiction was administered by a single magistrate who was raised and disgraced by the will of the emperor

A Roman accused of any capital crime might prevent the sentence of the law by voluntary exile or death Till his guilt had been legally proved his innocence was presumed and his person was free till the votes of the last century had been counted and declared he might peaceably secede to any of the allied cities of Italy or Greece or Asia[204] His fame and fortunes were preserved at least to his children by this civil death and he might still be happy in every rational and sensual enjoyment if a mind accustomed to the ambitious tumult of Rome could support the uniformity and silence of Rhodes or Athens A bolder effort was required to escape from the tyranny of the Cæsars but this effort was rendered familiar by the maxims of the Stoics the example of the bravest Romans and the legal encouragements of suicide The bodies of condemned criminals were exposed to public ignominy and their children a more serious evil were reduced to poverty by the confiscation of their fortunes. But if the victims of Tiberius and Nero anticipated the decree of the prince or senate their courage and despatch were recompensed by the applause of the public, the decent honours of burial and the validity of their testaments[204] The exquisite avarice and cruelty of Domitian appears to have deprived the unfortunate of this last consolation and it was still denied even by the clemency of the Antonines A voluntary death which in the case of a capital offence intervened between the accusation and the sentence was admitted as a confession of guilt and the spoils of the deceased were seized by the inhuman claims of the treasury[206] Yet the civilians have always respected the natural right of a citizen to dispose of his life and the posthumous disgrace invented by Tarquin[207] to check the despair of his subjects was never revived or imitated by succeeding tyrants The powers of this world have indeed lost their dominion over him who is resolved on death and his arm can only be restrained by the religious apprehension of a future state Suicides are enumerated by Virgil among the unfortunate rather than the guilty[208] and the poetical fables of the infernal shades could not seriously influence the faith or practice of mankind But the precepts of the Gospel or the church have at length imposed a pious servitude on the minds of Christians and condemn them to expect without a murmur, the last stroke of disease or the executioner

The penal statutes form a very small proportion of the sixty two books of the Code and Pandects, and in all judicial proceeding the life or death of a citizen is determined with less caution and delay than the most ordinary question of covenant or inheritance This singular distinction, though something may be allowed for the urgent necessity of defending the peace of society, is derived from the nature of criminal and civil jurisprudence Our duties to the state are simple and uniform the law by which he is condemned is inscribed not only on brass or marble, but on the conscience of the offender, and his guilt is commonly proved by the testimony of a single fact But our relations to each other are various and infinite, our obligations are created, annulled and modified by injuries benefits and promises and the interpretation of voluntary contracts and testaments which are often dictated by fraud or ignorance affords a long and laborious exercise to the sagacity of the judge The business of life is multiplied by the extent of commerce and dominion and the residence of the parties in the distant provinces of an empire is productive of doubt delay, and inevitable appeals from the local to the supreme magistrate Justinian the Greek emperor of Constantinople and the East was the legal successor of the Latian shepherd who had planted a colony on the banks of the Tiber In a period of thirteen hundred years the laws had reluctantly followed the changes of government and manners and the laudable desire of conciliating ancient names with recent institutions destroyed the harmony, and swelled the magnitude of the obscure and irregular system The laws which excuse on any occasions the ignorance of their subjects confess their own imperfections the civil jurisprudence as it was abridged by Justinian, still continued a mysterious science and a profitable trade, and the innate perplexity of the study was involved in tenfold darkness by the private industry of the practitioners The expense of the pursuit sometimes exceeded the value of the prize and the fairest rights were abandoned by the poverty or prudence of the claimants Such costly justice might tend to abate the spirit of litigation, but the unequal pressure serves only to increase the influence of the rich and to aggravate the misery of the poor By these dilatory and expensive proceedings the wealthy pleader obtains a more certain advantage than he could hope from the accidental corruption of his judge The experience of an abuse from which our own age and country are not perfectly exempt may sometimes provoke a generous indignation and extort the hasty wish of exchanging our elaborate jurisprudence for the simple and summary decrees of a Turkish cadhi Our calmer reflection will suggest that such forms and delays are necessary to guard the person and property of the citizen that the discretion of the judge is the first engine of tyranny and that the laws of a free people should foresee and determine every question that may probably arise in the exercise of power and the transactions of industry But the government of Justinian united the evils of liberty and servitude and the Romans were oppressed at the same time by the multiplicity of their laws and the arbitrary will of their master

Reign of the Younger Justin Embassy of the Avars Their Settlement on the Danube Conquest of Italy by the Lombards Adoption and Reign of Tiberius Of Maurice State of Italy under the Lombards and the Exarchs Of Ravenna Distress of Rome Character and Pontificate of Gregory the First

DURING the last years of Justinian his infirm mind was devoted to heavenly contemplation and he neglected the business of the lower world His subjects were impatient of the long continuance of his life and reign yet all who were capable of reflection apprehended the moment of his death which might involve the capital in tumult and the empire in civil war Seven nephews[1] of the childless monarch the sons or grandsons of his brother and sister had been educated in the splendour of a princely fortune they had been shown in high commands to the provinces and armies their characters were known their followers were zealous and as the jealousy of age postponed the declaration of a successor they might expect with equal hopes the inheritance of their uncle. He expired in his palace after a reign of thirty-eight years and the decisive opportunity was embraced by the friends of Justin the son of Vigilantia.[2] At the hour of midnight his domestics were awakened by an importunate crowd who thundered at his door and obtained admittance by revealing themselves to be the principal members of the senate. These welcome deputies announced the recent and momentous secret of the emperor's decease reported, or perhaps invented his dying choice of the best beloved and most deserving of his nephews and conjured Justin to prevent the disorders of the multitude if they should perceive, with the return of light, that they were left without a master After composing his countenance to surprise sorrow and decent modesty Justin, by the advice of his wife Sophia, submitted to the authority of the senate He was conducted with speed and silence to the palace the guards saluted their new sovereign and the martial and religious rites of his coronation were diligently accomplished. By the hands of the proper officers he was invested with the Imperial garments, the red buskins white tunic and purple robe. A fortunate soldier whom he instantly promoted to the rank of tribune encircled his neck with a military collar four robust youths exalted him on a shield he stood firm and erect to receive the adoration of his subjects and their choice was sanctified by the benediction of the patriarch, who imposed the diadem on the head of an orthodox prince The hippodrome was already filled with innumerable multitudes and no sooner did the emperor appear on his throne than the voices of the blue and the green factions were confounded in the same loyal acclamations In the speeches which Justin addressed to the senate and people he promised to correct the abuses which had disgraced the age of his predecessor displayed the maxims of a just and beneficent government, and declared that, on the approaching calends of January[3] he would revive in his own person the name and liberality of a Roman consul. The immediate discharge of his uncle's debts exhibited a solid pledge of his faith and generosity a train of porters laden with bags of gold, advanced into the midst of the hippodrome and the hopeless creditors of Justinian accepted this equitable payment as a voluntary gift Before the end of three years his example was imitated and surpassed by the empress Sophia who delivered many indigent citizens from the weight of debt and usury an act of benevolence the best entitled to gratitude since it relieves the most intolerable distress but in which the bounty of a prince is the most liable to be abused by the claims of prodigality and fraud[4]

On the seventh day of his reign Justin gave audience to the ambassadors of the Avars and the scene was decorated to impress the barbarians with astonishment veneration, and terror From the palace gate, the spacious courts and long porticoes were lined with the lofty crests and gilt bucklers of the guards, who presented their spears and axes with more confidence than they would have shown in a field of battle The officers who exercised the power or attended the person of the prince were attired in their richest habits and arranged according to the military and civil order of the hierarchy When the veil of the sanctuary was withdrawn, the ambassadors beheld the emperor of the East on his throne beneath a canopy or dome which was supported by four columns and crowned with a winged figure of Victory In the first emotions of surprise they submitted to the servile adoration of the Byzantine court but as soon as they rose from the ground Targetius, the chief of the embassy expressed the freedom and pride of a barbarian He extolled by the tongue of his interpreter the greatness of the chagan by whose clemency the kingdoms of the South were permitted to exist, whose victorious subjects had traversed the frozen rivers of Scythia and who now covered the banks of the Danube with innumerable tents. The late emperor had cultivated with annual and costly gifts, the friendship of a grateful monarch, and the enemies of Rome had respected the allies of the Avars The same prudence would instruct the nephew of Justinian to imitate the liberality of his uncle and to purchase the blessings of peace from an invincible people who delighted and excelled in the exercise of war The reply of the emperor was delivered in the same strain of haughty defiance and he derived his confidence from the God of the Christians the ancient glory of Rome and the recent triumphs of Justinian. The empire, said he abounds with men and horses and arms sufficient to defend our frontiers and to chastise the barbarians. You offer aid, you threaten hostilities we despise your enmity and your aid. The conquer

ors of the Avars solicit our alliance shall we dread their fugitives and exiles?[5] The bounty of our uncle was granted to your misery to your humble prayers From us you shall receive a more important obligation the knowledge of your own weakness Retire from our presence the lives of ambassadors are safe and, if you return to implore our pardon perhaps you will taste of our benevolence ' [6] On the report of his ambassadors the chagan was awed by the apparent firmness of a Roman emperor of whose character and resources he was ignorant Instead of executing his threats against the Eastern empire, he marched into the poor and savage countries of Germany which were subject to the dominion of the Franks After two doubtful battles he consented to retire and the Austrasian king relieved the distress of his camp with an immediate supply of corn and cattle [7] Such repeated disappointments had chilled the spirit of the Avars, and their power would have dissolved away in the Sarmatian desert if the alliance of Alboin king of the Lombards had not given a new object to their arms and a lasting settlement to their wearied fortunes

While Alboin served under his father s standard he encountered in battle and transpierced with his lance the rival prince of the Gepidæ The Lombards who applauded such early prowess requested his father, with unanimous acclamations that the heroic youth who had shared the dangers of the field might be admitted to the feast of victory You are not unmindful ' replied the inflexible Audoin of the wise customs of our ancestors Whatever may be his merit a prince is incapable of sitting at table with his father till he has received his arms from a foreign and royal hand Alboin bowed with reverence to the institutions of his country, selected forty companions, and boldly visited the court of Turisund king of the Gepidæ who embraced and entertained according to the laws of hospitality the murderer of his son At the banquet whilst Alboin occupied the seat of the youth whom he had slain a tender remembrance arose in the mind of Turisund How dear is that place—how hateful is that person! were the words that escaped with a sigh from the indignant father His grief exasperated the national resentment of the Gepidæ and Cunimund his surviving son was provoked by wine or fraternal affection to the desire of vengeance "The Lombards said the rude barbarian 'resemble in figure and in smell the mares of our Sarmatian plains ' And this insult was a coarse allusion to the white bands which enveloped their legs "Add another resemblance,' replied an audacious Lombard ' you have felt how strongly they kick. Visit the plain of Asfeld and seek for the bones of thy brother they are mingled with those of the vilest animals ' The Gepidæ a nation of warriors started from their seats and the fearless Alboin with his forty companions laid their hands on their swords The tumult was appeased by the venerable interposition of Turisund He saved his own honour, and the life of his guest and after the solemn rites of investiture dismissed the stranger in the bloody arms of his son, the gift of a weeping parent Alboin returned in triumph and the Lombards, who celebrated his matchless intrepidity were compelled to praise the virtues of an enemy [8] In this extraordinary visit he had probably seen the daughter of Cunimund who soon after ascended the throne of the Gepidæ Her name was Rosamond, an appellation expressive of female beauty and which our own history or romance has consecrated to amorous tales The king of the Lombards (the father of Alboin no longer lived) was contracted to the grand daughter of Clovis but the restraints of faith and policy soon yielded to the hope of possessing the fair Rosamond and of insulting her family and nation The arts of persuasion were tried without success and the impatient lover by force and stratagem obtained the object of his desires. War was the consequence which he foresaw and solicited but the Lombards could not long withstand the furious assault of the Gepidæ who were sustained by a Roman army And, as the offer of marriage was rejected with contempt, Alboin was compelled to relinquish his prey and to partake of the disgrace which he had inflicted on the house of Cunimund[9]

When a public quarrel is envenomed by private injuries a blow that is not mortal or decisive can be productive only of a short truce which allows the unsuccessful combatant to sharpen his arms for a new encounter The strength of Alboin had been found unequal to the gratification of his love, ambition and revenge he condescended to implore the formidable aid of the chagan and the arguments that he employed are expressive of the art and policy of the barbarians In the attack of the Gepidæ he had been prompted by the just desire of extirpating a people whom their alliance with the Roman empire had rendered the common enemies of the nations and the personal adversaries of the chagan If the forces of the Avars and the Lombards should unite

n this glorious quarrel the victory was secure and the reward inest mable the Danube the Hebrus, Italy and Constantinople v ould be ex posed, without a barr er to their in incible arms But, f they hesitated or delayed to pre vent the mal ce of the Romans, the same spirit which had insul ed would pursue the Avars to the extrem ty of the earth These specious rea sons were heard by the chagan with coldness and disdain he detained the Lombard am basad rs in his camp, protracted the negotia tion and by turns alleged his v ant of inclina tion or his want of ability to undertake this im po tant enterprise At length he sign f ed the ul imate pr ce of his all ance that the Lombards should immediately present him with the t the of their cattle that the spo ls and captives should be equally d vided but that the lands of the Gep dæ should become the sole patrimony of the Avars Such hard conditions were eager ly accepted by the pass ons of Albo n and as the Romans were dissatisfied w th the ngrat tude and perfidy of the Gep dæ, Just n aban doned that ncorrigible people to their fate and remained the tranquil spectator of this unequal conflict The despair of Cunimund was active and dangerous He was informed that the Avars had entered his confines but, on the strong as surance that after the defeat of the Lombards these fore gn nvaders would easily be repelled, he rushed forwards to encounter the impla able enemy of his name and family But the courage of the Gep dæ could secure them no more than an honourable death The bra est of the nat on fell in the field of ba tle the king of the Lom bards contempla ed ith delight the head of Cunimund and his skull as fashioned into a cup to satiate the hatred of the conqu ror or perhaps to comply w th the sa age custom of his country [9] After this ictory no farther ob stacle could impede the progress of th confed era es and they faithfully execu ed the terms of their agreement The fair countries of Wal lachia Moldavia, Transylvania and the parts of Hungary be ond the Danube were occup ed w thout resistance by a new colony of Scy thians and the Dacian empire of the chagans subsis ed ith splendour above two hundred and thirty years The nation of the Gepidæ was dissol ed but n the distribution of the cap t ves the s a es of the Avars were less fortunate than the compan ons of the Lombards, whose generos ty adopted a valiant foe and whose freedom was incompatible with cool and del b erate tyranny One mo ety of the spoil intro duced into the camp of Alboin more wealth than a barbarian could read ly compute. The fa r Rosamond was persuaded or compelled to acknov ledge the rights of l er victorious lover and the daughter of Cun mund appeared to forg ve those cr mes wh ch m ght be imputed to her own irresist ble charms

The destruct on of a mighty k ngdom es tablished the fame of Albo n In the days of Charlemagne the Bavarians the Saxons and the other tribes of the Teutonic language st ll repeated the songs which described the hero c virtues the valour l beral ty and fortune of the king of the Lombards.[12] But his amb t on was yet unsatisfied and the conqueror of the Gepi dæ turned his eyes from the Danube to the rich er banks of the Po and the Tiber Fifteen years had not elapsed s nce his subjects the confed erates of Narses, had vis ted the pleasant cli mate of Italy the mounta ns the rivers the highways were familiar to the r memory the report of their success perhaps the view of their spoils had kindled in the ris ng generation the flame of emulat on and enterprise Their hopes were encouraged by the sp rit and eloquence of Alboin and it is affirmed that he spoke to their senses by produc ng at the royal feast the fairest and most exquisite fruits that grew spontane ously in the garden of the world No sooner had he erected his standard than the nat ve strength of the Lombards v as multiplied by the ad enturous youth of Germany and Scy thia. The robust peasantry of Noricum and Pannonia had resumed the manners of bar barians and the names of the Gep dæ Bul garians Sarmat ans, and Bavarians may be distinctly traced in the provinces of Italy [13] Of the Saxons the old all es of the Lombards t enty thousand warriors with their w es and children accepted the in itat on of Alboin. The r bravery contributed to his success but the access on or the absence of their numbers was not sens bly felt in the magn tude of his host Every mode of rel gion was freely prac tised by its respective votaries The k ng of the Lombards had been educated in the Arian heresy but the catholics in their public worsh p were allowed to pray for his conversion while the more stubborn barbarians sacrif ced a she goat or perhaps a captive to the gods of their fathers.[14] The Lombards and their confederates were united by their common attachment to a chief who excelled in all the virtues and vices of a savage hero and the vigi ance of Albo n pro vided an ample magazine of offens ve and de fens e arms for the use of the exped t on The portable wealth of the Lombards attended the march their lands they cheerfully relinquished to the Avars on the solemn promise which was made and accepted without a smile that if they failed in the conquest of Italy these voluntary exiles should be reinstated in their former possessions

They might have failed if Narses had been the antagonist of the Lombards, and the veteran warriors, the associates of his Gothic victory, would have encountered with reluctance an enemy whom they dreaded and esteemed But the weakness of the Byzantine court was subservient to the barbarian cause, and it was for the ruin of Italy that the emperor once listened to the complaints of his subjects The virtues of Narses were stained with avarice and in his provincial reign of fifteen years he accumulated a treasure of gold and silver which surpassed the modesty of a private fortune His government was oppressive or unpopular, and the general discontent was expressed with freedom by the deputies of Rome Before the throne of Justin they boldly declared that their Gothic servitude had been more tolerable than the despotism of a Greek eunuch and that unless their tyrant were instantly removed they would consult their own happiness in the choice of a master The apprehension of a revolt was urged by the voice of envy and detraction, which had so recently triumphed over the merit of Belisarius A new exarch Longinus, was appointed to supersede the conqueror of Italy and the base motives of his recall were revealed in the insulting mandate of the empress Sophia that he should leave to men the exercise of arms and return to his proper station among the maidens of the palace where a distaff should be again placed in the hand of the eunuch I will spin her such a thread as she shall not easily unravel! is said to have been the reply which indignation and conscious virtue extorted from the hero Instead of attending a slave and a victim at the gate of the Byzantine palace he retired to Naples from whence (if any credit is due to the belief of the times) Narses invited the Lombards to chastise the ingratitude of the prince and people [15] But the passions of the people are furious and changeable and the Romans soon recollected the merits or dreaded the resentment of their victorious general By the mediation of the pope who undertook a special pilgrimage to Naples their repentance was accepted and Narses assuming a milder aspect and a more dutiful language consented to fix his residence in the Capitol His death [16] though in the extreme period of old age was unseasonable and premature since his genius alone could have repaired the last and fatal error of his life The reality, or the suspicion of a conspiracy disarmed and disunited the Italians The soldiers resented the disgrace and bewailed the loss of their general They were ignorant of their new exarch, and Longinus was himself ignorant of the state of the army and the province In the preceding years Italy had been desolated by pestilence and famine and a disaffected people ascribed the calamities of nature to the guilt or folly of their rulers [17]

Whatever might be the grounds of his security Alboin neither expected nor encountered a Roman army in the field He ascended the Julian Alps and looked down with contempt and desire on the fruitful plains to which his victory communicated the perpetual appellation of LOMBARDY A faithful chieftain and a select band were stationed at Forum Julii the modern Friuli to guard the passes of the mountains The Lombards respected the strength of Pavia and listened to the prayers of the Trevisans their slow and heavy multitudes proceeded to occupy the palace and city of Verona and Milan now rising from her ashes was invested by the powers of Alboin five months after his departure from Pannonia Terror preceded his march he found everywhere, or he left a dreary solitude and the pusillanimous Italians presumed without a trial that the stranger was invincible Escaping to lakes or rocks or morasses the affrighted crowds concealed some fragments of their wealth and delayed the moment of their servitude Paulinus the patriarch of Aquileia removed his treasures sacred and profane to the isle of Grado [18] and his successors were adopted by the infant republic of Venice which was continually enriched by the public calamities Honoratus who filled the chair of St Ambrose had credulously accepted the faithless offers of a capitulation and the archbishop with the clergy and nobles of Milan were driven by the perfidy of Alboin to seek a refuge in the less accessible ramparts of Genoa Along the maritime coast the courage of the inhabitants was supported by the facility of supply the hopes of relief and the power of escape but from the Trentine hills to the gates of Ravenna and Rome the inland regions of Italy became without a battle or a siege the lasting patrimony of the Lombards The submission of the people invited the barbarian to assume the character of a lawful sovereign and the helpless exarch was confined to the office of announcing to the emperor Justin the rapid and irretrievable loss of his provinces and cities[19] One city which had been diligently fortified by the Goths, resisted the arms of a new invader and while Italy was subdued by the flying detachments of the Lombards the royal camp was fixed above three years before the western gate Ticinum or Pavia. The same courage which tains the esteem of a civilised enemy provokes fury of a savage and the impatient besieger d bound himself by a tremendous oath that e, and sex and dignity should be confounded a general massacre The aid of famine at ngth enabled him to execute his bloody vow it as Alboin entered the gate his horse stum led, fell and could not be raised from the round. One of his attendants was prompted by ompassion, or piety to interpret this miracu ous sign of the wrath of Heaven the conqueror aused and relented he sheathed his sword nd peacefully reposing himself in the palace of Theodoric proclaimed to the trembling mul titude that they should live and obey Delighted with the situation of a city which was endeared to his pride by the difficulty of the purchase the prince of the Lombards disdained the ancient glories of Milan and Pavia during some ages was respected as the capital of the kingdom of Italy[20]

The reign of the founder was splendid and transient and before he could regulate his new conquests Alboin fell a sacrifice to domestic treason and female revenge. In a palace near Verona, which had not been erected for the barbarians, he feasted the companions of his arms intoxication was the reward of valour and the king himself was tempted by appetite or vanity to exceed the ordinary measure of his intemperance After draining many capacious bowls of Rhætian or Falernian win he called for the skull of Cunimund the noblest and most precious ornament of his sideboard. The cup of victory was accepted with horrid applause by the circle of the Lombard ch efs Fill it again with wine!" exclaimed the inhuman conqueror fill it to the brim! carry this goblet to the queen, and request in my name that she would rejoice with her father In an agony of grief and rage Rosamond had strength to utter ' Let the will of my lord be obeyed!' and, tou hing it with her lips pronounced a silent imprecation that the insult hould be washed away in the blood of Alboin. Some indulgence might be due to the resentment of a daughter if she had not al ready violated the duties of a wife. Implacable in her enmity or inconstant in her love the queen of Italy had stooped from the throne to the arms of a subject and Helmichis the king's armour bearer was the secret minister of her pleasure and revenge Against the proposal of the murder he could no longer urge the scruples of fidelity or gratitude but Helmichis trembled when he revolved the danger as well as the guilt, when he recollected the matchless strength and intrepidity of a warrior whom he had so often attended in the field of battle He pressed and obtained that one of the bravest champions of the Lombards should be associated to the enter prise but no more than a promise of secrecy could be drawn from the gallant Peredeus and the mode of seduction employed by Rosamond betrays her shameless insensibility both to honour and love She supplied the place of one of her female attendants who was beloved by Peredeus and contrived some excuse for darkness and silence till she could inform her companion that he had enjoyed the queen of the Lombards and that his own death or the d ath of Alboin must be the consequence of such treasonable adultery In this alternative he chose rather to be the accomplice than the victim of Rosamond,[21] whose undaunted spirit was incapable of fear or remorse. She expected and soon found a favourable moment when the king oppressed with wine had retired from the table to his afternoon slumbers His faithless spouse was anxious for his health and repose the gates of the palace were shut the arms re moved the attendants dismissed and Rosa mond after lulling him to rest by her tender caresses unbolted the chamber-door and urged the reluctant conspirators to the instant execu tion of the deed On the first alarm the warrior started from his couch his sword which he at tempted to draw had been fastened to the scabbard by the hand of Rosamond and a small stool his only weapon could not long protect him from the spears of the assassins The daugh ter of Cunimund smiled in his fall his body was buried under the staircase of the palace and the grateful posterity of the Lombards revered the tomb and the memory of their victorious leader

The ambitious Rosamond aspired to reign in the nam of her lover the city and palace of Verona were awed by her power and a faithful band of her native Gepidæ was prepared to applaud the revenge and to second the wishes of their sovereign But the Lombard chiefs who fled in the first moments of consternation and disorder had resumed their courage and col lected their powers and the nation instead of submitting to her reign demanded with unani mous cries that justice should be executed on the guilty spouse and the murderers of their king She sought a refuge among the enemies of her country and a criminal who deserved the abhorrence of mankind was protected by the selfish policy of the exarch With her daughter the heiress of the Lombard throne her two lovers her trusty Gepidæ and the spoils of the palace of Verona Rosamond descended the Adige and the Po, and was transported by a Greek vessel to the safe harbour of Ravenna Longinus beheld with delight the charms and the treasures of the widow of Alboin her situation and her past conduct might justify the most licentious proposals and she readily listened to the passion of a minister who even in the decline of the empire, was respected as the equal of kings The death of a jealous lover was an easy and grateful sacrifice and as Helmichis issued from the bath he received the deadly potion from the hand of his mistress The taste of the liquor, its speedy operation and his experience of the character of Rosamond, convinced him that he was poisoned he pointed his dagger to her breast compelled her to drain the remainder of the cup and expired in a few minutes with the consolation that she could not survive to enjoy the fruits of her wickedness The daughter of Alboin and Rosamond with the richest spoils of the Lombards was embarked for Constantinople the surprising strength of Peredeus amused and terrified the Imperial court his blindness and revenge exhibited an imperfect copy of the adventures of Samson By the free suffrage of the nation in the assembly of Pavia Clepho one of their noblest chiefs was elected as the successor of Alboin Before the end of eighteen months the throne was polluted by a second murder Clepho was stabbed by the hand of a domestic, the regal office was suspended above ten years during the minority of his son Autharis, and Italy was divided and oppressed by a ducal aristocracy of thirty tyrants [22]

When the nephew of Justinian ascended the throne, he proclaimed a new era of happiness and glory The annals of the second Justin[23] are marked with disgrace abroad and misery at home In the West the Roman empire was afflicted by the loss of Italy the desolation of Africa and the conquests of the Persians Injustice prevailed both in the capital and the provinces the rich trembled for their property the poor for their safety the ordinary magistrates were ignorant or venal the occasional remedies appear to have been arbitrary and violent, and the complaints of the people could no longer be silenced by the splendid names of a legislator and a conqueror The opinion which imputes to the prince all the calamities of his times may be countenanced by the historian as a serious truth or a salutary prejudice Yet a candid suspicion will arise that the sentiments of Justin were pure and benevolent and that he might have filled his station without reproach if the faculties of his mind had not been impaired by disease, which deprived the emperor of the use of his feet and confined him to the palace a stranger to the complaints of the people and the vices of the government The tardy knowledge of his own impotence determined him to lay down the weight of the diadem, and in the choice of a worthy substitute he showed some symptoms of a discerning and even magnanimous spirit The only son of Justin and Sophia died in his infancy their daughter Arabia was the wife of Baduarius [23] superintendent of the palace, and afterwards commander of the Italian armies who vainly aspired to confirm the rights of marriage by those of adoption While the empire appeared an object of desire, Justin was accustomed to behold with jealousy and hatred his brothers and cousins the rivals of his hopes nor could he depend on the gratitude of those who would accept the purple as a restitution rather than a gift Of these competitors one had been removed by exile and afterwards by death and the emperor himself had inflicted such cruel insults on another, that he must either dread his resentment or despise his patience This domestic animosity was refined into a generous resolution of seeking a successor not in his family but in the republic and the artful Sophia recommended Tiberius,[24] his faithful captain of the guards whose virtues and fortune the emperor might cherish as the fruit of his judicious choice The ceremony of his elevation to the rank of Cæsar or Augustus was performed in the portico of the palace in the presence of the patriarch and the senate Justin collected the remaining strength of his mind and body but the popular belief that his speech was inspired by the Deity betrays a very humble opinion both of the man and of the times [25] You behold' said the emperor the ensigns of supreme power You are about to receive them not from my hand but from the hand of God Honour them and from them you will derive honour Respect the empress your mother you are now her son before, you were her servant. Delight not in blood abstain from revenge avoid those actions by which I have incurred the public hatred and consult the experience, rather than the example of your predecessor As a man I have s nned as a s nner even in this life I have been severely punished but these servants (and he pointed to his ministers) who have abused my confidence and inflamed my passions, will appear with me before the tribunal of Christ I have been dazzled by the splendour of the d adem be thou wise and modest remember what you have been re member what you are You see around us your slaves and your children with the authority assume the tenderness of a parent Love your people like yourself cultivate the affect ons, tain ain the disc pl ne of the army protect the ortunes of the rich relie e the necess t es of the oor * The assembly in silence and in tears, pplauded the counsels and sympathised with he repentance of their prince the patriarch re hearsed the prayers of the church T berius re ceived the diadem on his knees and Justin who in his abdication appeared most worthy to reign, addressed the new monarch in the follow ing words — If you consent I live if you com mand, I die may the God of heaven and earth infuse into your heart whatever I have neg lected or forgotten The four last years of the emperor Justin were passed in tranquil obscur y his conscience was no longer tormen ed by the remembrance of those dut es wh ch he was incapable of discharging and his choice was justified by the filial reverence and grat tude of T berius

Among the virtues of T berius[37] his beauty (he was one of the tallest and most comely of the Romans) might ntroduce him to the favour of Sophia and the widow of Justin was per suaded that she should preserve her stat on and influence under the reign of a second and more youthful husband. But if the amb tious cand da e had been tempted to flatter and dissem b e t was no longer in his power to fulfil her expectations or his own promise The fact ons of the h ppodrome demanded wi h some im patience the name of their new empress both the people and Sophia were astonished by the proclamat on of Anastasia the secret though lawful wife of the emperor Tiberius. Whatever could allevia e the disappointment of Sophia, imperial honours, a stat) palace a numerous household was l berally bes owed by the piety of her adop ed son on solemn occas ons he at tended and consul ed the widow of his bene factor but her ambition disdained the vain semblance of royalty and the respectful appel lation of mother served to exasperate rather than appease the rage of an injured woman. While she accepted and repa d w th a courtly smile the fa r expressions of regard and conf dence a secret alliance was concluded between the do ager empress and her anc ent enem es and Just nian the son of Germanus, was em ployed as the instrument of her revenge The pride of the re gn ng house supported with re luctance the domin on of a stranger the youth was deservedly popular his name after the death of Justin had been ment oned by a tumul tuous fact on and his own submiss ve offer of his head, with a treasure of sixty thousand pounds, might be interpreted as an evidence of guilt or at least of fear Justin an recei ed a free pardon and the command of the eastern army The Pers an monarch fled before his arms and the acclamat ons which accompanied his tri umph declared him worthy of the purple His artful patroness had chosen the month of the vintage while the emperor in a rural sol tude was perm tted to enjoy the pleasures of a sub ject On the first intelligence of her des gns he returned to Constant nople and the consp racy was suppressed by his presence and firmness. From the pomp and honours wh ch she had abused Sophia was reduced to a modest allow ance T berius dismissed her tra n intercepted her correspondence and comm tted to a faith ful guard the custody of her person. But the services of Justinian were not cons dered by that excellent prince as an aggravat on of his of fences af er a mild reproof his treason and in-gratitude were forgiven, and it was commonly bel eved that the emperor entertained some thoughts of contracting a double all ance with the rival of his throne The vo ce of an angel (such a fable was propagated) might reveal to the emperor that he should always triumph over his domestic foes but Tiber us derived a firmer assurance from the innocence and gener os ty of his own mind

it or misfortunes of his own subjects had a dearer claim to his beneficence, and he measured his bounty not so much by their expectations as by his own dignity This maxim, however dangerous in a trustee of the public wealth, was balanced by a principle of humanity and justice, which taught him to abhor as of the basest alloy, the gold that was extracted from the tears of the people For their relief as often as they had suffered by natural or hostile calamities, he was impatient to remit the arrears of the past or the demands of future taxes he sternly rejected the servile offerings of his ministers which were compensated by tenfold oppression and the wise and equitable laws of Tiberius excited the praise and regret of succeeding times Constantinople believed that the emperor had discovered a treasure but his genuine treasure consisted in the practice of liberal economy and the contempt of all vain and superfluous expense The Romans of the East would have been happy if the best gift of heaven a patriot king, had been confirmed as a proper and permanent blessing But in less than four years after the death of Justin, his worthy successor sunk into a mortal disease, which left him only sufficient time to restore the diadem, according to the tenure by which he held it to the most deserving of his fellow-citizens He selected Maurice from the crowd—a judgment more precious than the purple itself the patriarch and senate were summoned to the bed of the dying prince, he bestowed his daughter and the empire and his last advice was solemnly delivered by the voice of the quæstor Tiberius expressed his hope that the virtues of his son and successor would erect the noblest mausoleum to his memory His memory was embalmed by the public affliction but the most sincere grief evaporates in the tumult of a new reign and the eyes and acclamations of mankind were speedily directed to the rising sun

The emperor Maurice derived his origin from ancient Rome [28] but his immediate parents were settled at Arabissus in Cappadocia and their singular felicity preserved them alive to behold and partake the fortune of their august son The youth of Maurice was spent in the profession of arms Tiberius promoted him to the command of a new and favourite legion of twelve thousand confederates his valour and conduct were signalised in the Persian war and he returned to Constantinople to accept as his just reward the inheritance of the empire Maurice ascended the throne at the mature age of forty three years and he reigned above twenty years over the East and over himself[29] expelling from his mind the wild democracy of passions and establishing (according to the quaint expression of Evagrius) a perfect aristocracy of reason and virtue Some suspicion will degrade the testimony of a subject though he protests that his secret praise should never reach the ear of his sovereign [30] and some failings seem to place the character of Maurice below the purer merit of his predecessor His cold and reserved demeanour might be imputed to arrogance his justice was not always exempt from cruelty nor his clemency from weakness and his rigid economy too often exposed him to the reproach of avarice But the rational wishes of an absolute monarch must tend to the happiness of his people Maurice was endowed with sense and courage to promote that happiness and his administration was directed by the principles and example of Tiberius. The pusillanimity of the Greeks had introduced so complete a separation between the offices of king and of general, that a private soldier, who had deserved and obtained the purple seldom or never appeared at the head of his armies Yet the emperor Maurice enjoyed the glory of restoring the Persian monarch to his throne his lieutenants waged a doubtful war against the Avars of the Danube and he cast an eye of pity of ineffectual pity, on the abject and distressful state of his Italian provinces

From Italy the emperors were incessantly tormented by tales of misery and demands of succour which extorted the humiliating confession of their own weakness The expiring dignity of Rome was only marked by the freedom and energy of her complaints If you are incapable she said of delivering us from the sword of the Lombards save us at least from the calamity of famine Tiberius forgave the reproach and relieved the distress a supply of corn was transported from Egypt to the Tiber, and the Roman people invoking the name not of Camillus but of St Peter, repulsed the barbarians from their walls But the relief was accidental the danger was perpetual and pressing and the clergy and senate collecting the remains of their ancient opulence a sum of three thousand pounds of gold despatched the patrician Pamphronius to lay their gifts and their complaints at the foot of the Byzantine throne The attention of the court, and the forces of the East were diverted by the Persian war but the justice of Tiberius applied the subsidy to the defence of the city and he dismissed the patrician with his best advice either to bribe the Lombard chiefs or to purchase the aid of the kings of France Notwithstanding this weak invention, Italy was still afflicted Rome was again besieged and the suburb of Classe only three miles from Ravenna was pillaged and occupied by the troops of a simple duke of Spoleto Maurice gave audience to a second deputation of priests and senators the duties and the menaces of religion were forcibly urged in the letters of the Roman pontiff and his nuncio the deacon Gregory, was alike qualified to solicit the powers either of heaven or of the earth. The emperor adopted with stronger effect the measures of his predecessor some formidable chiefs were persuaded to embrace the friendship of the Romans and one of them, a mild and faithful barbarian lived and died in the service of the exarch the passes of the Alps were delivered to the Franks and the pope encouraged them to violate without scruple their oaths and engagements to the misbelievers. Childebert the great grandson of Clovis was persuaded to invade Italy by the payment of fifty thousand pieces but as he had viewed with delight some Byzantine coin of the weight of one pound of gold the king of Austrasia might stipulate that the gift should be rendered more worthy of his acceptance by a proper mixture of these respectable medals The dukes of the Lombards had provoked by frequent inroads their powerful neighbours of Gaul As soon as they were apprehensive of a just retaliation they renounced their feeble and disorderly independence the advantages of regal government, union secrecy and vigour were unanimously confessed and Autharis the son of Clepho had already attained the strength and reputation of a warrior Under the standard of their new king the conquerors of Italy withstood three successive invasions, one of which was led by Childebert himself the last of the Merovingian race who descended from the Alps. The first expedition was defeated by the jealous animosity of the Franks and Alemanni. In the second they were vanquished in a bloody battle, with more loss and dishonour than they had sustained since the foundation of their monarchy Impatient for revenge, they returned a third time with accumulated force and Autharis yielded to the fury of the torrent. The troops and treasures of the Lombards were distributed in the walled towns between the Alps and the Apennine A nation less sensible of danger than of fatigue and delay soon murmured against the folly of their twenty commanders and the hot vapours of an Italian sun infected with disease those tramontane bodies which had already suffered the vicissitudes of intemperance and famine. The powers that were inadequate to the conquest were more than sufficient for the desolation of the country nor could the trembling natives distinguish between their enemies and their deliverers. If the junction of the Merovingian and Imperial forces had been effected in the neighbourhood of Milan, perhaps they might have subverted the throne of the Lombards but the Franks expected six days the signal of a flaming village and the arms of the Greeks were idly employed in the reduction of Modena and Parma, which were torn from them after the retreat of their transalpine allies The victorious Autharis asserted his claim to the dominion of Italy At the foot of the Rhætian Alps he subdued the resistance and rifled the hidden treasures of a sequestered island in the lake of Comum. At the extreme point of Calabria, he touched with his spear a column on the sea-shore of Rhegium,[31] proclaiming that ancient landmark to stand the immovable boundary of his kingdom [32]

During a period of two hundred years Italy was unequally divided between the kingdom of the Lombards and the exarchate of Ravenna. The offices and professions which the jealousy of Constantine had separated were united by the indulgence of Justinian and eighteen successive exarchs were invested in the decline of the empire with the full remains of civil of military and even of ecclesiastical power Their immediate jurisdiction which was afterwards consecrated as the patrimony of St. Peter extended over the modern Romagna, the marshes or valleys of Ferrara and Commachio,[33] five maritime cities from Rimini to Ancona and a second inland Pentapolis, between the Hadriatic coast and the hills of the Apennine. Three subordinate provinces of Rome of Venice and of Naples, which were divided by hostile lands from the palace of Ravenna, acknowledged both in peace and war the supremacy of the exarch. The duchy of Rome appears to have included the Tuscan Sabine and Latin conquests of the first four hundred years of the city and the limits may be distinctly traced along the coast from Civita Vecchia to Terracina and with the course of the Tiber from Ameria and Narni to the port of Ostia. The numerous islands from Grado to Chiozza composed the infant dominion of Venice but the more accessible towns on the continent were overthrown by the Lombards who beheld with impotent fury a new capital rising from the waves The power of the dukes of Naples was circumscribed by the bay and the adjacent isles by the hostile territory of Capua, and by the Roman colony of Amalphi,[34] whose industrious citizens by the invention of the mariner s compass, have un veiled the face of the globe The three islands of Sardinia Corsica and Sicily still adhered to the empire and the acquisition of the farther Cala bria removed the landmark of Autharis from the shore of Rhegium to the isthmus of Con sentia In Sardinia the savage mountaineers preserved the liberty and religion of their an cestors but the husbandmen of Sicily were chained to their rich and cultivated soil Rome was oppressed by the iron sceptre of the ex archs and a Greek perhaps a eunuch insulted with impunity the ruins of the Capitol But Naples soon acquired the privilege of electing her own dukes [35] the independence of Amalphi was the fruit of commerce and the voluntary attachment of Venice was finally ennobled by an equal alliance with the Eastern empire On the map of Italy the measure of the exarchate occupies a very inadequate space but it in cluded an ample proportion of wealth indus try and population The most faithful and valu able subjects escaped from the barbarian yoke and the banners of Pavia and Verona of Milan and Padua were displayed in their respective quarters by the new inhabitants of Ravenna The remainder of Italy was possessed by the Lombards and from Pavia the royal seat their kingdom was extended to the east the north and the west as far as the confines of the Avars the Bavarians, and the Franks of Austrasia and Burgundy In the language of modern geogra phy it is now represented by the Terra Firma of the Venetian republic Tyrol the Milanese Piedmont the coast of Genoa Mantua Parma and Modena the grand duchy of Tuscany and a large portion of the ecclesiastical state from Perugia to the Hadriatic The dukes and at length the princes of Beneventum survived the monarchy and propagated the name of the Lombards From Capua to Tarentum they reigned near five hundred years over the great est part of the present kingdom of Naples [36]

In comparing the proportion of the victorious and the vanquished people the change of lan guage will afford the most probable inference According to this standard it will appear that the Lombards of Italy and the Visigoths of Spain were less numerous than the Franks or Burgundians and the conquerors of Gaul must yield in their turn to the multitude of Saxons and Angles who almost eradicated the idioms of Britain The modern Italian has been insensibly formed by the mixture of nations the awkward ness of the barbarians in the nice management of declensions and conjugations reduced them to the use of articles and auxiliary verbs and many new ideas have been expressed by Teu tonic appellations Yet the principal stock of technical and familiar words is found to be of Latin derivation [37] and if we were sufficiently conversant with the obsolete the rustic, and the municipal dialects of ancient Italy we should trace the origin of many terms which might, perhaps be rejected by the classic purity of Rome A numerous army constitutes but a small nation and the powers of the Lombards were soon diminished by the retreat of twenty thousand Saxons who scorned a dependent sit uation and returned after many bold and per ilous adventures to their native country [38] The camp of Alboin was of formidable extent but the extent of a camp would be easily circum scribed within the limits of a city and its mar tial inhabitants must be thinly scattered over the face of a large country When Alboin de scended from the Alps he invested his nephew, the first duke of Friuli with the command of the province and the people but the prudent Gisulf would have declined the dangerous office un less he had been permitted to choose, among the nobles of the Lombards, a sufficient number of families[39] to form a perpetual colony of soldiers and subjects In the progress of conquest, the same option could not be granted to the dukes of Brescia or Bergamo of Pavia or Turin of Spoleto or Beneventum but each of these and each of their colleagues settled in his appointed district with a band of followers who resorted to his standard in war and his tribunal in peace Their attachment was free and honourable re signing the gifts and benefits which they had accepted they might emigrate with their fam ilies into the jurisdiction of another duke but their absence from the kingdom was punished with death as a crime of military desertion [40] The posterity of the first conquerors struck a deeper root into the soil which by every motive of interest and honour they were bound to de fend A Lombard was born the soldier of his king and his duke and the civil assemblies of the nation displayed the banners and assumed the appellation of a regular army Of this army the pay and the rewards were drawn from the conquered provinces and the distribution which was not effected till after the death of Alboin is disgraced by the foul marks of injus tice and rapine Many of the most wealthy Ital-tans were slain or banished the remainder were divided among the strangers, and a tributary obligation was imposed (under the name of hospitality) of paying to the Lombards a third part of the fruits of the earth Within less than seventy years this artificial system was abolished by a more simple and solid tenure.[45] Either the Roman landlord was expelled by his strong and insolent guest or the annual payment a third of the produce was exchanged by a more equitable transaction for an adequate proportion of landed property Under these foreign masters the business of agriculture in the cultivation of corn, vines and olives was exercised with degenerate skill and industry by the labour of the slaves and natives. But the occupations of a pastoral life were more pleasing to the idleness of the barbarians. In the rich meadows of Venetia they restored and improved the breed of horses for which that province had once been illustrious [46] and the Italians beheld with astonishment a foreign race of oxen or buffaloes [47] The depopulation of Lombardy and the increase of forests afforded an ample range for the pleasures of the chase.[48] That marvellous art which teaches the birds of the air to acknowledge the voice and execute the commands, of their master had been unknown to the ingenuity of the Greeks and Romans.[49] Scandinavia and Scythia produce the boldest and most tractable falcons [50] they were tamed and educated by the roving inhabitants, always on horseback and in the field This favourite amusement of our ancestors was introduced by the barbarians into the Roman provinces and the laws of Italy esteem the sword and the hawk as of equal dignity and importance in the hands of a noble Lombard [51]

So rapid was the influence of climate and example that the Lombards of the fourth generation surveyed with curiosity and affright the portraits of their savage forefathers [52] Their heads were shaven behind but the shaggy locks hung over their eyes and mouth and a long beard represented the name and character of the nation Their dress consisted of loose linen garments after the fashion of the Anglo-Saxons which were decorated in their opinion with broad stripes of variegated colours The legs and feet were clothed in long hose and open sandals and even in the security of peace a trusty sword was constantly girt to their side Yet this strange apparel and horrid aspect often concealed a gentle and generous disposition and as soon as the rage of battle had subsided the captives and subjects were *sometimes sur*prised by the humanity of the victor The vices of the Lombards were the effect of passion of ignorance of intoxication their virtues are the more laudable as they were not affected by the hypocrisy of social manners nor imposed by the rigid constraint of laws and education I should not be apprehensive of deviating from my subject, if it were in my power to delineate the private life of the conquerors of Italy, and I shall relate with pleasure the adventurous gallantry of Autharis which breathes the true spirit of chivalry and romance [53] After the loss of his promised bride a Merovingian princess he sought in marriage the daughter of the king of Bavaria and Garibald accepted the alliance of the Italian monarch *Impatient of the slow prog*ress of negotiation, the ardent lover escaped from his palace and visited the court of Bavaria in the train of his own embassy At the public audience the unknown stranger advanced to the throne and informed Garibald that the ambassador was indeed the minister of state but that he alone was the friend of Autharis who had trusted him with the delicate commission of making a faithful report of the charms of his spouse. Theudelinda was summoned to undergo this important examination and after a pause of silent rapture he hailed her as the queen of Italy and humbly requested that, according to the custom of the nation she would present a cup of wine to the first of her new subjects By the command of her father she obeyed Autharis received the cup in his turn and in restoring it to the princess he secretly touched her hand, and drew his own finger over his face and lips In the evening Theudelinda imparted to her nurse the indiscreet familiarity of the stranger and was comforted by the assurance that such boldness could proceed only from the king her husband who by his beauty and courage appeared worthy of her love The ambassadors were dismissed no sooner did they reach the confines of Italy than Autharis raising himself on his horse, darted his battle axe against a tree with incomparable strength and dexterity Such, said he to the astonished Bavarians such are the strokes of the king of the Lombards On the approach of a French army Garibald and his daughter took refuge in the dominions of their ally and the marriage was consummated in the palace of Verona At the end of one year it was dissolved by the death of Autharis but the virtues of Theudelinda[54] had endeared her to the nation and she was permitted to bestow with her hand, the sceptre of the Italian kingdom.

From this fact, as well as from similar events,[61] it is certain that the Lombards possessed freedom to elect their sovereign and sense to decline the frequent use of that dangerous privilege The public revenue arose from the produce of land and the profits of justice When the independent dukes agreed that Autharis should ascend the throne of his father, they endowed the regal office with a fair moiety of their respective domains The proudest nobles aspired to the honours of servitude near the person of their prince, he rewarded the fidelity of his vassals by the precarious gift of pensions and benefices and atoned for the injuries of war by the rich foundation of monasteries and churches In peace a judge a leader in war, he never usurped the powers of a sole and absolute legislator The king of Italy convened the national assemblies in the palace or more probably in the fields of Pavia his great council was composed of the persons most eminent by their birth and dignities but the validity, as well as the execution of their decrees depended on the approbation of the faithful people the fortunate army of the Lombards About fourscore years after the conquest of Italy their traditional customs were transcribed in Teutonic Latin[62] and ratified by the consent of the prince and people some new regulations were introduced more suitable to their present condition, the example of Rotharis was imitated by the wisest of his successors and the laws of the Lombards have been esteemed the least imperfect of the barbaric codes[63] Secure by their courage in the possession of liberty these rude and hasty legislators were incapable of balancing the powers of the constitution, or of discussing the nice theory of political government Such crimes as threatened the life of the sovereign or the safety of the state were adjudged worthy of death but their attention was principally confined to the defence of the person and property of the subject According to the strange jurisprudence of the times the guilt of blood might be redeemed by a fine yet the high price of nine hundred pieces of gold declares a just sense of the value of a simple citizen Less atrocious injuries a wound a fracture, a blow an opprobrious word were measured with scrupulous and almost ridiculous diligence and the prudence of the legislator encouraged the ignoble practice of bartering honour and revenge for a pecuniary compensation The ignorance of the Lombards in the state of Paganism or Christianity gave implicit credit to the malice and mischief of witchcraft but the judges of the seventeenth century might have been instructed and confounded by the wisdom of Rotharis who derides the absurd superstition, and protects the wretched victims of popular or judicial cruelty[64] The same spirit of a legislator superior to his age and country may be ascribed to Liutprand, who condemns while he tolerates the impious and inveterate abuse of duels[65] observing, from his own experience, that the juster cause had often been oppressed by successful violence Whatever merit may be discovered in the laws of the Lombards they are the genuine fruit of the reason of the barbarians, who never admitted the bishops of Italy to a seat in their legislative councils But the succession of their kings is marked with virtue and ability the troubled series of their annals is adorned with fair intervals of peace order, and domestic happiness and the Italians enjoyed a milder and more equitable government than any of the other kingdoms which had been founded on the ruins of the Western empire[66]

Amidst the arms of the Lombards and under the despotism of the Greeks we again inquire into the fate of Rome[67] which had reached about the close of the sixth century, the lowest period of her depression By the removal of the seat of empire and the successive loss of the provinces, the sources of public and private opulence were exhausted the lofty tree under whose shade the nations of the earth had reposed was deprived of its leaves and branches and the sapless trunk was left to wither on the ground The ministers of command and the messengers of victory no longer met on the Appian or Flaminian way and the hostile approach of the Lombards was often felt and continually feared The inhabitants of a potent and peaceful capital, who visit without an anxious thought the garden of the adjacent country will faintly picture in their fancy the distress of the Romans they shut or opened their gates with a trembling hand beheld from the walls the flames of their houses and heard the lamentations of their brethren who were coupled together like dogs, and dragged away into distant slavery beyond the sea and the mountains Such incessant alarms must annihilate the pleasures and interrupt the labours of a rural life and the Campagna of Rome was speedily reduced to the state of a dreary wilderness in which the land is barren the waters are impure and the air is infectious Curiosity and ambition no longer attracted the nations to the capital of the world but if chance or necessity directed the steps of a wandering stranger, he contemplated with horror the vacancy and solitude of the city and might be tempted to ask, where is the senate and where are the people? In a season of excessive rains the Tiber swelled above its banks and rushed with irresistible violence into the valleys of the seven hills A pestilential disease arose from the stagnation of the deluge and so rapid was the contagion that fourscore persons expired in an hour in the midst of a solemn procession which implored the mercy of Heaven [61] A society in which marriage is encouraged and industry prevails soon repairs the accidental losses of pestilence and war, but as the far greater part of the Romans was condemned to hopeless indigence and celibacy the depopulation was constant and visible and the gloomy enthusiasts might expect the approaching failure of the human race [62] Yet the number of citizens still exceeded the measure of subsistence their precarious food was supplied from the harvests of Sicily or Egypt and the frequent repetition of famine betrays the inattention of the emperor to a distant province The edifices of Rome were exposed to the same ruin and decay the mouldering fabrics were easily overthrown by inundations tempests and earthquakes and the monks who had occupied the most advantageous stations, exulted in their base triumph over the ruins of antiquity [63] It is commonly believed that pope Gregory the First attacked the temples and mutilated the statues of the city that by the command of the barbarian the Palatine library was reduced to ashes and that the history of Livy was the peculiar mark of his absurd and mischievous fanaticism. The writings of Gregory himself reveal his implacable aversion to the monuments of classic genius and he points his severest censure against the profane learning of a bishop who taught the art of grammar studied the Latin poets, and pronounced with the same voice the praises of Jupiter and those of Christ But the evidence of his destructive rage is doubtful and recent the Temple of Peace or the Theatre of Marcellus have been demolished by the slow operation of ages and a formal proscription would have multiplied the copies of Virgil and Livy in the countries which were not subject to the ecclesiastical dictator [64]

Like Thebes, or Babylon or Carthage the name of Rome might have been erased from the earth if the city had not been animated by a vital principle which again restored her to honour and dominion A vague tradition was embraced that two Jewish teachers a tent maker and a fisherman, had formerly been executed in the circus of Nero and at the end of five hundred years their genuine or fictitious relics were adored as the Palladium of Christian Rome The pilgrims of the East and West resorted to the holy threshold but the shrines of the apostles were guarded by miracles and invisible terrors, and it was not without fear that the pious catholic approached the object of his worship It was fatal to touch it was dangerous to behold the bodies of the saints and those who from the purest motives presumed to disturb the repose of the sanctuary were affrighted by visions or punished with sudden death. The unreasonable request of an empress who wished to deprive the Romans of their sacred treasure the head of St Paul was rejected with the deepest abhorrence and the pope asserted most probably with truth that a linen which had been sanctified in the neighbourhood of his body or the filings of his chain which it was sometimes easy and sometimes impossible to obtain, possessed an equal degree of miraculous virtue [65] But the power as well as virtue of the apostles resided with living energy in the breast of their successors and the chair of St Peter was filled under the reign of Maurice by the first and greatest of the name of Gregory [66] His grandfather Felix had himself been pope and, as the bishops were already bound by the law of celibacy his consecration must have been preceded by the death of his wife The parents of Gregory Sylvia and Gordian were the noblest of the senate and the most pious of the church of Rome his female relations were numbered among the saints and virgins and his own figure with those of his father and mother were represented near three hundred years in a family portrait[67] which he offered to the monastery of St Andrew The design and colouring of this picture afford an honourable testimony that the art of painting was cultivated by the Italians of the sixth century but the most abject ideas must be entertained of their taste and learning since the epistles of Gregory his sermons and his dialogues are the work of a man who was second in erudition to none of his contemporaries [68] his birth and abilities had raised him to the office of præfect of the city and he enjoyed the merit of renouncing the pomp and vanities of this world His ample patrimony was dedicated to the foundation of seven monasteries [69] one in Rome[70] and six in Sicily and it was the wish of Gregory that he might be unknown in this life and glorious only in the next. Yet his devotion and it might be sincere pursued the path which would have been chosen by a crafty and ambitious statesman The tal ents of Gregory, and the splendour which ac companied his retreat rendered him dear and useful to the church and implicit obedience has been always inculcated as the first duty of a monk As soon as he had received the character of deacon, Gregory was sent to reside at the Byzantine court the nuncio or minister of the apostolic see and he boldly assumed, in the name of St Peter, a tone of independent dig nity which would have been criminal and dan gerous in the most illustrious layman of the em pire He returned to Rome with a just increase of reputation, and, after a short exercise of the monastic virtues he was dragged from the cloister to the papal throne by the unanimous voice of the clergy the senate, and the people He alone resisted or seemed to resist, his own elevation and his humble petition that Mau rice would be pleased to reject the choice of the Romans could only serve to exalt his character in the eyes of the emperor and the public When the fatal mandate was proclaimed Gregory so licited the aid of some friendly merchants to convey him in a basket beyond the gates of Rome and modestly concealed himself some days among the woods and mountains till his retreat was discovered, as it is said by a celestial light

The pontificate of Gregory the Great which lasted thirteen years six months and ten days is one of the most edifying periods of the history of the church. His virtues and even his faults a singular mixture of simplicity and cunning of pride and humility of sense and superstition were happily suited to his station and to the temper of the times In his rival the patriarch of Constantinople, he condemned the anti christian title of universal bishop which the successor of St Peter was too haughty to con cede and too feeble to assume and the ecclesi astical jurisdiction of Gregory was confined to the triple character of Bishop of Rome, Primate of Italy, and Apostle of the West He frequently ascended the pulpit, and kindled by his rude though pathetic eloquence the congenial pas sions of his audience the language of the Jewish prophets were interpreted and applied and the minds of a people depressed by their present calamities were directed to the hopes and fears of the invisible world His precepts and example defined the model of the Roman liturgy [68] the distribution of the parishes the calendar of fes tivals the order of processions the service of the priests and deacons the variety and change of sacerdotal garments. Till the last days of his life he officiated in the canon of the mass which continued above three hours the Gregoria chant[69] has preserved the vocal and instrumen tal music of the theatre and the rough voices of the barbarians attempted to imitate the melody of the Roman school [70] Experience had shown him the efficacy of these solemn and pompous rites to soothe the distress, to confirm the faith to mitigate the fierceness and to dispel the da enthusiasm of the vulgar, and he readily for gave their tendency to promote the reign o priesthood and superstition The bishops o Italy and the adjacent islands acknowledge the Roman pontiff as their special metropoli tan Even the existence the union or the tran lation of episcopal seats was decided by h absolute discretion and his successful inroad into the provinces of Greece of Spain and t Gaul, might countenance the more lofty pr tensions of succeeding popes He interposed t prevent the abuses of popular elections h jealous care maintained the purity of faith an discipline and the apostolic shepherd assidu ously watched over the faith and discipline o the subordinate pastors Under his reign th Arians of Italy and Spain were reconciled to th catholic church and the conquest of Britain r flects less glory on the name of Cæsar than o that of Gregory the First Instead of six legion forty monks were embarked for that distant i land and the pontiff lamented the austere d ties which forbade him to partake the perils their spiritual warfare In less than two yea he could announce to the archbishop of Ale andria that they had baptised the king of Ke with ten thousand of his Anglo-Saxons a that the Roman missionaries like those of th primitive church were armed only with spi tual and supernatural powers The credulity the prudence of Gregory was always dispos to confirm the truths of religion by the eviden of ghosts, miracles and resurrections [71] and po terity has paid to his memory the same tribu which he freely granted to the virtue of his ow or the preceding generation The celestial ho ours have been liberally bestowed by the a thority of the popes but Gregory is the last their own order whom they have presumed inscribe in the calendar of saints

Gregory might justly be styled the Father of his country and such was the extre e sen s b l ty of h s consc ence that for the death of a beggar who had perished in the streets he interd cted himself during several days from the exercise of sacerdotal funct ons [73] The misfor tunes of Rome involved the apostol cal pastor in the bus ness of peace and war and it m ght be doubtful to h mself whether piety or ambi tion prompted him to supply the place of his absent sovereign. Gregory awakened the em peror from a long slumber exposed the gu lt or incapacity of the exarch and his inferior m nis ters complained that the veterans were with dra n from Rome for the defence of Spoleto encouraged the Ital ans to guard the r cities and altars and condescended in the crisis of danger to name the tribunes and to direct the operations of the provincial troops But the martial sp rit of the pope was checked by the scruples of humanity and rel gion the imposi t on of tribute though it was employed in the Italian war he freely condemned as od ous and oppress e whilst he protected against the Im perial ed cts, the pious coward ce of the sold ers who deserted a m l tary for a monast c l fe If we may cred t his own declarations, it would have been easy for Gregory to exterm nate the Lombards by the r domestic factions without leaving a k ng a duke or a count to save that unfortunate nat on from the vengeance of the r foes As a Christian bishop he preferred the sa utary offices of peace his mediation appeased the tumult of arms but he was too consc ous of the arts of the Greeks and the pass ons of the Lombards to engage his sacred promise for the observance of the truce Disappo nted in the hope of a general and last ng treaty he pre sumed to save his country without the consent of the emperor or the exarch. The merits of Gregory were treated by the Byzant ne court with reproach and insult but in the attachment of a grateful people he found the purest re ard of a citizen and the best right of a sovere gn [74]

CHAPTER XLVI

Revolutions of Persia after the Death of the Chosroes or Nushirvan His Son Hormouz, a Tyrant, is deposed Usurpation of Bahram Flight and Restoration of Chosroes II His Gratitude to the Romans The Chagan of the Avars Revolt of the Army against Maurice His Death Tyranny of Phocas Elevation of Heraclius The Persian War Chosroes subdues Syria, Egypt, and Asia Minor Siege of Constantinople by the Persians and Avars Persian Expeditions Victories and Triumphs of Heraclius

THE conflict of Rome and Persia was prolonged from the death of Crassus to the reign of Heraclius An experience of seven hundred years might convince the rival nations of the impossibility of maintaining their conquests beyond the fatal limits of the Tigris and Euphrates Yet the emulation of Trajan and Julian was awakened by the trophies of Alexander and the sovereigns of Persia indulged the ambitious hope of restoring the empire of Cyrus [1] Such extraordinary efforts of power and courage will always command the attention of posterity but the events by which the fate of nations is not materially changed leave a faint impression on the page of history, and the patience of the reader would be exhausted by the repetition of the same hostilities, undertaken without cause prosecuted without glory, and terminated without effect The arts of negotiation unknown to the simple greatness of the senate and the Cæsars were assiduously cultivated by the Byzantine princes and the memorials of their perpetual embassies repeat, with the same uniform prolixity the language of falsehood and declamation the insolence of the barbarians and the servile temper of the tributary Greeks Lamenting the barren superfluity of materials I have studied to compress the narrative of these uninteresting transactions but the just Nushirvan is still applauded as the model of Oriental kings and the ambition of his grandson Chosroes prepared the revolution of the East which was speedily accomplished by the arms and the religion of the successors of Mohammed

In the useless altercations that precede and justify the quarrels of princes the Greeks and the barbarians accused each other of violating the peace which had been concluded between the two empires about four years before the death of Justinian The sovereign of Persia and India aspired to reduce under his obedience the province of Yemen or Arabia [2] Felix the distant land of myrrh and frankincense, which had escaped rather than opposed the conquerors of the East. After the defeat of Abrahah under the walls of Mecca, the discord of his sons and brothers gave an easy entrance to the Persians they chased the strangers of Abyssinia beyond the Red Sea and a native prince of the ancient Homerites was restored to the throne as the vassal or viceroy of the great Nushirvan [3] But the nephew of Justinian declared his resolution to avenge the injuries of his Christian ally the prince of Abyssinia as they suggested a decent pretence to discontinue the annual tribute which was poorly disguised by the name of pension The churches of Persarmenia were oppressed by the intolerant spirit of the Magi they secretly invoked the protector of the Christians and after the pious murder of their satraps the rebels were avowed and supported as the brethren and subjects of the Roman emperor The complaints of Nushirvan were disregarded by the Byzantine court Justin yielded to the importunities of the Turks who offered an alliance against the common enemy and the Persian monarchy was threatened at the same instant by the united forces of Europe of Æthiopia and of Scythia At the age of fourscore the sovereign of the East would perhaps have chosen the peaceful enjoyment of his glory and greatness but as soon as war became inevitable he took the field with the alacrity of youth whilst the aggressor trembled in the palace of Constantinople Nushirvan or Chosroes conducted in person the siege of Dara and although that important fortress had been left destitute of troops and magazines the valour of the inhabitants resisted above five months the archers the elephants and the military engines of the Great King In the meanwhile his general Adarman advanced from Babylon traversed the desert, passed the Euphrates insulted the suburbs of

Antioch, reduced to ashes the city of Apamea, and laid the spoils of Syria at the feet of his master whose perseverance in the midst of winter at length subverted the bulwark of the East. But these losses, which astonished the provinces and the court produced a salutary effect in the repentance and abdication of the emperor Justin a new spirit arose in the Byzantine councils and a truce of three years was obtained by the prudence of Tiberius. That seasonable interval was employed in the preparations of war and the voice of rumour proclaimed to the world that from the distant countries of the Alps and the Rhine from Scythia Mæsia Pannonia Illyricum, and Isauria the strength of the Imperial cavalry was reinforced with one hundred and fifty thousand soldiers Yet the king of Persia without fear or without faith resolved to prevent the attack of the enemy again passed the Euphrates and dismissing the ambassadors of Tiberius, arrogantly commanded them to await his arrival at Cæsarea the metropolis of the Cappadocian provinces The two armies encountered each other in the battle of Melitene the barbarians who darkened the air with a cloud of arrows, prolonged their line and extended their wings across the plain while the Romans in deep and solid bodies expected to prevail in closer action by the weight of their swords and lances A Scythian chief who commanded their right wing suddenly turned the flank of the enemy attacked their rear guard in the presence of Chosroes penetrated to the midst of the camp pillaged the royal tent profaned the eternal fire loaded a train of camels with the spoils of Asia, cut his way through the Persian host, and returned with songs of victory to his friends who had consumed the day in single combats or ineffectual skirmishes. The darkness of the night and the separation of the Romans afforded the Persian monarch an opportunity of revenge and one of their camps was swept away by a rapid and impetuous assault But the review of his loss and the consciousness of his danger determined Chosroes to a speedy retreat he burnt in his passage the vacant town of Melitene and without consulting the safety of his troops boldly swam the Euphrates on the back of an elephant. After this unsuccessful campaign, the want of magazines and perhaps some inroad of the Turks obliged him to disband or divide his forces the Romans were left masters of the field and their general Justinian, advancing to the relief of the Persarmenian rebels erected his standard on the banks of the Araxes The great Pompey had formerly halted within three days march of the Caspian [5] that inland sea was explored for the first time by a hostile fleet [6] and seventy thousand captives were transplanted from Hyrcania to the isle of Cyprus. On the return of spring Justinian descended into the fertile plains of Assyria the flames of war approached the residence of Nushirvan the indignant monarch sunk into the grave and his last edict restrained his successors from exposing their person in a battle against the Romans Yet the memory of this transient affront was lost in the glories of a long reign and his formidable enemies after indulging their dream of conquest again solicited a short respite from the calamities of war [7]

The throne of Chosroes Nushirvan was filled by Hormouz or Hormisdas the eldest or the most favoured of his sons With the kingdoms of Persia and India he inherited the reputation and example of his father the service, in every rank of his wise and valiant officers and a general system of administration harmonised by time and political wisdom to promote the happiness of the prince and people But the royal youth enjoyed a still more valuable blessing the friendship of a sage who had presided over his education and who always preferred the honour to the interest of his pupil, his interest to his inclination. In a dispute with the Greek and Indian philosophers Buzurg [8] had once maintained that the most grievous misfortune of life is old age without the remembrance of virtue and our candour will presume that the same principle compelled him during three years to direct the councils of the Persian empire. His zeal was rewarded by the gratitude and docility of Hormouz who acknowledged himself more indebted to his preceptor than to his parent but when age and labour had impaired the strength, and perhaps the faculties of this prudent counsellor he retired from court and abandoned the youthful monarch to his own passions and those of his favourites By the fatal vicissitude of human affairs the same scenes were renewed at Ctesiphon which had been exhibited in Rome after the death of Marcus Antoninus. The ministers of flattery and corruption who had been banished by the father were recalled and cherished by the son the disgrace and exile of the friends of Nushirvan established their tyranny and virtue was driven by degrees from the mind of Hormouz from his palace and from the government of the state. The faithful agents the eyes and ears of the king informed him of the progress of disorder that the provincial governors flew to their prey with the fierceness of lions and eagles, and that their rapine and injustice would teach the most loyal of his subjects to abhor the name and authority of their sovereign The sincerity of this advice was punished with death the murmurs of the cities were despised their tumults were quelled by military execution the intermediate powers between the throne and the people were abolished and the childish vanity of Hormouz, who affected the daily use of the tiara was fond of declaring that he alone would be the judge as well as the master of his kingdom In every word and in every action the son of Nushirvan degenerated from the virtues of his father His avarice defrauded the troops his jealous caprice degraded the satraps the palace the tribunals the waters of the Tigris were stained with the blood of the innocent and the tyrant exulted in the sufferings and execution of thirteen thousand victims As the excuse of his cruelty, he sometimes condescended to observe that the fears of the Persians would be productive of hatred and that their hatred must terminate in rebellion but he forgot that his own guilt and folly had inspired the sentiments which he deplored and prepared the event which he so justly apprehended Exasperated by long and hopeless oppression, the provinces of Babylon Susa and Carmania erected the standard of revolt and the princes of Arabia India and Scythia refused the customary tribute to the unworthy successor of Nushirvan The arms of the Romans in slow sieges and frequent inroads afflicted the frontiers of Mesopotamia and Assyria one of their generals professed himself the disciple of Scipio and the soldiers were animated by a miraculous image of Christ whose mild aspect should never have been displayed in the front of battle [9] At the same time the eastern provinces of Persia were invaded by the great khan who passed the Oxus at the head of three or four hundred thousand Turks The imprudent Hormouz accepted their perfidious and formidable aid the cities of Khorassan or Bactriana were commanded to open their gates the march of the barbarians towards the mountains of Hyrcania revealed the correspondence of the Turkish and Roman arms, and their union must have subverted the throne of the house of Sassan.

Persia had been lost by a king it was saved by a hero After his revolt Varanes or Bahram is stigmatised by the son of Hormouz as an ungrateful slave the proud and ambiguous reproach of despotism since he was truly descended from the ancient princes of Rei [10] one of the seven families whose splendid as well as substantial prerogatives exalted them above the heads of the Persian nobility [11] At the siege of Dara the valour of Bahram was signalised under the eyes of Nushirvan and both the father and son successively promoted him to the command of armies the government of Media, and the superintendence of the palace. The popular prediction which marked him as the deliverer of Persia might be inspired by his past victories and extraordinary figure the epithet Giab is expressive of the quality of dry wood he had the strength and stature of a giant and his savage countenance was fancifully compared to that of a wild cat While the nation trembled, while Hormouz disguised his terror by the name of suspicion and his servants concealed their disloyalty under the mask of fear, Bahram alone displayed his undaunted courage and apparent fidelity and as soon as he found that no more than twelve thousand soldiers would follow him against the enemy he prudently declared that to this fatal number Heaven had reserved the honours of the triumph The steep and narrow descent of the Pule Rudbar [12] or Hyrcanian rock, is the only pass through which an army can penetrate into the territory of Rei and the plains of Media From the commanding heights a band of resolute men might overwhelm with stones and darts the myriads of the Turkish host their emperor and his son were transpierced with arrows and the fugitives were left without counsel or provisions to the revenge of an injured people The patriotism of the Persian general was stimulated by his affection for the city of his forefathers in the hour of victory every peasant became a soldier and every soldier a hero and their ardour was kindled by the gorgeous spectacle of beds and thrones and tables of massy gold the spoils of Asia and the luxury of the hostile camp A prince of a less malignant temper could not easily have forgiven his benefactor and the secret hatred of Hormouz was envenomed by a malicious report that Bahram had privately retained the most precious fruits of his Turkish victory But the approach of a Roman army on the side of the Araxes compelled the implacable tyrant to smile and to applaud and the toils of Bahram were rewarded with the permission of encountering a new enemy by their skill and discipline more formidable than a Scythian multitude Elated by his recent success he despatched a herald with a bold defiance to the camp of the Romans, requesting them to fix a day of battle and to choose whether they would pass the river themselves or allow a free passage to the arms of the Great King The lieutenant of the emperor Maurice preferred the safer alternative and this local circumstance which would have enhanced the victory of the Persians rendered their defeat more bloody and their escape more difficult But the loss of his subjects and the danger of his kingdom were overbalanced in the mind of Hormouz by the disgrace of his personal enemy and no sooner had Bahram collected and reviewed his forces than he received from a royal messenger the insulting gift of a distaff a spinning wheel and a complete suit of female apparel Obedient to the will of his sovereign he showed himself to the soldiers in this unworthy disguise they resented his ignominy and their own a shout of rebellion ran through the ranks and the general accepted their oath of fidelity and vows of revenge A second messenger who had been commanded to bring the rebel in chains was trampled under the feet of an elephant, and manifestos were diligently circulated, exhorting the Persians to assert their freedom against an odious and contemptible tyrant The defection was rapid and universal his loyal slaves were sacrificed to the public fury the troops deserted to the standard of Bahram and the provinces again saluted the deliverer of his country

As the passes were faithfully guarded Hormouz could only compute the number of his enemies by the testimony of a guilty conscience and the daily defection of those who in the hour of his distress avenged their wrongs or forgot their obligations. He proudly displayed the ensigns of royalty but the city and palace of Modain had already escaped from the hand of the tyrant. Among the victims of his cruelty Bindoes a Sassanian prince had been cast into a dungeon his fetters were broken by the zeal and courage of a brother and he stood before the king at the head of those trusty guards who had been chosen as the ministers of his confinement, and perhaps of his death. Alarmed by the hasty intrusion and bold reproaches of the captive Hormouz looked round, but in vain, for advice or assistance discovered that his strength consisted in the obedience of others and patiently yielded to the single arm of Bindoes who dragged him from the throne to the same dungeon in which he himself had been so lately confined At the first tumult, Chosroes, the eldest of the sons of Hormouz escaped from the city he was persuaded to return by the pressing and friendly invitation of Bindoes, who promised to seat him on his father's throne and who expected to reign under the name of an inexperienced youth. In the just assurance that his accomplices could neither forgive nor hope to be forgiven and that every Persian might be trusted as the judge and enemy of the tyrant he instituted a public trial without a precedent and without a copy in the annals of the East The son of Nushirvan who had requested to plead in his own defence was introduced as a criminal into the full assembly of the nobles and satraps [11] He was heard with decent attention as long as he expatiated on the advantages of order and obedience the danger of innovation and the inevitable discord of those who had encouraged each other to trample on their lawful and hereditary sovereign By a pathetic appeal to their humanity he extorted that pity which is seldom refused to the fallen fortunes of a king and while they beheld the abject posture and squalid appearance of the prisoner his tears his chains and the marks of ignominious stripes, it was impossible to forget how recently they had adored the divine splendour of his diadem and purple But an angry murmur arose in the assembly as soon as he presumed to vindicate his conduct and to applaud the victories of his reign He defined the duties of a king and the Persian nobles listened with a smile of contempt they were fired with indignation when he dared to vilify the character of Chosroes and by the indiscreet offer of resigning the sceptre to the second of his sons he subscribed his own condemnation and sacrificed the life of his innocent favourite The mangled bodies of the boy and his mother were exposed to the people the eyes of Hormouz were pierced with a hot needle and the punishment of the father was succeeded by the coronation of his eldest son Chosroes had ascended the throne without guilt and his piety strove to alleviate the misery of the abdicated monarch from the dungeon he removed Hormouz to an apartment of the palace supplied with liberality the consolations of sensual enjoyment and patiently endured the furious sallies of his resentment and despair He might despise the resentment of a blind and unpopular tyrant but the tiara was trembling on his head till he could subvert the power or acquire the friendship of the great Bahram, who sternly denied the justice of a revolution in which himself and his soldiers the true representatives of Persia had never been consulted. The offer of a general amnesty and of the second rank in his kingdom, was answered by an epistle from Bahram, friend of the gods conqueror of men and enemy of tyrants the satrap of satraps general of the Persian armies, and a prince adorned with the title of eleven virtues [14] He commands Chosroes the son of Hormouz to shun the example and fate of his father to confine the traitors who had been released from their chains to deposit in some holy place the diadem which he had usurped and to accept from his gracious benefactor the pardon of his faults and the government of a province The rebel might not be proud and the king most assuredly was not humble but the one was conscious of his strength, the other was sensible of his weakness, and even the modest language of his reply still left room for treaty and reconciliation Chosroes led into the field the slaves of the palace and the populace of the capital they beheld with terror the banners of a veteran army they were encompassed and surprised by the evolutions of the general, and the satraps who had deposed Hormouz received the punishment of their revolt or expiated their first treason by a second and more criminal act of disloyalty The life and liberty of Chosroes were saved, but he was reduced to the necessity of imploring aid or refuge in some foreign land, and the implacable Bindoes anxious to secure an unquestionable title, hastily returned to the palace, and ended, with a bow string, the wretched existence of the son of Nushirvan [15]

While Chosroes despatched the preparations of his retreat he deliberated with his remaining friends[16] whether he should lurk in the valleys of Mount Caucasus or fly to the tents of the Turks or solicit the protection of the emperor The long emulation of the successors of Artaxerxes and Constantine increased his reluctance to appear as a suppliant in a rival court but he weighed the forces of the Romans and prudently considered that the neighbourhood of Syria would render his escape more easy and their succours more effectual Attended only by his concubines and a troop of thirty guards he secretly departed from the capital followed the banks of the Euphrates traversed the desert, and halted at the distance of ten miles from Circesium About the third watch of the night the Roman præfect was informed of his approach and he introduced the royal stranger to the fortress at the dawn of day From thence the king of Persia was conducted to the more honourable residence of Hierapolis and Maurice dissembled his pride and displayed his benevolence, at the reception of the letters and ambassadors of the grandson of Nushirvan They humbly represented the vicissitudes of fortune and the common interest of princes exaggerated the ingratitude of Bahram, the agent of the evil principle and urged, with specious ar gument, that it was for the advantage of th Romans themselves to support the two monar chies which balance the world the two grea luminaries by whose salutary influence it is viv fied and adorned The anxiety of Chosroes wa soon relieved by the assurance that the emper had espoused the cause of justice and royalty but Maurice prudently declined the expen and delay of his useless visit to Constantinopl In the name of his generous benefactor, a ne diadem was presented to the fugitive prince with an inestimable gift of jewels and gold powerful army was assembled on the frontie of Syria and Armenia, under the command c the valiant and faithful Narses [17] and this gen eral of his own nation, and his own choice wa directed to pass the Tigris and never to sheath his sword till he had restored Chosroes to th throne of his ancestors The enterprise, howeve splendid, was less arduous than it might appear Persia had already repented of her fatal rash ness which betrayed the heir of the house c Sassan to the ambition of a rebellious subject and the bold refusal of the Magi to consecrat his usurpation compelled Bahram to assume th sceptre, regardless of the laws and prejudices c the nation The palace was soon distracted wit conspiracy the city with tumult, the province with insurrection and the cruel execution o the guilty and the suspected served to irritat rather than subdue the public discontent N sooner did the grandson of Nushirvan displa his own and the Roman banners beyond th Tigris than he was joined each day, by *the in*creasing multitudes of the nobility and people and as he advanced he received from every sid the grateful offerings of the keys of his cities an the heads of his enemies As soon as Modai was freed from the presence of the usurper, the loyal inhabitants obeyed the first summons o Mebodes at the head of only two thousand horse and Chosroes accepted the sacred and precious ornaments of the palace as the pledge of their truth and a presage of his approaching success After the junction of the Imperial troops which Bahram vainly struggled to prevent the contest was decided by two battles on the banks of the Zab and the confines of Media. The Romans with the faithful subjects of Persia amounted to sixty thousand while the whole force of the usurper did not exceed forty thousand men the two generals signalised their valour and ability but the victory was finally determined by the prevalence of numbers and discipline With the remnant of a broken army,

Bahram fled towards the eastern provinces of the Oxus the enmity of Persia reconciled him to the Turks but his days were shortened by poison, perhaps the most incurable of poisons the stings of remorse and despair and the bitter remembrance of lost glory Yet the modern Persians still commemorate the exploits of Bahram and some excellent laws have prolonged the duration of his troubled and transitory reign

The restoration of Chosroes was celebrated with feasts and executions and the music of the royal banquet was often disturbed by the groan of dying or mutilated criminals A general pardon might have diffused comfort and tranquillity through a country which had been shaken by the late revolutions yet, before the sanguinary temper of Chosroes is blamed, we should learn whether the Persians had not been accustomed either to dread the rigour or to despise the weakness of their sovereign. The revolt of Bahram and the conspiracy of the satraps were impartially punished by the revenge or justice of the conqueror the merits of Bindoes himself could not purify his hand from the guilt of royal blood and the son of Hormouz was desirous to assert his own innocence and to vindicate the sanctity of kings During the vigour of the Roman power several princes were seated on the throne of Persia by the arms and the authority of the first Cæsars But their new subjects were soon disgusted with the vices or virtues which they had imbibed in a foreign land the instability of their dominion gave birth to a vulgar observation that the choice of Rome was solicited and rejected with equal ardour by the capricious levity of Oriental slaves [18] But the glory of Maurice was conspicuous in the long and fortunate reign of his son and his ally A band of a thousand Romans, who continued to guard the person of Chosroes proclaimed his confidence in the fidelity of the strangers his growing strength enabled him to dismiss this unpopular aid but he steadily professed the same gratitude and reverence to his adopted father and till the death of Maurice the peace and alliance of the two empires were faithfully maintained Yet the mercenary friendship of the Roman prince had been purchased with costly and important gifts the strong cities of Martyropolis and Dara were restored and the Persarmenians became the willing subjects of an empire whose eastern limit was extended beyond the example of former times, as far as the banks of the Araxes and the neighbourhood of the Caspian. A pious hope was indulged that the church as well as the state might triumph in this revolution but if Chosroes had sincerely listened to the Christian bishops the impression was erased by the zeal and eloquence of the Magi if he was armed with philosophic indifference he accommodated his belief or rather his professions, to the various circumstances of an exile and a sovereign The imaginary conversion of the king of Persia was reduced to a local and superstitious veneration for Sergius,[19] one of the saints of Antioch who heard his prayers and appeared to him in dreams he enriched the shrine with offerings of gold and silver and ascribed to this invisible patron the success of his arms and the pregnancy of Sira a devout Christian and the best beloved of his wives [20] The beauty of Sira or Schirin [21] her wit her musical talents are still famous in the history or rather in the romances of the East her own name is expressive in the Persian tongue of sweetness and grace and the epithet of Parvis alludes to the charms of her royal lover Yet Sira never shared the passion which she inspired and the bliss of Chosroes was tortured by a jealous doubt, that while he possessed her person she had bestowed her affections on a meaner favourite [22]

While the majesty of the Roman name was revived in the East the prospect of Europe is less pleasing and less glorious. By the departure of the Lombards and the ruin of the Gepidæ the balance of power was destroyed on the Danube and the Avars spread their permanent dominion from the foot of the Alps to the sea-coast of the Euxine The reign of Baian is the brightest era of their monarchy their chagan, who occupied the rustic palace of Attila, appears to have imitated his character and policy [23] but as the same scenes were repeated in a smaller circle a minute representation of the copy would be devoid of the greatness and novelty of the original. The pride of the second Justin of Tiberius, and Maurice was humbled by a proud barbarian, more prompt to inflict than exposed to suffer the injuries of war and as often as Asia was threatened by the Persian arms Europe was oppressed by the dangerous inroads or costly friendship of the Avars When the Roman envoys approached the presence of the chagan, they were commanded to wait at the door of his tent till at the end perhaps of ten or twelve days he condescended to admit them. If the substance or the style of their message was offensive to his ear he insulted with real or affected fury their own dignity and that of their prince their baggage was plundered and their lives were only saved by the promise of a richer present and a more respectful address But his as

title of eleven virtues [14] He commands Chosroes, the son of Hormouz, to shun the example and fate of his father to confine the traitors who had been released from their chains to deposit in some holy place the diadem which he had usurped, and to accept from his gracious benefactor the pardon of his faults and the govern ment of a province The rebel might not be proud, and the king most assuredly was not humble but the one was conscious of his strength the other was sensible of his weakness, and even the modest language of his reply still left room for treaty and reconciliation Chos roes led into the field the slaves of the palace and the populace of the capital they beheld with terror the banners of a veteran army they were encompassed and surprised by the evolu tions of the general and the satraps who had deposed Hormouz received the punishment of their revolt, or expiated their first treason by a second and more criminal act of disloyalty The life and liberty of Chosroes were saved but he was reduced to the necessity of imploring aid or refuge in some foreign land and the implacable Bindoes, anxious to secure an unquestionable title, hastily returned to the palace, and ended, with a bow string the wretched existence of the son of Nushirvan [15]

While Chosroes despatched the preparations of his retreat he deliberated with his remaining friends[16] whether he should lurk in the valleys of Mount Caucasus or fly to the tents of the Turks or solicit the protection of the emperor The long emulation of the successors of Artax erxes and Constantine increased his reluctance to appear as a suppliant in a rival court but he weighed the forces of the Romans and prudent ly considered that the neighbourhood of Syria would render his escape more easy and their succours more effectual Attended only by his concubines and a troop of thirty guards he secretly departed from the capital followed the banks of the Euphrates traversed the desert, and halted at the distance of ten miles from Circesium About the third watch of the night the Roman præfect was informed of his approach and he introduced the royal stranger to the fortress at the dawn of day From thence the king of Persia was conducted to the more honourable residence of Hierapolis and Mau rice dissembled his pride and displayed his benevolence at the reception of the letters and ambassadors of the grandson of Nushirvan They humbly represented the vicissitudes of for tune and the common interest of princes exag gerated the ingratitude of Bahram, the agent of the evil principle and urged, with specious argument, that it was for the advantage of the Romans themselves to support the two monarchies which balance the world the two great luminaries by whose salutary influence it is vivified and adorned The anxiety of Chosroes was soon relieved by the assurance that the emperor had espoused the cause of justice and royalty but Maurice prudently declined the expense and delay of his useless visit to Constantinople. In the name of his generous benefactor, a rich diadem was presented to the fugitive prince with an inestimable gift of jewels and gold a powerful army was assembled on the frontiers of Syria and Armenia, under the command of the valiant and faithful Narses,[17] and this general, of his own nation, and his own choice was directed to pass the Tigris and never to sheathe his sword till he had restored Chosroes to the throne of his ancestors The enterprise however splendid was less arduous than it might appear Persia had already repented of her fatal rash ness which betrayed the heir of the house of Sassan to the ambition of a rebellious subject and the bold refusal of the Magi to consecrate his usurpation compelled Bahram to assume the sceptre regardless of the laws and prejudices of the nation The palace was soon distracted with conspiracy, the city with tumult the provinces with insurrection and the cruel execution of the guilty and the suspected served to irritate rather than subdue the public discontent No sooner did the grandson of Nushirvan display his own and the Roman banners beyond the Tigris than he was joined each day, by the in creasing multitudes of the nobility and people, and as he advanced he received from every side the grateful offerings of the keys of his cities and the heads of his enemies As soon as Modain was freed from the presence of the usurper the loyal inhabitants obeyed the first summons of Mebodes at the head of only two thousand horse and Chosroes accepted the sacred and precious ornaments of the palace as the pledge of their truth and a presage of his approaching success After the junction of the Imperial troops which Bahram vainly struggled to prevent the contest was decided by two battles on the banks of the Zab and the confines of Media. The Romans with the faithful subjects of Per sia amounted to sixty thousand while the whole force of the usurper did not exceed forty thousand men the two generals signalised their valour and ability but the victory was finally determined by the prevalence of numbers and discipline With the remnant of a broken army, cred ambassadors enjoyed and abused an unbounded licence in the midst of Constantinople they urged, with importunate clamours the increase of tribute or the restitution of captives and deserters and the majesty of the empire was almost equally degraded by a base compliance or by the false and fearful excuses with which they eluded such insolent demands The chagan had never seen an elephant and his curiosity was excited by the strange, and perhaps fabulous portrait of that wonderful animal At his command one of the largest elephants of the Imperial stables was equipped with stately caparisons, and conducted by a numerous train to the royal village in the plains of Hungary He surveyed the enormous beast with surprise with disgust and possibly with terror and smiled at the vain industry of the Romans who in search of such useless rarities could explore the limits of the land and sea He wished, at the expense of the emperor, to repose in a golden bed The wealth of Constantinople and the skilful diligence of her artists were instantly devoted to the gratification of his caprice but when the work was finished he rejected with scorn a present so unworthy the majesty of a great king [24] These were the casual sallies of his pride but the avarice of the chagan was a more steady and tractable passion a rich and regular supply of silk apparel furniture and plate introduced the rudiments of art and luxury among the tents of the Scythians their appetite was stimulated by the pepper and cinnamon of India [25] the annual subsidy or tribute was raised from fourscore to one hundred and twenty thousand pieces of gold and after each hostile interruption the payment of the arrears with exorbitant interest, was always made the first condition of the new treaty In the language of a barbarian without guile, the prince of the Avars affected to complain of the insincerity of the Greeks [26] yet he was not inferior to the most civilised nations in the refinements of dissimulation and perfidy As the successor of the Lombards the chagan asserted his claim to the important city of Sirmium the ancient bulwark of the Illyrian provinces [27] The plains of the Lower Hungary were covered with the Avar horse, and a fleet of large boats was built in the Hercynian wood to descend the Danube and to transport into the Save the materials of a bridge But as the strong garrison of Singidunum which commanded the conflux of the two rivers might have stopped their passage and baffled his designs he dispelled their apprehensions by a solemn oath that his views were not hostile to the empire He swore by his sword, the symbol of the god of war, that he did not as the enemy of Rome construct a bridge upon the Save If I violate my oath ' pursued the intrepid Baian, may I myself and the last of my nation, perish by the sword! May the heavens, and fire the deity of the heavens, fall upon our heads! May the forests and mountains bury us in their ruins and the Save returning against the laws of nature, to his source overwhelm us in his angry waters! After this barbarous imprecation he calmly inquired what oath was most sacred and venerable among the Christians what guilt of perjury it was most dangerous to incur The bishop of Singidunum presented the Gospel which the chagan received with devout reverence I swear, said he by the God who has spoken in this holy book that I have neither falsehood on my tongue nor treachery in my heart ' As soon as he rose from his knees he accelerated the labour of the bridge, and despatched an envoy to proclaim what he no longer wished to conceal Inform the emperor," said the perfidious Baian that Sirmium is invested on every side Advise his prudence to withdraw the citizens and their effects and to resign a city which it is now impossible to relieve or defend Without the hope of relief the defence of Sirmium was prolonged above three years the walls were still untouched but famine was enclosed within the walls till a merciful capitulation allowed the escape of the naked and hungry inhabitants Singidunum, at the distance of fifty miles experienced a more cruel fate the buildings were razed and the vanquished people was condemned to servitude and exile Yet the ruins of Sirmium are no longer visible the advantageous situation of Singidunum soon attracted a new colony of Sclavonians and the conflux of the Save and Danube is still guarded by the fortifications of Belgrade or the White City so often and so obstinately disputed by the Christian and Turkish arms [28] From Belgrade to the walls of Constantinople a line may be measured of six hundred miles that line was marked with flames and with blood the horses of the Avars were alternately bathed in the Euxine and the Hadriatic, and the Roman pontiff alarmed by the approach of a more savage enemy [29] was reduced to cherish the Lombards as the protectors of Italy The despair of a captive whom his country refused to ransom disclosed to the Avars the invention and practice of military engines [30] But in the first attempts they were rudely framed and awkwardly managed and the resistance of Diocletianopolis and Beroea of Philippopolis and Adrianople soon exhausted the skill and patience of the besiegers The warfare of Baian was that of a Tartar yet his mind was susceptible of a humane and generous sentiment he spared Anchialus whose salutary waters had restored the health of the best beloved of his wives and the Romans confess that their starving army was fed and dismissed by the liberality of a foe His empire extended over Hungary Poland and Prussia, from the mouth of the Danube to that of the Oder [22] and his new subjects were divided and transplanted by the jealous policy of the conqueror [23] The eastern regions of Germany which had been left vacant by the emigration of the Vandals were replenished with Sclavonian colonists the same tribes are discovered in the neighbourhood of the Hadriatic and of the Baltic and with the name of Baian himself the Illyrian cities of Neyss and Lissa are again found in the heart of Silesia. In the disposition both of his troops and provinces the chagan exposed the vassals whose lives he disregarded [24] to the first assault and the swords of the enemy were blunted before they encountered the native valour of the Avars

The Persian alliance restored the troops of the East to the defence of Europe and Maurice who had supported ten years the insolence of the chagan, declared his resolution to march in person against the barbarians In the space of two centuries none of the successors of Theodosius had appeared in the field their lives were supinely spent in the palace of Constantinople and the Greeks could no longer understand that the name of emperor in its primitive sense denoted the chief of the armies of the republic The martial ardour of Maurice was opposed by the grave flattery of the senate the timid superstition of the patriarch and the tears of the empress Constantina and they all conjured him to devolve on some meaner general the fatigues and perils of a Scythian campaign Deaf to their advice and entreaty the emperor boldly advanced[25] seven miles from the capital the sacred ensign of the cross was displayed in the front, and Maurice reviewed with conscious pride the arms and numbers of the veterans who had fought and conquered beyond the Tigris. Anchialus was the last term of his progress by sea and land he solicited without success a miraculous answer to his nocturnal prayers his mind was confounded by the death of a favourite horse the encounter of a wild boar a storm of wind and rain and the birth of a monstrous child and he forgot that the best of omens is to unsheathe our sword in the defence of our country [26] Under the pretence of receiving the ambassadors of Persia the emperor returned to Constantinople exchanged the thoughts of war for those of devotion and disappointed the public hope by his absence and the choice of his lieutenants The blind partiality of fraternal love might excuse the promotion of his brother Peter who fled with equal disgrace from the barbarians from his own soldiers and from the inhabitants of a Roman city That city if we may credit the resemblance of name and character was the famous Azimuntium [26] which had alone repelled the tempest of Attila The example of her warlike youth was propagated to succeeding generations and they obtained from the first or the second Justin an honourable privilege that their valour should be always reserved for the defence of their native country The brother of Maurice attempted to violate this privilege and to mingle a patriot band with the mercenaries of his camp they retired to the church he was not awed by the sanctity of the place the people rose in their cause the gates were shut the ramparts were manned and the cowardice of Peter was found equal to his arrogance and injustice The military fame of Commentiolus[27] is the object of satire or comedy rather than of serious history since he was even deficient in the vile and vulgar qualification of personal courage His solemn counsels strange evolutions and secret orders always supplied an apology for flight or delay If he marched against the enemy the pleasant valleys of Mount Haemus opposed an insuperable barrier but in his retreat he explored with fearless curiosity the most difficult and obsolete paths which had almost escaped the memory of the oldest native The only blood which he lost was drawn in a real or affected malady by the lancet of a surgeon and his health which felt with exquisite sensibility the approach of the barbarians was uniformly restored by the repose and safety of the winter season. A prince who could promote and support this unworthy favourite must derive no glory from the accidental merit of his colleague Priscus [28] In five successive battles which seem to have been conducted with skill and resolution seventeen thousand two hundred barbarians were made prisoners near sixty thousand with four sons of the chagan were slain the Roman general surprised a peaceful district of the Gepidae who slept under the protection of the Avars and his last trophies were erected on the banks of the Danube and the Theiss Since veneration of the clergy and senate of Rome, and afterwards deposited in the palace of the Cæsars between those of Constantine and Theodosius As a subject and a Christian it was the duty of Gregory to acquiesce in the established government but the joyful applause with which he salutes the fortune of the assassin has sullied with indelible disgrace the character of the saint The successor of the apostles might have inculcated with decent firmness the guilt of blood and the necessity of repentance he is content to celebrate the deliverance of the people and the fall of the oppressor to rejoice that the piety and benignity of Phocas have been raised by Providence to the Imperial throne to pray that his hands may be strengthened against all his enemies and to express a wish, perhaps a prophecy, that after a long and triumphant reign he may be transferred from a temporal to an everlasting kingdom [48] I have already traced the steps of a revolution so pleasing in Gregory s opinion both to heaven and earth and Phocas does not appear less hateful in the exercise than in the acquisition of power The pencil of an impartial historian has delineated the portrait of a monster [49] his diminutive and deformed person the closeness of his shaggy eyebrows his red hair, his beardless chin and his cheek disfigured and discoloured by a formidable scar Ignorant of letters of laws and even of arms, he indulged in the supreme rank a more ample privilege of lust and drunkenness and his brutal pleasures were either injurious to his subjects or disgraceful to himself Without assuming the office of a prince he renounced the profession of a soldier and the reign of Phocas afflicted Europe with ignominious peace and Asia with desolating war His savage temper was inflamed by passion hardened by fear exasperated by resistance or reproach The flight of Theodosius to the Persian court had been intercepted by a rapid pursuit or a deceitful message he was beheaded at Nice, and the last hours of the young prince were soothed by the comforts of religion and the consciousness of innocence Yet his phantom disturbed the repose of the usurper a whisper was circulated through the East that the son of Maurice was still alive the people expected their avenger and the widow and daughters of the late emperor would have adopted as their son and brother the vilest of mankind In the massacre of the Imperial family [50] the mercy or rather the discretion of Phocas had spared these unhappy females and they were decently confined to a private house But the spirit of the empress Constantina, still mindful of her father, her husband and her sons, aspired to freedom and revenge. At the dead of night she escaped to the sanctuary of St Sophia but her tears and the gold of her associate Germanus were insufficient to provoke an insurrection Her life was forfeited to revenge, and even to justice but the patriarch obtained and pledged an oath for her safety a monastery was allotted for her prison and the widow of Maurice accepted and abused the lenity of his assassin The discovery or the suspicion of a second conspiracy dissolved the engagements and rekindled the fury of Phocas. A matron who commanded the respect and pity of mankind the daughter wife, and mother of emperors was tortured like the vilest malefactor to force a confession of her designs and associates and the empress Constantina with her three innocent daughters was beheaded at Chalcedon on the same ground which had been stained with the blood of her husband and five sons After such an example it would be superfluous to enumerate the names and sufferings of meaner victims Their condemnation was seldom preceded by the forms of trial and their punishment was embittered by the refinements of cruelty their eyes were pierced their tongues were torn from the root, the hands and feet were amputated some expired under the lash, others in the flames others again were transfixed with arrows and a simple speedy death was mercy which they could rarely obtain The hippodrome the sacred asylum of the pleasures and the liberty of the Romans was polluted with heads and limbs and mangled bodies, and the companions of Phocas were the most sensible that neither his favour nor their services could protect them from a tyrant the worthy rival of the Caligulas and Domitians of the first age of the empire [51]

A daughter of Phocas his only child was given in marriage to the patrician Crispus [52] and the royal images of the bride and bridegroom were indiscreetly placed in the circus by the side of the emperor The father must desire that his posterity should inherit the fruit of his crimes but the monarch was offended by this premature and popular association the tribunes of the green faction who accused the officious error of their sculptors were condemned to instant death their lives were granted to the prayers of the people but Crispus might reasonably doubt whether a jealous usurper could forget and pardon his involuntary competition. The green faction was alienated by the ingratitude of Phocas and the loss of their privileges

every province of the empire was ripe for rebel lion and Heraclius exarch of Africa persisted above two years in refusing all tribute and obedience to the centurion who disgraced the throne of Constantinople By the secret emissaries of Crispus and the senate, the independent exarch was solicited to save and to govern his country but his ambition was chilled by age and he re signed the dangerous enterprise to his son Heraclius and to Nicetas the son of Gregory his friend and lieutenant The powers of Africa were armed by the two adventurous youths they agreed that the one should navigate the fleet from Carthage to Constantinople that the other should lead an army through Egypt and Asia and that the Imperial purple should be the reward of diligence and success A faint rumour of their undertaking was conveyed to the ears of Phocas and the wife and mother of the younger Heraclius were secured as the hostages of his faith but the treacherous heart of Crispus extenuated the distant peril the means of defence were neglected or delayed and the tyrant supinely slept till the African navy cast anchor in the Hellespont Their standard was joined at Abydus by the fugitives and exiles who thirsted for revenge the ships of Heraclius, whose lofty masts were adorned with the holy symbols of religion [52] steered their triumphant course through the Propontis and Phocas beheld from the windows of the palace his approaching and inevitable fate The green faction was tempted by gifts and promises to oppose a feeble and fruitless resistance to the landing of the Africans but the people and even the guards, were determined by the well timed defection of Crispus and the tyrant was seized by a private enemy who boldly invaded the solitude of the palace Stripped of the diadem and purple clothed in a vile habit, and loaded with chains he was transported in a small boat to the Imperial galley of Heraclius who reproached him with the crimes of his abominable reign. Wilt thou govern better? were the last words of the despair of Phocas. After suffering each variety of insult and torture his head was severed from his body the mangled trunk was cast into the flames and the same treatment was inflicted on the statues of the vain usurper and the seditious banner of the green faction. The voice of the clergy the senate and the people invited Heraclius to ascend the throne which he had purified from guilt and ignominy after some graceful hesitation he yielded to their entreaties. His coronation was accompanied by that of his wife Eudoxia and their posterity till the fourth generation continued to reign over the empire of the East The voyage of Heraclius had been easy and prosperous the tedious march of Nicetas was not accomplished before the decision of the contest but he submitted without a murmur to the fortune of his friend and his laudable intentions were rewarded with an equestrian statue and a daughter of the emperor It was more difficult to trust the fidelity of Crispus whose recent services were recompensed by the command of the Cappadocian army His arrogance soon provoked and seemed to excuse the ingratitude of his new sovereign. In the presence of the senate the son in law of Phocas was condemned to embrace the monastic life and the sentence was justified by the weighty observation of Heraclius, that the man who had betrayed his father could never be faithful to his friend.[53]

Even after his death the republic was afflicted by the crimes of Phocas which armed with a pious cause the most formidable of her enemies According to the friendly and equal forms of the Byzantine and Persian courts he announced his exaltation to the throne and his ambassador Lilius who had presented him with the heads of Maurice and his sons was the best qualified to describe the circumstances of the tragic scene [55] However it might be varnished by fiction or sophistry Chosroes turned with horror from the assassin imprisoned the pretended envoy disclaimed the usurper and declared himself the avenger of his father and benefactor The sentiments of grief and resentment which humanity would feel and honour would dictate promoted on this occasion the interest of the Persian king and his interest was powerfully magnified by the national and religious prejudices of the Magi and satraps In a strain of artful adulation which assumed the language of freedom they presumed to censure the excess of his gratitude and friendship for the Greeks a nation with whom it was dangerous to conclude either peace or alliance whose superstition was devoid of truth and justice and who must be incapable of any virtue since they could perpetrate the most atrocious of crimes the impious murder of their sovereign [56] For the crime of an ambitious centurion the nation which he oppressed was chastised with the calamities of war and the same calamities at the end of twenty years were retaliated and redoubled on the heads of the Persians [57] The general who had restored Chosroes to the throne still commanded in the East, and the name of Narses was the formidable sound with which the Assyrian mothers were accustomed to terrify their infants. It is not improbable that a native subject of Persia should encourage his master and his friend to deliver and possess the provinces of Asia. It is still more probable that Chosroes should animate his troops by the assurance that the sword which they dreaded the most would remain in its scabbard or be drawn in their favour. The hero could not depend on the faith of a tyrant, and the tyrant was conscious how little he deserved the obedience of a hero. Narses was removed from his military command; he reared an independent standard at Hierapolis, in Syria, he was betrayed by fallacious promises, and burnt alive in the market place of Constantinople. Deprived of the only chief whom they could fear or esteem, the bands which he had led to victory were twice broken by the cavalry, trampled by the elephants, and pierced by the arrows of the barbarians; and a great number of the captives were beheaded on the field of battle by the sentence of the victor, who might justly condemn these seditious mercenaries as the authors or accomplices of the death of Maurice. Under the reign of Phocas, the fortifications of Merdin, Dara, Amida, and Edessa were successively besieged, reduced, and destroyed by the Persian monarch, he passed the Euphrates, occupied the Syrian cities, Hierapolis, Chalcis and Berrhœa or Aleppo, and soon encompassed the walls of Antioch with his irresistible arms. The rapid tide of success discloses the decay of the empire, the incapacity of Phocas, and the disaffection of his subjects; and Chosroes provided a decent apology for their submission or revolt by an impostor who attended his camp as the son of Maurice[58] and the lawful heir of the monarchy.

The first intelligence from the East which Heraclius received[59] was that of the loss of Antioch; but the aged metropolis, so often overturned by earthquakes and pillaged by the enemy, could supply but a small and languid stream of treasure and blood. The Persians were equally successful and more fortunate in the sack of Cæsarea, the capital of Cappadocia; and as they advanced beyond the ramparts of the frontier, the boundary of ancient war, they found a less obstinate resistance and a more plentiful harvest. The pleasant vale of Damascus has been adorned in every age with a royal city; her obscure felicity has hitherto escaped the historian of the Roman empire; but Chosroes reposed his troops in the paradise of Damascus before he ascended the hills of Libanus or invaded the cities of the Phœnician coast.

The conquest of Jerusalem,[60] which had been meditated by Nushirvan, was achieved by the zeal and avarice of his grandson; the ruin of the proudest monument of Christianity was vehemently urged by the intolerant spirit of the Magi; and he could enlist for this holy warfare an army of six and twenty thousand Jews, whose furious bigotry might compensate in some degree for the want of valour and discipline. After the reduction of Galilee and the region beyond the Jordan, whose resistance appears to have delayed the fate of the capital, Jerusalem itself was taken by assault. The sepulchre of Christ and the stately churches of Helena and Constantine were consumed, or at least damaged, by the flames, the devout offerings of three hundred years were rifled in one sacrilegious day, the patriarch Zachariah and the true cross were transported into Persia, and the massacre of ninety thousand Christians is imputed to the Jews and Arabs, who swelled the disorder of the Persian march. The fugitives of Palestine were entertained at Alexandria by the charity of John the archbishop, who is distinguished among a crowd of saints by the epithet of almsgiver;[61] and the revenues of the church, with a treasure of three hundred thousand pounds, were restored to the true proprietors, the poor of every country and every denomination. But Egypt itself, the only province which had been exempt since the time of Diocletian from foreign and domestic war, was again subdued by the successors of Cyrus. Pelusium, the key of that impervious country, was surprised by the cavalry of the Persians; they passed with impunity the innumerable channels of the Delta, and explored the long valley of the Nile from the pyramids of Memphis to the confines of Æthiopia. Alexandria might have been relieved by a naval force, but the archbishop and the prefect embarked for Cyprus; and Chosroes entered the second city of the empire, which still preserved a wealthy remnant of industry and commerce. His western trophy was erected, not on the walls of Carthage,[62] but in the neighbourhood of Tripoli; the Greek colonies of Cyrene were finally extirpated; and the conqueror, treading in the footsteps of Alexander, returned in triumph through the sands of the Libyan desert. In the same campaign another army advanced from the Euphrates to the Thracian Bosphorus; Chalcedon surrendered after a long siege, and a Persian camp was maintained above ten years in the presence of Constantinople. The sea coast of Pontus, the city of Ancyra, and the isle of Rhodes are enumerated among the last conquests of the Great King and if Chosroes had possessed any maritime power his boundless ambition would have spread slavery and desolation over the provinces of Europe

From the long disputed banks of the Tigris and Euphrates the reign of the grandson of Nushirvan was suddenly extended to the Hellespont and the Nile the ancient limits of the Persian monarchy But the provinces which had been fashioned by the habits of six hundred years to the virtues and vices of the Roman government supported with reluctance the yoke of the barbarians The idea of a republic was kept alive by the institutions or at least by the writings of the Greeks and Romans, and the subjects of Heraclius had been educated to pronounce the words of liberty and law But it has always been the pride and policy of Oriental princes to display the titles and attributes of their omnipotence to upbraid a nation of slaves with their true name and abject condition and to enforce by cruel and insolent threats the rigour of their absolute commands The Christians of the East were scandalised by the worship of fire and the impious doctrine of the two principles the Magi were not less intolerant than the bishops and the martyrdom of some native Persians who had deserted the religion of Zoroaster[a] was conceived to be the prelude of a fierce and general persecution. By the oppressive laws of Justinian the adversaries of the church were made the enemies of the state the alliance of the Jews Nestorians and Jacobites had contributed to the success of Chosroes and his partial favour to the sectaries provoked the hatred and fears of the catholic clergy Conscious of their fear and hatred the Persian conqueror governed his new subjects with an iron sceptre and, as if he suspected the stability of his dominion he exhausted their wealth by exorbitant tributes and licentious rapine despoiled or demolished the temples of the East and transported to his hereditary realms the gold the silver the precious marbles the arts and the artists of the Asiatic cities In the obscure picture of the calamities of the empire[a] it is not easy to discern the figure of Chosroes himself to separate his actions from those of his lieutenants or to ascertain his personal merit in the general blaze of glory and magnificence He enjoyed with ostentation the fruits of victory and frequently retired from the hardships of war to the luxury of the palace But, in the space of twenty four years he was deterred by superstition or resentment from approaching the gates of Ctesiphon and his favourite residence of Artemita or Dastagerd was situate beyond the Tigris about sixty miles to the north of the capital[a] The adjacent pastures were covered with flocks and herds the paradise or park was replenished with pheasants peacocks ostriches, roebucks and wild boars and the noble game of lions and tigers was sometimes turned loose for the bolder pleasures of the chase Nine hundred and sixty elephants were maintained for the use or splendour of the Great King his tents and baggage were carried into the field by twelve thousand great camels and eight thousand of a smaller size[a] and the royal stables were filled with six thousand mules and horses among whom the names of Shebdiz and Barid are renowned for their speed or beauty Six thousand guards successively mounted before the palace gate the service of the interior apartments was performed by twelve thousand slaves and in the number of three thousand virgins the fairest of Asia some happy concubine might console her master for the age or the indifference of Sira. The various treasures of gold silver gems silk and aromatics were deposited in a hundred subterraneous vaults and the chamber Badaverd denoted the accidental gift of the winds which had wafted the spoils of Heraclius into one of the Syrian harbours of his rival The voice of flattery and perhaps of fiction is not ashamed to compute the thirty thousand rich hangings that adorned the walls the forty thousand columns of silver or more probably of marble and plated wood that supported the roof and the thousand globes of gold suspended in the dome to imitate the motions of the planets and the constellations of the zodiac[a] While the Persian monarch contemplated the wonders of his art and power he received an epistle from an obscure citizen of Mecca inviting him to acknowledge Mohammed as the apostle of God He rejected the invitation and tore the epistle It is thus exclaimed the Arabian prophet that God will tear the kingdom and reject the supplications of Chosroes[a] Placed on the verge of the two great empires of the East Mohammed observed with secret joy the progress of their mutual destruction and in the midst of the Persian triumphs he ventured to foretell that before many years should elapse victory would again return to the banners of the Romans[a]

At the time when this prediction is said to have been delivered no prophecy could be more distant from its accomplishment since the first twelve years of Heraclius announced the approaching dissolution of the empire If the

motives of Chosroes had been pure and honour able he must have ended the quarrel with the death of Phocas, and he would have embraced as his best ally, the fortunate African who had so generously avenged the injuries of his bene factor Maurice The prosecution of the war re vealed the true character of the barbarian and the suppliant embassies of Heraclius to beseech his clemency, that he would spare the innocent, accept a tribute, and give peace to the world, were rejected with contemptuous silence or in solent menace Syria, Egypt, and the provinces of Asia were subdued by the Persian arms while Europe from the confines of Istria to the long wall of Thrace was oppressed by the Avars unsatiated with the blood and rapine of the Italian war They had coolly massacred their male captives in the sacred field of Pan nonia the women and children were reduced to servitude and the noblest virgins were aban doned to the promiscuous lust of the barbarians The amorous matron who opened the gates of Friuli passed a short night in the arms of her royal lover the next evening Romilda was con demned to the embraces of twelve Avars, and, the third day, the Lombard princess was im paled in the sight of the camp while the chagan observed with a cruel smile, that such a hus band was the fit recompense of her lewdness and perfidy [70] By these implacable enemies Heraclius on either side, was insulted and be sieged and the Roman empire was reduced to the walls of Constantinople with the remnant of Greece, Italy, and Africa, and some maritime cities, from Tyre to Trebizond of the Asiatic coast After the loss of Egypt the capital was afflicted by famine and pestilence and the em peror, incapable of resistance and hopeless of relief had resolved to transfer his person and government to the more secure residence of Carthage His ships were already laden with the treasures of the palace but his flight was ar rested by the patriarch who armed the powers of religion in the defence of his country led Heraclius to the altar of St Sophia and ex torted a solemn oath that he would live and die with the people whom God had intrusted to his care The chagan was encamped in the plains of Thrace but he dissembled his perfidious de signs and solicited an interview with the em peror near the town of Heraclea Their recon ciliation was celebrated with equestrian games the senate and people in their gayest apparel resorted to the festival of peace and the Avars beheld with envy and desire, the spectacle of Roman luxury On a sudden the hippodrome was encompassed by the Scythian cavalry, who had pressed their secret and nocturnal march. the tremendous sound of the chagan's whip gave the signal of the assault and Heraclius wrap ping his diadem round his arm, was saved, with extreme hazard by the fleetness of his horse So rapid was the pursuit, that the Avars almost en tered the golden gate of Constantinople with the flying crowds [71] but the plunder of the sub urbs rewarded their treason and they trans ported beyond the Danube two hundred and seventy thousand captives On the shore of Chalcedon the emperor held a safer conference with a more honourable foe who before Hera clius descended from his galley, saluted with reverence and pity the majesty of the purple The friendly offer of Sain the Persian general, to conduct an embassy to the presence of the Great King was accepted with the warmest gratitude and the prayer for pardon and peace was humbly presented by the prætorian præ fect, the præfect of the city, and one of the first ecclesiastics of the patriarchal church.[72] But the lieutenant of Chosroes had fatally mistaken the intentions of his master It was not an em bassy, ' said the tyrant of Asia, ' it was the per son of Heraclius bound in chains that he should have brought to the foot of my throne I will never give peace to the emperor of Rome till he has abjured his crucified God and em braced the worship of the sun Sain was flayed alive, according to the inhuman prac ice of his country and the separate and rigorous confinement of the ambassadors violated the law of nations and the faith of an express stipu lation Yet the experience of six years at length persuaded the Persian monarch to renounce th conquest of Constantinople and to specify the annual tribute or ransom of the Roman empire a thousand talents of gold a thousand talents of silver, a thousand silk robes a thousand horses and a thousand virgins Heraclius subscribed these ignominious terms but the time and space which he obtained to collect such treasures from the poverty of the East was industriously employed in the preparations of a bold and desperate attack

Of the characters conspicuous in history that of Heraclius is one of the most extraordinary and inconsistent In the first and the last years of a long reign the emperor appears to be the slave of sloth of pleasure or of superstition the careless and impotent spectator of the pub lic calamities But the languid mists of the morning and evening are separated by the brightness of the meridian sun the Arcadius of the palace arose the Cæsar of the camp and the honour of Rome and Heraclius was gloriously retrieved by the exploits and trophies of six adventurous campaigns It was the duty of the Byzantine historians to have revealed the causes of his slumber and vigilance At this distance we can only conjecture that he was endowed with more personal courage than political resolution that he was detained by the charms and perhaps the arts of his niece Martina with whom, after the death of Eudocia he contracted an incestuous marriage [73] and that he yielded to the base advice of the counsellors who urged as a fundamental law that the life of the emperor should never be exposed in the field [74] Perhaps he was awakened by the last insolent demand of the Persian conqueror but at the moment when Heraclius assumed the spirit of a hero the only hopes of the Romans were drawn from the vicissitudes of fortune which might threaten the proud prosperity of Chosroes and must be favourable to those who had attained the lowest period of depression [75] To provide for the expenses of war was the first care of the emperor and for the purpose of collecting the tribut he was allowed to solicit the benevolence of the Eastern provinces But the revenue no longer flowed in the usual channels the credit of an arbitrary prince is annihilated by his power and the courage of Heraclius was first displayed in daring to borrow the consecrated wealth of churches under the solemn vow of restoring with usury whatever he had been compelled to employ in the service of religion and of the empire The clergy themselves appear to have sympathised with the public distress and the discreet patriarch of Alexandria without admitting the precedent of sacrilege assisted his sovereign by the miraculous or seasonable revelation of a secret treasure [76] Of the soldiers who had conspired with Phocas only two were found to have survived the stroke of time and of the barbarians [77] the loss even of these seditious veterans was imperfectly supplied by the new levies of Heraclius and the gold of the sanctuary united, in the same camp the names and arms and languages of the East and West He would have been content with the neutrality of the Avars and his friendly entreaty that the chagan would act not as the enemy but as the guardian of the empire was accompanied with a more persuasive donative of two hundred thousand pieces of gold. Two days after the festival of Easter the emperor exchanging his purple for the simple garb of a penitent and warrior [78] gave the signal of his departure To the faith of the people Heraclius recommended his children the civil and military powers were vested in the most deserving hands and the discretion of the patriarch and senate was authorised to save or surrender the city if they should be oppressed in his absence by the superior forces of the enemy

The neighbouring heights of Chalcedon were covered with tents and arms but if the new levies of Heraclius had been rashly led to the attack the victory of the Persians in the sight of Constantinople might have been the last day of the Roman empire As imprudent would it have been to advance into the provinces of Asia leaving their innumerable cavalry to intercept his convoys, and continually to hang on the lassitude and disorder of his rear But the Greeks were still masters of the sea a fleet of galleys transports and store-ships was assembled in the harbour the barbarians consented to embark a steady wind carried them through the Hellespont the western and southern coast of Asia Minor lay on their left hand the spirit of their chief was first displayed in a storm and even the eunuchs of his train were excited to suffer and to work by the example of their master He landed his troops on the confines of Syria and Cilicia in the gulf of Scanderoon where the coast suddenly turns to the south [79] and his discernment was expressed in the choice of this important post [80] From all sides the scattered garrisons of the maritime cities and the mountains might repair with speed and safety to his Imperial standard The natural fortifications of Cilicia protected and even concealed the camp of Heraclius which was pitched near Issus on the same ground where Alexander had vanquished the host of Darius The angle which the emperor occupied was deeply indented into a vast semicircle of the Asiatic Armenian and Syrian provinces and to whatsoever point of the circumference he should direct his attack it was easy for him to dissemble his own motions and to prevent those of the enemy In the camp of Issus the Roman general reformed the sloth and disorder of the veterans and educated the new recruits in the knowledge and practice of military virtue Unfolding the miraculous image of Christ he urged them to revenge the holy altars which had been profaned by the worshippers of fire addressing them by the endearing appellations of sons and brethren he deplored the public and private wrongs of the republic The subjects of a monarch were persuaded that they fought in the cause of freedom and a similar enthusiasm was communicated to the for eign mercenaries, who must have viewed with equal indifference the interest of Rome and of Persia. Heraclius himself, with the skill and patience of a centurion, inculcated the lessons of the school of tactics, and the soldiers were assiduously trained in the use of their weapons and the exercises and evolutions of the field. The cavalry and infantry, in light or heavy armour, were divided into two parties; the trumpets were fixed in the centre, and their signals directed the march, the charge, the retreat or pursuit, the direct or oblique order, the deep or extended phalanx, to represent in fictitious combat the operations of genuine war. Whatever hardship the emperor imposed on the troops, he inflicted with equal severity on himself; their labour, their diet, their sleep, were measured by the inflexible rules of discipline; and, without despising the enemy, they were taught to repose an implicit confidence in their own valour and the wisdom of their leader. Cilicia was soon encompassed with the Persian arms; but their cavalry hesitated to enter the defiles of Mount Taurus till they were circumvented by the evolutions of Heraclius, who insensibly gained their rear whilst he appeared to present his front in order of battle. By a false motion, which seemed to threaten Armenia, he drew them against their wishes to a general action. They were tempted by the artful disorder of his camp; but when they advanced to combat, the ground, the sun, and the expectation of both armies were unpropitious to the barbarians; the Romans successfully repeated their tactics in a field of battle,[81] and the event of the day declared to the world that the Persians were not invincible, and that a hero was invested with the purple. Strong in victory and fame, Heraclius boldly ascended the heights of Mount Taurus, directed his march through the plains of Cappadocia, and established his troops for the winter season in safe and plentiful quarters on the banks of the river Halys.[82] His soul was superior to the vanity of entertaining Constantinople with an imperfect triumph; but the presence of the emperor was indispensably required to soothe the restless and rapacious spirit of the Avars.

Since the days of Scipio and Hannibal, no bolder enterprise has been attempted than that which Heraclius achieved for the deliverance of the empire.[83] He permitted the Persians to oppress for awhile the provinces, and to insult with impunity the capital of the East, while the Roman emperor explored his perilous way through the Black Sea,[84] and the mountains of Armenia, penetrated into the heart of Persia,[85] and recalled the armies of the Great King to the defense of their bleeding country.

With a select band of five thousand soldiers, Heraclius sailed from Constantinople to Trebizond, assembled his forces which had wintered in the Pontic regions, and from the mouth of the Phasis to the Caspian Sea encouraged his subjects and allies to march with the successor of Constantine under the faithful and victorious banner of the cross. When the legions of Lucullus and Pompey first passed the Euphrates, they blushed at their easy victory over the natives of Armenia. But the long experience of war had hardened the minds and bodies of that effeminate people; their zeal and bravery were approved in the service of a declining empire; they abhorred and feared the usurpation of the house of Sassan, and the memory of persecution envenomed their pious hatred of the enemies of Christ. The limits of Armenia, as it had been ceded to the emperor Maurice, extended as far as the Araxes; the river submitted to the indignity of a bridge,[86] and Heraclius, in the footsteps of Mark Antony, advanced towards the city of Tauris or Gandzaca,[87] the ancient and modern capital of one of the provinces of Media. At the head of forty thousand men, Chosroes himself had returned from some distant expedition to oppose the progress of the Roman arms; but he retreated on the approach of Heraclius, declining the generous alternative of peace or battle. Instead of half a million of inhabitants, which have been ascribed to Tauris under the reign of the Sophys, the city contained no more than three thousand houses; but the value of the royal treasures was enhanced by a tradition that they were the spoils of Crœsus, which had been transported by Cyrus from the citadel of Sardes. The rapid conquests of Heraclius were suspended only by the winter season; a motive of prudence or superstition[88] determined his retreat into the province of Albania, along the shores of the Caspian; and his tents were most probably pitched in the plains of Mogan,[89] the favourite encampment of Oriental princes. In the course of this successful inroad he signalised the zeal and revenge of a Christian emperor; at his command the soldiers extinguished the fire, and destroyed the temples, of the Magi; the statues of Chosroes, who aspired to divine honours, were abandoned to the flames; and the ruin of Thebarma or Ormia,[90] which had given birth to Zoroaster himself, made some atonement for the injuries of the holy sepulchre. A purer spirit of religion was shown in the relief and deliverance of fifty thousand captives. Heraclius was rewarded by their tears and grateful acclamations but this wise measure which spread the fame of his benevolence diffused the murmurs of the Persians against the pride and obstinacy of their own sovereign.

Amidst the glories of the succeeding campaign Heraclius is almost lost to our eyes and to those of the Byzantine historians [81] From the spacious and fruitful plains of Albania the emperor appears to follow the chain of Hyrcanian mountains to descend into the province of Media or Irak, and to carry his victorious arms as far as the royal cities of Casbin and Ispahan which had never been approached by a Roman conqueror Alarmed by the danger of his kingdom, the powers of Chosroes were already recalled from the Nile and the Bosphorus and three formidable armies surrounded in a distant and hostile land the camp of the emperor The Colchian allies prepared to desert his standard and the fears of the bravest veterans were expressed rather than concealed by their desponding silence. Be not terrified, said the intrepid Heraclius by the multitude of your foes With the aid of Heaven one Roman may triumph over a thousand barbarians But if we devote our lives for the salvation of our brethren we shall obtain the crown of martyrdom and our immortal reward will be liberally paid by God and posterity These magnanimous sentiments were supported by the vigour of his actions He repelled the threefold attack of the Persians improved the divisions of their chiefs, and by a well-concerted train of marches, retreats and successful actions finally chased them from the field into the fortified cities of Media and Assyria In the severity of the winter season, Sarbaraza deemed himself secure in the walls of Salban he was surprised by the activity of Heraclius who divided his troops and performed a laborious march in the silence of the night. The flat roofs of the houses were defended with useless valour against the darts and torches of the Romans the satraps and nobles of Persia with their wives and children and the flower of their martial youth, were either slain or made prisoners The general escaped by a precipitate flight, but his golden armour was the prize of the conqueror and the soldiers of Heraclius enjoyed the wealth and repose which they had so nobly deserved. On the return of spring the emperor traversed in seven days the mountains of Curdistan and passed without resistance the rapid stream of the Tigris. Oppressed by the weight of their spoils and captives, the Roman army halted under the walls of Amida and Heraclius informed the senate of Constantinople of his safety and success which they had already felt by the retreat of the besiegers The bridges of the Euphrates were destroyed by the Persians but as soon as the emperor had discovered a ford they hastily retired to defend the banks of the Sarus [82] in Cilicia That river an impetuous torrent was about three hundred feet broad the bridge was fortified with strong turrets and the banks were lined with barbarian archers After a bloody conflict which continued till the evening the Romans prevailed in the assault and a Persian of gigantic size was slain and thrown into the Sarus by the hand of the emperor himself The enemies were dispersed and dismayed Heraclius pursued his march to Sebaste in Cappadocia and at the expiration of three years, the same coast of the Euxine applauded his return from a long and victorious expedition [83]

Instead of skirmishing on the frontier the two monarchs who disputed the empire of the East aimed their desperate strokes at the heart of their rival The military force of Persia was wasted by the marches and combats of twenty years, and many of the veterans who had survived the perils of the sword and the climate were still detained in the fortresses of Egypt and Syria But the revenge and ambition of Chosroes exhausted his kingdom and the new levies of subjects strangers and slaves, were divided into three formidable bodies [84] The first army of fifty thousand men illustrious by the ornament and title of the golden spears was destined to march against Heraclius the second was stationed to prevent his junction with the troops of his brother Theodorus and the third was commanded to besiege Constantinople and to second the operations of the chagan with whom the Persian king had ratified a treaty of alliance and partition Sarbar the general of the third army penetrated through the provinces of Asia to the well known camp of Chalcedon and amused himself with the destruction of the sacred and profane buildings of the Asiatic suburbs while he impatiently waited the arrival of his Scythian friends on the opposite side of the Bosphorus. On the twenty ninth of June thirty thousand barbarians the vanguard of the Avars forced the long wall, and drove into the capital a promiscuous crowd of peasants citizens and soldiers Fourscore thousand [85] of his native subjects and of the vassal tribes of Gepidæ Russians Bulgarians, and Sclavoni

ans advanced under the standard of the chagan, a month was spent in marches and negotiations, but the whole city was invested on the thirty first of July, from the suburbs of Pera and Galata to the Blachernæ and seven towers, and the inhabitants descried with terror the flaming signals of the European and Asiatic shores In the meanwhile the magistrates of Constantinople repeatedly strove to purchase the retreat of the chagan but their deputies were rejected and insulted and he suffered the patricians to stand before his throne while the Persian envoys in silk robes were seated by his side 'You see,' said the haughty barbarian the proofs of my perfect union with the Great King and his lieutenant is ready to send into my camp a select band of three thousand warriors Presume no longer to tempt your master with a partial and inadequate ransom your wealth and your city are the only presents worthy of my acceptance For yourselves I shall permit you to depart, each with an undergarment and a shirt and at my entreaty my friend Sarbar will not refuse a passage through his lines Your absent prince, even now a captive or a fugitive has left Constantinople to its fate nor can you escape the arms of the Avars and Persians, unless you could soar into air like birds, unless like fishes you could dive into the waves [96] During ten successive days the capital was assaulted by the Avars who had made some progress in the science of attack they advanced to sap or batter the wall, under the cover of the impenetrable tortoise their engines discharged a perpetual volley of stones and darts and twelve lofty towers of wood exalted the combatants to the height of the neighbouring ramparts But the senate and people were animated by the spirit of Heraclius who had detached to their relief a body of twelve thousand cuirassiers, the powers of fire and mechanics were used with superior art and success in the defence of Constantinople and the galleys with two and three ranks of oars, commanded the Bosphorus and rendered the Persians the idle spectators of the defeat of their allies The Avars were repulsed, a fleet of Sclavonian canoes was destroyed in the harbour the vassals of the chagan threatened to desert his provisions were exhausted, and after burning his engines he gave the signal of a slow and formidable retreat The devotion of the Romans ascribed this signal deliverance to the Virgin Mary but the mother of Christ would surely have condemned their inhuman murder of the Persian envoys, who were entitled to the rights of humanity, if they were not protected by the laws of nations [97]

After the division of his army, Heraclius prudently retired to the banks of the Phasis from whence he maintained a defensive war against the fifty thousand gold spears of Persia His anxiety was relieved by the deliverance of Constantinople his hopes were confirmed by a victory of his brother Theodorus and to the hostile league of Chosroes with the Avars the Roman emperor opposed the useful and honourable alliance of the Turks At his liberal invitation the horde of Chozars[98] transported their tents from the plains of the Volga to the mountains of Georgia Heraclius received them in the neighbourhood of Teflis, and the khan with his nobles dismounted from their horses if we may credit the Greeks, and fell prostrate on the ground to adore the purple of the Cæsar Such voluntary homage and important aid were entitled to the warmest acknowledgments and the emperor taking off his own diadem placed it on the head of the Turkish prince whom he saluted with a tender embrace and the appellation of son After a sumptuous banquet he presented Ziebel with the plate and ornaments the gold the gems, and the silk which had been used at the Imperial table and with his own hand distributed rich jewels and earrings to his new allies In a secret interview he produced the portrait of his daughter Eudocia [99] condescended to flatter the barbarian with the promise of a fair and august bride obtained an immediate succour of forty thousand horse and negotiated a strong diversion of the Turkish arms on the side of the Oxus [100] The Persians in their turn, retreated with precipitation in the camp of Edessa Heraclius reviewed an army of seventy thousand Romans and strangers and some months were successfully employed in the recovery of the cities of Syria Mesopotamia and Armenia whose fortifications had been imperfectly restored Sarbar still maintained the important station of Chalcedon but the jealousy of Chosroes or the artifice of Heraclius soon alienated the mind of that powerful satrap from the service of his king and country A messenger was intercepted with a real or fictitious mandate to the cadarigan or second in command directing him to send without delay to the throne the head of a guilty or unfortunate general *The despatches were transmitted to Sar*bar himself and as soon as he read the sentence of his own death he dexterously inserted the names of four hundred officers assembled a military council and asked the cadarigan wheth er he was prepared to execute the commands of their tyrant? The Persians unanimously de clared that Chosroes had forfeited the sceptre a separate treaty was concluded with the govern ment of Constantinople and if some considera tions of honour or policy restrained Sarbar from joining the standard of Heraclius the emperor was assured that he might prosecute without in terruption his designs of victory and peace.

Deprived of his firmest support and doubtful of the fidelity of his subjects the greatness of hosroes was still conspicuous in its ruins The umber of five hundred thousand may be inter reted as an Oriental metaphor to describe the ien and arms, the horses and elephants that overed Media and Assyria against the inva on of Heraclius Yet the Romans boldly ad 'anced from the Araxes to the Tigris and the imid prudence of Rhazates was content to fol ow them by forced marches through a desolate ountry till he received a peremptory mandate o risk the fate of Persia in a decisive battle Eastward of the Tigris at the end of the bridge of Mosul the great Nineveh had formerly been erected [101] the city and even the ruins of the city had long since disappeared [102] the vacant space afforded a spacious field for the opera tions of the two armies But these operations are neglected by the Byzantine historians and like the authors of epic poetry and romance they ascribe the victory not to the military conduct but to the personal valour of their favourite hero On this memorable day Heraclius on his horse Phallas surpassed the bravest of his war riors his lip was pierced with a spear the steed was wounded in the thigh, but he carried his master safe and victorious through the triple phalanx of the barbarians In the heat of the action three valiant chiefs were successively slain by the sword and lance of the emperor among these was Rhazates himself he fell like a soldier but the sight of his head scattered grief and despair through the fainting ranks of the Persians His armour of pure and massy gold the shield of one hundred and twenty plates the sword and belt the saddle and cuirass adorned the triumph of Heraclius and if he had not been faithful to Christ and his mother the champion of Rome might have offered the fourth opime spoils to the Jupiter of the Capi tol [103] In the battle of Nineveh which was fiercely fought from daybreak to the eleventh hour twenty-eight standards besides those which might be broken or torn were taken from the Persians the greatest part of their army was cut in pieces and the victors concealing their own loss passed the night on the field They acknowledge that, on this occasion it was less difficult to kill than to discomfit the soldiers of Chosroes amidst the bodies of their friends no more than two bow-shot from the enemy the remnant of the Persian cavalry stood firm till the seventh hour of the night about the eighth hour they retired to their unrifled camp col lected their baggage and dispersed on all sides from the want of orders rather than of resolu tion The diligence of Heraclius was not less admirable in the use of victory by a march of forty-eight miles in four and twenty hours his vanguard occupied the bridges of the great and the lesser Zab and the cities and palaces of Assyria were open for the first time to the Ro mans By a just gradation of magnificent scenes they penetrated to the royal seat of Dastagerd and though much of the treasure had been re moved and much had been expended, the re maining wealth appears to have exceed d their hopes and even to have satiated their avarice Whatever could not be easily transported they consumed with fire that Chosroes might feel the anguish of those wounds which he had so often inflicted on the provinces of the empire and justice might allow the excuse if the desola tion had been confined to the works of regal luxury—if national hatred military licence and religious zeal had not wasted with equal rage the habitations and the temples of the guiltless subject The recovery of three hundred Roman standards and the deliverance of the numerous captives of Edessa and Alexandria re flect a purer glory on the arms of Heraclius From the palace of Dastagerd he pursued his march within a few miles of Modain or Ctesi phon till he was stopped on the banks of the Arba by the difficulty of the passage the rigour of the season and perhaps the fame of an im pregnable capital The return of the emperor is marked by the mod rn name of the city of Sherhzour he fortunately passed Mount Zara before the snow which fell incessantly thirty four days and the citizens of Gandzaca, or Tauris were compelled to entertain his soldiers and their horses with an hospitable reception [104]

When the ambition of Chosroes was reduced to the defence of his hereditary kingdom the love of glory or even the sense of shame should have urged him to meet his rival in the field In the battle of Nineveh his courage might have taught the Persians to vanquish or he might have fallen with honour by the lance of a Roman emperor The successor of Cyrus chose rather at a secure distan e to expect the event to assemble the relics of the defeat and to retire by measured steps before the march of Heraclius, till he beheld with a sigh the once loved mansions of Dastagerd Both his friends and enemies were persuaded that it was the intention of Chosroes to bury himself under the ruins of the city and palace and as both might have been equally adverse to his flight the monarch of Asia with Sira and three concubines escaped through a hole in the wall nine days before the arrival of the Romans The slow and stately procession in which he showed himself to the prostrate crowd was changed to a rapid and secret journey the first evening he lodged in the cottage of a peasant, whose humble door would scarcely give admittance to the Great King [105] His superstition was subdued by fear on the third day he entered with joy the fortifications of Ctesiphon, yet he still doubted of his safety till he had opposed the river Tigris to the pursuit of the Romans The discovery of his flight agitated with terror and tumult the palace the city, and the camp of Dastagerd the satraps hesitated whether they had most to fear from their sovereign or the enemy and the females of the harem were astonished and pleased by the sight of mankind till the jealous husband of three thousand wives again confined them to a more distant castle At his command the army of Dastagerd retreated to a new camp the front was covered by the Arba and a line of two hundred elephants, the troops of the more distant provinces successively arrived and the vilest domestics of the king and satraps were enrolled for the last defence of the throne It was still in the power of Chosroes to obtain a reasonable peace and he was repeatedly pressed by the messengers of Heraclius to spare the blood of his subjects and to relieve a humane conqueror from the painful duty of carrying fire and sword through the fairest countries of Asia. But the pride of the Persian had not yet sunk to the level of his fortune he derived a momentary confidence from the retreat of the emperor he wept with impotent rage over the ruins of his Assyrian palaces, and disregarded too long the rising murmurs of the nation, who complained that their lives and fortunes were sacrificed to the obstinacy of an old man That unhappy old man was himself tortured with the sharpest pains both of mind and body, and in the consciousness of his approaching end, he resolved to fix the tiara on the head of Merdaza, the most favoured of his sons But the will of Chosroes was no longer revered and Siroes, who gloried in the rank and merit of his mother Sira had conspired with the malcontents to assert and anticipate the rights of primogeniture [106] Twenty two satraps they styled themselves patriots were tempted by the wealth and honours of a new reign to the soldiers the heir of Chosroes promised an increase of pay to the Christians the free exercise of their religion, to the captives liberty and rewards and to the nation instant peace and the reduction of taxes It was determined by the conspirators that Siroes with the ensigns of royalty should appear in the camp, and if the enterprise should fail his escape was contrived to the Imperial court But the new monarch was saluted with unanimous acclamations the flight of Chosroes (yet where could he have fled?) was rudely arrested, eighteen sons were massacred before his face and he was thrown into a dungeon where he expired on the fifth day The Greeks and modern Persians minutely described how Chosroes was insulted and famished and tortured, by the command of an inhuman son who so far surpassed the example of his father but at the time of his death what tongue would relate the story of the parricide? what eye could penetrate into the tower of darkness? According to the faith and mercy of his Christian enemies he sunk without hope into a still deeper abyss [107] and it will not be denied that tyrants of every age and sect are the best entitled to such infernal abodes The glory of the house of Sassan ended with the life of Chosroes, his unnatural son enjoyed only eight months the fruit of his crimes and in the space of four years the regal title was assumed by nine candidates who disputed, with the sword or dagger the fragments of an exhausted monarchy Every province and each city of Persia was the scene of independence of discord and of blood, and the state of anarchy prevailed about eight years longer till the factions were silenced and united under the common yoke of the Arabian caliphs [108]

As soon as the mountains became passable the emperor received the welcome news of the success of the conspiracy the death of Chosroes and the elevation of his eldest son to the throne of Persia The authors of the revolution eager to display their merits in the court or camp of Tauris preceded the ambassadors of Siroes who delivered the letters of their master to his brother the emperor of the Romans [109] In the language of the usurpers of every age he imputes his own crimes to the Deity and without degrading his equal majesty he offers to reconcile the long discord of the two nations by a treaty of peace and alliance more durable than brass or iron The conditions of the treaty were easily defined and faithfully execu ed In the recovery of the standards and prisoners which had fallen into the hands of the Persians, the emperor imitated the example of Augustus their care of the national dignity was celebrated by th poets of the times but the decay of gen ius may be measured by the distance between Horace and George of Pisidia the subjects and brethren of Heraclius were redeemed from per secution slavery and exile but, instead of the Roman eagles, the true wood of the holy cross was restored to the importunate demands of the successor of Constantine The victor was not ambitious of enlarging the weakness of the em pire the son of Chosroes abandoned without regret the conquests of his father the Persians who evacuated the cities of Syria and Egypt were honourably conducted to the frontier and a war which had wounded the vitals of the two monarchies produced no change in their exter nal and relative situation. The return of Hera clius from Tauris to Constantinople was a per petual triumph, and aft r the exploits of six glorious campaigns he peaceably enjoyed the sabbath of his toils After a long impatience the senate the clergy and the people went forth to meet their hero with tears and acclamations with olive branches and innumerable lamps he entered the capital in a chariot drawn by four elephants and as soon as the emperor could disengage himself from the tumult of public joy he tasted more genuine satisfaction in the embraces of his mother and his sons [110]

The succeeding year was illustrated by a tri umph of a very different kind the restitution of the true cross to the holy sepulchre Heraclius performed in person the pilgrimage of Jerusa lem the identity of the relic was verified by the discreet patriarch [111] and this august ceremony has been commemorated by the annual festival of the exaltation of the cross Before the emperor presumed to tread the consecrated ground he was instructed to strip himself of the diadem and purple the pomp and vanity of the world but in the judgment of his clergy the persecu tion of the Jews was more easily reconciled with the precepts of the Gospel He again ascended his throne to receive the congratulations of the ambassadors of France and India and the fame of Moses Alexander and Hercules[112] was eclipsed in the popular estimation by the supe rior merit and glory of the great Heraclius. Yet the deliverer of the East was indigent and feeble Of the Persian spoils the most valuable portion had been expended in the war distrib uted to the soldiers, or buried by an unlucky tempest in the waves of the Euxine The con science of the emperor was oppressed by the obligation of restoring the wealth of the cl rgy which he had borrowed for their own defence a perpetual fund was required to satisfy these inexorable creditors the provinces already wasted by the arms and avarice of the Persians, were compelled to a econd payment of the same taxes and the arrears of a simple citizen the treasurer of Damascus were commuted to a fine of one hundred thousand pieces of gold The loss of two hundred thousand soldiers [113] who had fallen by the sword was of less fatal importance than the decay of arts, agriculture, and population in this long and destructive war and although a victorious army had been formed under the standard of Heraclius, the unnatu ral effort appears to have exhausted rather than exercised their strength. While the emperor tri umphed at Constantinople or Jerusalem an obscure town on the confines of Syria was pil laged by the Saracens and they cut in pieces some troops who advanced to its relief an ordi nary and trifling occurrence had it not been the prelude of a mighty revolution These rob bers were the apostles of Mohammed their fa natic valour had emerg d from the desert and in the last eight years of his reign Heraclius lost to the Arabs the same provinces which he had rescued from the Persians

Theological History of the Doctrine of the Incarnation The Human and Divine Nature of Christ Enmity of the Patriarchs of Alexandria and Constantinople St Cyril and Nestorius Third General Council of Ephesus Heresy of Eutyches Fourth General Council of Chalcedon Civil and Ecclesiastical Discord Intolerance of Justinian The Three Chapters The Monothelite Controversy State of the Oriental Sects I The Nestorians II The Jacobites III The Maronites IV The Armenians V The Copts VI Abyssinians

AFTER the extinction of paganism the Christians in peace and piety might have enjoyed their solitary triumph But the principle of discord was alive in their bosom and they were more solicitous to explore the nature, than to practise the laws of their founder I have already observed that the disputes of the TRINITY were succeeded by those of the INCARNATION alike scandalous to the church alike pernicious to the state still more minute in their origin, still more durable in their effects It is my design to comprise in the present chapter a religious war of two hundred and fifty years to represent the ecclesiastical and political schism of the Oriental sects and to introduce their clamorous or sanguinary contests by a modest inquiry into the doctrines of the primitive church [1]

I A laudable regard for the honour of the first proselytes has countenanced the belief the hope the wish that the Ebionites or at least the Nazarenes were distinguished only by their obstinate perseverance in the practise of the Mosaic rites Their churches have disappeared their books are obliterated their obscure freedom might allow a latitude of faith and the softness of their infant creed would be variously moulded by the zeal or prudence of three hundred years Yet the most charitable criticism must refuse these sectaries any knowledge of the pure and proper divinity of Christ Educated in the school of Jewish prophecy and prejudice they had never been taught to elevate their hopes above a human and temporal Messiah [2] If they had courage to hail their king when he appeared in a plebeian garb their grosser apprehensions were incapable of discerning their God who had studiously disguised his celestial character under the name and person of a mortal [3] The familiar companions of Jesus of Nazareth conversed with their friend and countryman, who in all the actions of rational and animal life appeared of the same species with themselves His progress from infancy to youth and manhood was marked by a regular increase in stature and wisdom and after a painful agony of mind and body he expired on the cross He lived and died for the service of mankind but the life and death of Socrates had likewise been devoted to the cause of religion and justice and although the stoic or the hero may disdain the humble virtues of Jesus the tears which he shed over his friend and country may be esteemed the purest evidence of his humanity The miracles of the gospel could not astonish a people who held with intrepid faith the more splendid prodigies of the Mosaic law The prophets of ancient days had cured diseases raised the dead divided the sea stopped the sun, and ascended to heaven in a fiery chariot And the metaphorical style of the Hebrews might ascribe to a saint and martyr the adoptive title of SON OF GOD

Yet in the insufficient creed of the Nazarenes and the Ebionites a distinction is faintly noticed between the heretics who confounded the generation of Christ in the common order of nature, and the less guilty schismatics who revered the virginity of his mother and excluded the aid of an earthly father The incredulity of the former was countenanced by the visible circumstances of his birth the legal marriage of his reputed parents Joseph and Mary and his lineal claim to the kingdom of David and the inheritance of Judah But the secret and authentic history has been recorded in several copies of the Gospel according to St Matthew [4] which these sectaries long preserved in the original Hebrew [5] as the sole evidence of their faith The natural suspicions of the husband conscious of his own chastity were dispelled by the assurance (in a dream) that his wife was pregnant of the Holy Ghost and as this distant and domestic prodigy could not fall under the personal observation of the historian he must have listened to the same voice which dictated to Isaiah the future conception of a virgin The son of a virgin generated by the ineffabl oper ation of the Holy Spirit was a creature without exampl or resemblance superior in every at tribute of mind and body to the children of Adam. Since the introduction of the Greek or Chaldean philosophy [6] the Jews[7] were per suaded of the pre-existence transmigration and immortality of souls and Providence was justified by a supposition that they were con fined in their earthly prisons to expiate the stains which they had contracted in a former state [8] Put the degrees of purity and corruption are almos immeasurable It might be fairly presumed that the most sublime and virtuous of human spirits was infused into the offspring of Mary and the Holy Ghost [9] that his abasement was the result of his voluntary choice and that the object of his mission was to purify not his own, but the sin. of the world On his return to his native skies he received the immense reward of his obedience the everlasting kingdom of the Messiah which had been darkly foretold by the prophets under the carnal images of peace of conquest and of dominion Omnipotence could enlarge the human faculties of Christ to the extent of his celestial office. In the language of antiquity the title of God has not been severely confined to the first parent and his incompar able minister his only begotten Son might claim, without presumption the religious though secondary worship of a subject world

II The seeds of the faith which had slowly arisen in the rocky and ungrateful soil of Judea were transplanted in full maturity to the hap pi r climes of the Gentiles and the strangers of Rome or Asia, who never beheld the manhood, were the more readily disposed to embra e the divinity of Christ The polytheist and the philosopher the Greek and the barbarian were alike accustomed to conceive a long suc ess on an infinite chain of angels or demons or deities or æons o emanations issuing from the throne of light. Nor could it seem strange or incredible that the first of these æons the Lo os or Word of God of the same substance with the Father should descend upon earth to d liver the human race from vice and error and to conduct them in the paths of life and immortality But the prevailing d ctrine of the eternity and inh rent pravity of matter infected the primitive churches of the East Many among the Gentile proselytes refused to believe that a celestial spirit an undivided portion of the first essence, had been personally united with a mass of impure and contaminated flesh and in their zeal for the divinity, they piously abjured the humanity of Christ While his blood was still recent on Mount Calvary [10] the Docetes a numerous and learned sect of Asiatics, invented the phantastic system which was after wards propagated by the Marcionites the Manichæans and the various names of the Gnostic heresy [11] They denied the truth and authenticity of the gospels as far as they relate the conception of Mary the birth of Christ and the thirty years that preceded the exercise of his ministry He first appeared on the banks of the Jordan in the form of pe fect manhood but it was a form only and no substance a human figure created by the hand of Omnipotence to imitate the faculties and actions of a man and to impose a perpetual illusion on the senses of his friends and enemies Articulate sounds vibrated on the ears of the disciples but the image which was impressed on their optic nerve eluded the more stubborn evidence of the touch and they enjoyed the spiritual not the corporeal, presence of the Son of God The rage of the Jews was idly wasted against an impas sive phantom and the mystic scenes of the pas sion and death the resurrection and ascension of Christ were repre ented on the theatre of Jerusalem for the benefit of mankind If it were urged that such ideal mimicry such incessant deception was unworthy of the God of truth the Docetes agreed with too many of their orthodox brethren in the justification of pious falsehood In the system of the Gnostics the Jehovah of Israel the Creator of this lower world was a rebellious, or at least an ignorant spirit The Son of God descended upon earth to abolish his temple and his law and for the accomplishment of this salutary end he dex terously transferred to his own person the hope and prediction of a temporal Messiah

One of the most subtle disputants of the Manichæan school has pressed the danger and indecency of supposing that the God of the Christians in the state of a human fœtus emerged at the end of nine months from a fe male womb The pious horror of his antago nists provoked them to disclaim all sensual circumstances of conception and delivery to maintain that the divinity passed through Mary like a sunbeam through a plate of glass and to assert that the seal of her virginity re mained unbroken even at the moment when she became the mother of Christ But the rashness of these concessions has encouraged a milder sentiment of those Docetes who taught not that Christ was a phantom, but that he was clothed with an impassible and incorruptible body Such, indeed, in the more orthodox system, he has acquired since his resurrection and such he must have always possessed if it were capable of pervading without resistance or injury the density of intermediate matter Devoid of its most essential properties it might be exempt from the attributes and infirmities of the flesh A fœtus that could increase from an invisible point to its full maturity a child that could attain the stature of perfect manhood, without deriving any nourishment from the ordinary sources, might continue to exist without repairing a daily waste by a daily supply of external matter Jesus might share the repasts of his disciples without being subject to the calls of thirst or hunger, and his virgin purity was never sullied by the involuntary stains of sensual concupiscence Of a body thus singularly constituted a question would arise by what means and of what materials it was originally framed and our sounder theology is startled by an answer which was not peculiar to the Gnostics that both the form and the substance proceeded from the divine essence The idea of pure and absolute spirit is a refinement of modern philosophy the incorporeal essence, ascribed by the ancients to human souls celestial beings, and even the Deity himself does not exclude the notion of extended space and their imagination was satisfied with a subtle nature of air, or fire or ether, incomparably more perfect than the grossness of the material world If we define the place, we must describe the figure of the Deity Our experience perhaps our vanity, represents the powers of reason and virtue under a human form The Anthropomorphites, who swarmed among the monks of Egypt and the Catholics of Africa, could produce the express declaration of Scripture that man was made after the image of his Creator [12] The venerable Serapion one of the saints of the Nitrian desert relinquished with many a tear his darling prejudice and bewailed like an infant, his unlucky conversion which had stolen away his God and left his mind without any visible object of faith or devotion [13]

III Such were the fleeting shadows of the Docetes A more substantial though less simple hypothesis was contrived by Cerinthus of Asia [14] who dared to oppose the last of the apostles Placed on the confines of the Jewish and Gentile world, he laboured to reconcile the Gnostic with the Ebionite, by confessing in the same Messiah the supernatural union of a man and a God and this mystic doctrine was adopted with many fanciful improvements by Carpocrates, Basilides and Valentine [15] the heretics of the Egyptian school. In their eyes Jesus of Nazareth was a mere mortal the legitimate son of Joseph and Mary but he was the best and wisest of the human race, selected as the worthy instrument to restore upon earth the worship of the true and supreme Deity When he was baptised in the Jordan, the CHRIST, the first of the æons, the Son of God himself descended on Jesus in the form of a dove, to inhabit his mind and direct his actions during the allotted period of his ministry When the Messiah was delivered into the hands of the Jews the Christ, an immortal and impassible being forsook his earthly tabernacle flew back to the pleroma or world of spirits and left the solitary Jesus to suffer, to complain and to expire But the justice and generosity of such a desertion are strongly questionable and the fate of an innocent martyr, at first impelled, and at length abandoned by his divine companion, might provoke the pity and indignation of the profane. Their murmurs were variously silenced by the sectaries who espoused and modified the double system of Cerinthus It was alleged that when Jesus was nailed to the cross, he was endowed with a miraculous apathy of mind and body which rendered him insensible of his apparent sufferings It was affirmed that these momentary though real pangs, would be abundantly repaid by the temporal reign of a thousand years reserved for the Messiah in his kingdom of the new Jerusalem It was insinuated that if he suffered he deserved to suffer that human nature is never absolutely perfect and that the cross and passion might serve to expiate the venial transgressions of the son of Joseph before his mysterious union with the Son of God [16]

IV All those who believe the immateriality of the soul a specious and noble tenet must confess from their present experience the incomprehensible union of mind and matter A similar union is not inconsistent with a much higher or even with the highest degree of mental faculties and the incarnation of an æon or archangel the most perfect of created spirits, does not involve any positive contradiction or absurdity In the age of religious freedom, which was determined by the council of Nice the dignity of Christ was measured by private judgment according to the indefinite rule of

Scripture or reason or tradition But when his pure and proper divinity had been establ shed on the ruins of Arianism the faith of the Catholics trembled on the edge of a precipice where it was impossible to recede dangerous to stand dreadful to fall and the manifold inconveniences of their creed were aggravated by the sublime character of their theology They hesitated to pronounce—that God himself the second person of an equal and consubstantial trinity was manifested in the flesh[17] that a being who pervades the universe had been confined in the womb of Mary that his eternal duration had been marked by the days, and months and years of human existence that the Almighty had been scourg d and crucified that his impassible essence had felt pain and anguish that his omniscience was not exempt from ignorance and that the source of life and immortality expired on Mount Calvary These alarming consequences were affirmed with unblushing simplicity by Apollinaris[18] bishop of Laodicea and one of the luminaries of the church. The son of a learned grammarian he was skilled in all the sciences of Greece eloquence erudition and philosophy conspicuous in the volumes of Apollinaris were humbly devoted to the service of religion. The worthy friend of Athanasius the worthy antagonist of Julian he bravely wrestled with the Arians and Polytheists and though he affected the rigour of geometrical demonstration his commentaries revealed the literal and allegorical sense of the Scriptures A mystery which had long floated in the looseness of popular belief was defined by his perverse diligence in a technical form and he first proclaimed the memorable words One incarnate nature of Christ which are still re-echoed with hostile clamours in the churches of Asia Egypt and Æthiopia. He taught that the Godhead was united or mingled with the body of a man and that the Logos the eternal wisdom supplied in the flesh the place and office of a human soul Yet as the profound doctor had been terrified at his own rashness Apollinaris was heard to mutter some faint accents of excuse and explanation. He acquiesced in the old distinction of the Greek philosophers between the rational and sensitive soul of man that he might reserve the Logos for intellectual functions and employ the subordinate human principle in the meaner actions of animal life With the moderate Docetes he revered Mary as the spiritual rather than as the carnal mother of Christ, whose body either came from heaven impassible and incorruptible or was absorbed and as it were transformed into the essence of the Deity The system of Apollinaris was strenuously encountered by the Asiatic and Syrian divines whose schools are honoured by the names of Basil Gregory and Chrysostom and tainted by those of Diodorus Theodore and Nestorius But the person of the aged bishop of Laodicea his character and dignity remained inviolate and his rivals since we may not suspect them of the weakness of toleration were astonished perhaps by the novelty of the argument and diffident of the final sentence of the Catholic church. Her judgment at length inclined in their favour the heresy of Apollinaris was condemned and the separate congregations of his disciples were proscribed by the Imperial laws. But his principles were secretly entertained in the monasteries of Egypt, and his enemies felt the hatred of Theophilus and Cyril the successive patriarchs of Alexandria.

V The grovelling Ebionite and the fantastic Docete were rejected and forgotten the recent zeal against the errors of Apollinaris reduced the Catholics to a seeming agreement with the double nature of Cerinthus. But instead of a temporary and occasional alliance they established and we still embrace the substantial indissoluble and everlasting union of a perfect God with a perfect man of the second person of the trinity with a reasonable soul and human flesh. In the beginning of the fifth century the unity of the two natures was the prevailing doctrine of the church. On all sides it was confessed that the mode of their co-existence could neither be represented by our ideas nor expressed by our language Yet a secret and incurable discord was cherished between those who were most apprehensive of confounding and those who were most fearful of separating the divinity and the humanity of Christ Impelled by religious frenzy they fled with adverse haste from the error which they mutually deemed most destructive of truth and salvation. On either hand they were anxious to guard they were jealous to defend, the union and the distinction of the two natures and to invent such forms of speech, such symbols of doctrine, as were least susceptible of doubt or ambiguity The poverty of ideas and language tempted them to ransack art and nature for every possible comparison, and each comparison misled their fancy in the explanation of an incomparable mystery In the polemic microscope an atom is enlarged to a monster and each party was skilful to exaggerate the absurd or impious conclusions that might be extorted from the prin ciples of their adversaries To escape from each other they wandered through many a dark and devious thicket, till they were astonished by the horrid phantoms of Cerinthus and Apollinaris, who guarded the opposite issues of the theological labyrinth As soon as they beheld the twilight of sense and heresy they started measured back their steps and were again involved in the gloom of impenetrable orthodoxy To purge themselves from the guilt or reproach of damnable error they disavowed their consequences explained their principles excused their indiscretions, and unanimously pronounced the sounds of concord and faith Yet a latent and almost invisible spark still lurked among the embers of controversy by the breath of prejudice and passion it was quickly kindled to a mighty flame and the verbal disputes[19] of the Oriental sects have shaken the pillars of the church and state

The name of CYRIL of Alexandria is famous in controversial story and the title of saint is a mark that his opinions and his party have finally prevailed In the house of his uncle the archbishop Theophilus he imbibed the orthodox lessons of zeal and dominion and five years of his youth were profitably spent in the adjacent monasteries of Nitria Under the tuition of the abbot Serapion he applied himself to ecclesiastical studies with such indefatigable ardour, that in the course of one sleepless night he has perused the four gospels the catholic epistles and the epistle to the Romans Origen he detested but the writings of Clemens and Dionysius of Athanasius and Basil were continually in his hands by the theory and practice of dispute his faith was confirmed and his wit was sharpened, he extended round his cell the cobwebs of scholastic theology and meditated the works of allegory and metaphysics whose remains, in seven verbose folios, now peaceably slumber by the side of their rivals[20] Cyril prayed and fasted in the desert but his thoughts (it is the reproach of a friend[21]) were still fixed on the world, and the call of Theophilus who summoned him to the tumult of cities and synods was too readily obeyed by the aspiring hermit With the approbation of his uncle he assumed the office and acquired the fame of a popular preacher His comely person adorned the pulpit the harmony of his voice resounded in the cathedral his friends were stationed to lead or second the applause of the congregation [22] and the hasty notes of the scribes preserved his discourses, which in their effect though not in their composition, might be compared with those of the Athenian orators The death of Theophilus expanded and realised the hopes of his nephew The clergy of Alexandria was divided, the soldiers and their general supported the claims of the archdeacon but a resistless multitude, with voices and with hands, asserted the cause of their favourite and after a period of thirty nine years Cyril was seated on the throne of Athanasius[23]

The prize was not unworthy of his ambition At a distance from the court, and at the head of an immense capital, the patriarch as he was now styled, of Alexandria had gradually usurped the state and authority of a civil magistrate The public and private charities of the city were managed by his discretion his voice inflamed or appeased the passions of the multitude his commands were blindly obeyed by his numerous and fanatic parabolani,[24] familiarised in their daily office with scenes of death and the præfects of Egypt were awed or provoked by the temporal power of these Christian pontiffs Ardent in the prosecution of heresy, Cyril auspiciously opened his reign by oppressing the Novatians the most innocent and harmless of the sectaries The interdiction of their religious worship appeared in his eyes a just and meritorious act and he confiscated their holy vessels, without apprehending the guilt of sacrilege The toleration and even the privileges of the Jews who had multiplied to the number of forty thousand were secured by the laws of the Cæsars and Ptolemies and a long prescription of seven hundred years since the foundation of Alexandria Without any legal sentence, without any royal mandate, the patriarch at the dawn of day led a seditious multitude to the attack of the synagogues Unarmed and unprepared the Jews were incapable of resistance their houses of prayer were levelled with the ground, and the episcopal warrior after rewarding his troops with the plunder of their goods expelled from the city the remnant of the unbelieving nation Perhaps he might plead the insolence of their prosperity and their deadly hatred of the Christians whose blood they had recently shed in a malicious or accidental tumult Such crimes would have deserved the animadversion of the magistrate, but in this promiscuous outrage the innocent were confounded with the guilty and Alexandria was impoverished by the loss of a wealthy and industrious colony The zeal of Cyril exposed him to the penalties of the Julian law, but in a feeble government and a superstitious age he was secure of impunity and even of praise Orestes complained but his just com plaints were too quickly forgotten by the min is ers of Theodos us, and too d eply remem bered by a priest who affected to pa don and continued to ha e the praefect of Egypt As he passed through the streets his chariot was assaulted by a band of five hundred of the Nitrian monks his guards fled from the wild beasts of the desert his protestations that he was a Chris t an and a Catholic were answered by a volley of stones and the face of Orestes was covered with blood The loyal citizens of Alexandria hastened to his rescue he instantly satisfied his jus ice and revenge against the monk by whose hand he had been wounded and Ammonius expi ed under the rod of the lictor At the com mand of Cyril his body was raised from the ground and transported in solemn procession to the cathedral the name of Ammonius was cha ged to that of Thaumasius the wonderful his tomb was decorated with the trophies of martyrdom and the pa triarch ascended the pulpit to celebrate th magnanimity of an assassin and a rebel Such honours might incite the faithful to combat and die under the banners of the saint and he soon prompted or accepted, the sacrifice of a virgin who professed the re ligion of the Greeks and cultivated the friend ship of Orestes Hypatia the daughter of Th on the mathematician [35] was initiated in her fath er s studies her learned comments have eluci dated the geometry of Apollonius and Diophan tus and she publicly taught both at Athens and Alexandria the philosophy of Plato and Aristotle In the bloom of beauty and in the maturity of wisdom the modest maid refused her lo ers and instructed her disciples the per sons most illustri us for their rank or merit were impatient to visit the female philosopher and Cyril beheld with a jealous eye the gorgeous train of horses and laves who cro vded the door of her academy A rumour was spread among the Christians that the daughter of Theon was the only obstacle to the reconciliation of the praefect and the archbishop and that obstacl was speedily removed On a fatal day in the holy season of Lent Hypatia was torn from her chariot stripped naked dragged to the church, and inhumanly butchered by the hands of Peter the reader and a troop of savage and merciless fanatics her flesh was scraped from her bones with sharp oyster shells [36] and her quivering limbs were delivered to the flames The just progress of inquiry and punishment was stopped by seasonable gifts but the mur der of Hypatia has imprinted an indelible stain on the character and religion of Cyril of Alex andria.[37]

Superstition perhaps, would more gently ex piate the blood of a virgin than the banishment of a saint and Cyril had accompanied his uncle to the iniquitous synod of the Oak When the memory of Chrysostom was restored and conse crated the nephew of Theophilus, at the head of a dying faction still maintained the justice of his sentence nor was it till after a tedious delay and an obstinate resistance that he yielded to the consent of the Catholic world [38] His enmity to the Byzantine pontiffs[39] was a *sense of inter*est, not a sally of passion he envied their fortu nate sta ion in the sunshine of the Imperial court and he dreaded their upstart ambition which oppressed the metropolitans of Europe and Asia invaded the provinces of Antioch and Alexandria, and measured their diocese by the limits of the empire The long moderation of Atticus, the mild usurper of the throne of Chrysostom suspended the animosities of the Eastern patriarchs but Cyril was at length awakened by the exaltation of a rival more worthy of his esteem and hatred After the short and troubl d reign of Sisinnius bishop of Con stan inople the factions of the clergy and people were appeased by the choice of the emperor who on this occasion consulted the voice of fame and invited the merit of a stranger Nesto- rius [40] a native of Germanicia and a monk of Antioch was recommended by the austerity of his life and the eloquence of his sermons but the first homily which he preached before the de vout Theodosius betrayed the acrimony and impatience of his zeal Give me O Caesar! he exclaimed give me the earth purged of heretics and I will give you in exchange the kingdom of heaven Exterminate with me the heretics and with you I will exterminate the Persians On the fifth day as if the treaty had been already signed the patriarch of Constanti nople discovered surprised and attacked a se cret conventicle of the Arians they preferred death to submission the flames that were kin dled by their desp ir soon spread to the neigh bouring houses, and the triumph of Nestorius was clouded by the name of incendiary On either s de of the Hellespont his episcopal vigour im posed a rigid formulary of faith and discipline— a chronological error concerning the festival of Easter was punished as an offence against the church and state Lydia and Caria Sardes and Miletus were purified with the blood of the obstinate Quartodecimans and the edict of the emperor or rather of the patriarch enumerates three and twenty degrees and denominations in the guilt and punishment of heresy [31] But the sword of persecution which Nestorius so furious ly wielded was soon turned against his own breast Religion was the pretence but in the judgment of a contemporary saint, ambition was the genuine motive of episcopal warfare [2]

In the Syrian school Nestorius had been taught to abhor the confusion of the two natures and nicely to discriminate the humanity of his master Christ from the divinity of the Lord Jesus [33] The Blessed Virgin he revered as the mother of Christ but his ears were offended with the rash and recent title of mother of God [34] which had been insensibly adopted since the origin of the Arian controversy From the pulpit of Constantinople a friend of the patriarch and afterwards the patriarch him self repeatedly preached against the use or the abuse of a word[35] unknown to the apostles un authorised by the church and which could only tend to alarm the timorous to mislead the sim ple to amuse the profane, and to justify by a seeming resemblance, the old genealogy of Olympus [36] In his calmer moments Nestorius confessed that it might be tolerated or excused by the union of the two natures, and the com munication of their idioms [37] but he was exas perated by contradiction to disclaim the worship of a new born an infant Deity, to draw his inadequate similes from the conjugal or civil partnerships of life and to describe the man hood of Christ as the robe the instrument the tabernacle of his Godhead At these blasphe mous sounds the pillars of the sanctuary were shaken The unsuccessful competitors of Nestorius indulged their pious or personal resent ment the Byzantine clergy was secretly dis pleased with the intrusion of a stranger what ever is superstitious or absurd might claim the protection of the monks and the people was interested in the glory of their virgin patroness [38] The sermons of the archbishop and the service of the altar were disturbed by seditious clam our his authority and doctrine were renounced by separate congregations every wind scat tered round the empire the leaves of controversy, and the voice of the combatants on a sonorous theatre re-echoed in the cells of Pales tine and Egypt It was the duty of Cyril to en lighten the zeal and ignorance of his innumera ble monks in the school of Alexandria he had imbibed and professed the incarnation of one nature and the successor of Athanasius con sulted his pride and ambition when he rose in arms against another Arius, more formidable and more guilty on the second throne of the hierarchy After a short correspondence in which the rival prelates disguised their hatred in the hollow language of respect and charity the patriarch of Alexandria denounced to the prince and people to the East and to the West, the damnable errors of the Byzantine pontiff From the East more especially from Antioch, he obtained the ambiguous counsels of tolera tion and silence, which were addressed to both parties while they favoured the cause of Nestorius But the Vatican received with open arms the messengers of Egypt. The vanity of Celes tine was flattered by the appeal, and the partial version of a monk decided the faith of the pope who, with his Latin clergy was ignorant of the language the arts, and the theology of the Greeks At the head of an Italian synod Celestine weighed the merits of the cause approved the creed of Cyril condemned the sentiments and person of Nestorius, degraded the heretic from his episcopal dignity, allowed a respite of ten days for recantation and penance, and delegated to his enemy the execution of this rash and illegal sentence But the patriarch of Alex andria whilst he darted the thunders of a god exposed the errors and passions of a mortal and his twelve anathemas[39] still torture the orthodox slaves who adore the memory of a saint without forfeiting their allegiance to the synod of Chalcedon These bold assertions are indelibly tinged with the colours of the Apolli narian heresy but the serious and perhaps the sincere professions of Nestorius have satisfied the wiser and less partial theologians of the present times [40]

Yet neither the emperor nor the primate of the East were disposed to obey the mandate of an Italian priest and a synod of the Catholic, or rather of the Greek church was unanimously demanded as the sole remedy that could appease or decide this ecclesiastical quarrel [41] Ephesus on all sides accessible by sea and land, was chosen for the place, the festival of Pente cost for the day of the meeting, a writ of sum mons was despatched to each metropolitan and a guard was stationed to protect and con fine the fathers till they should settle the mysteries of heaven and the faith of the earth. Nestorius appeared not as a criminal but as a judge he depended on the weight rather than the number of his prelates and his sturdy slaves from the baths of Zeuxippus were armed for every service of injury or defence But his ad versary Cyril was more powerful in the weapons both of the flesh and of the spirit Disobedi

ent to the letter or at least to the meaning of the royal summons, he was attended by fifty Egyptian bishops who expected from their patriarch's nod the inspiration of the Holy Ghost. He had contracted an intimate alliance with Memnon bishop of Ephesus The despotic primate of Asia disposed of the ready succours of thirty or forty episcopal votes a crowd of peasants the slaves of the church was poured into the city to support with blows and clamours a metaphysical argument and the people zealously asserted the honour of the Virgin whose body reposed within the walls of Ephesus.[42] The fleet which had transported Cyril from Alexandria was laden with the riches of Egypt and he disembarked a numerous body of mariners slaves and fanatics enlisted with blind obedience under the banner of St Mark and the mother of God. The fathers, and even the guards of the council were awed by this martial array the adversaries of Cyril and Mary were insulted in the streets or threatened in their houses his eloquence and liberality made a daily increase in the number of his adherents and the Egyptian soon computed that he might command the attendance and the voices of two hundred bishops [43] But the author of the twelve anathemas foresaw and dreaded the opposition of John of Antioch who with a small though respectable train of metropolitans and divines was advancing by slow journeys from the distant capital of the East Impatient of a delay which he stigmatised as voluntary and culpable [44] Cyril announced the opening of the synod sixteen days after the festival of Pentecost Nestorius, who depended on the near approach of his Eastern friends persisted like his predecessor Chrysostom to disclaim the jurisdiction and to disobey the summons of his enemies they hastened his trial and his accuser presided in the seat of judgment Sixty-eight bishops twenty two of metropolitan rank defended his cause by a modest and temperate protest they were excluded from the councils of their brethren. Candidian in the emperor's name requested a delay of four days the profane magistrate was driven with outrage and insult from the assembly of the saints The whole of this momentous transaction was crowded into the compass of a summer's day the bishops delivered their separate opinions but the uniformity of style reveals the influence or the hand of a master who has been accused of corrupting the public evidence of their acts and subscriptions [45] Without a dissenting voice they recognised in the epistles of Cyril the Nicene creed and the doctrine of the fathers but the partial extracts from the letters and homilies of Nestorius were interrupted by curses and anathemas and the heretic was degraded from his episcopal and ecclesiastical dignity The sentence maliciously inscribed to the new Judas was affixed and proclaimed in the streets of Ephesus the weary prelates as they issued from the church of the mother of God were saluted as her champions and her victory was celebrated by the illuminations the songs and the tumult of the night

On the fifth day the triumph was clouded by the arrival and indignation of the Eastern bishops In a chamber of the inn before he had wiped the dust from his shoes, John of Antioch gave audience to Candidian the Imperial minister who related his ineffectual efforts to prevent or to annul the hasty violence of the Egyptian With equal haste and violence the Oriental synod of fifty bishops degraded Cyril and Memnon from their episcopal honours condemned in the twelve anathemas the purest venom of the Apollinarian heresy and described the Alexandrian primate as a monster born and educated for the destruction of the church [46] His throne was distant and inaccessible but they instantly resolved to bestow on the flock of Ephesus the blessing of a faithful shepherd By the vigilance of Memnon the churches were shut against them and a strong garrison was thrown into the cathedral The troops under the command of Candidian advanced to the assault the outguards were routed and put to the sword but the place was impregnable the besiegers retired their retreat was pursued by a vigorous sally they lost their horses and many of the soldiers were dangerously wounded with clubs and stones Ephesus, the city of the Virgin was defiled with rage and clamour with sedition and blood the rival synods darted anathemas and excommunications from their spiritual engines and the court of Theodosius was perplexed by the adverse and contradictory narratives of the Syrian and Egyptian factions. During a busy period of three months the emperor tried every method except the most effectual means of indifference and contempt to reconcile this theological quarrel He attempted to remove or intimidate the leaders by a common sentence of acquittal or condemnation he invested his representatives at Ephesus with ample power and military force he summoned from either party eight chosen deputies to a free and candid conference in the neighbourhood of the capital far from the contagion of popular frenzy But the Orientals refused to yield and the Catholics proud of their numbers and of their Latin allies rejected all terms of union or toleration The patience of the meek Theodosius was provoked and he dissolved in anger this episcopal tumult which at the distance of thirteen centuries assumes the venerable aspect of the third œcumenical council [47] God is my witness ' said the pious prince that I am not the author of this confusion His providence will discern and punish the guilty Return to your provinces and may your private virtues repair the mischief and scandal of your meeting ' They returned to their provinces but the same passions which had distracted the synod of Ephesus were diffused over the Eastern world After three obstinate and equal campaigns, John of Antioch and Cyril of Alexandria condescended to explain and embrace but their seeming re union must be imputed rather to prudence than to reason to the mutual lassitude rather than to the Christian charity of the patriarchs

The Byzantine pontiff had instilled into the royal ear a baleful prejudice against the character and conduct of his Egyptian rival An epistle of menace and invective [48] which accompanied the summons accused him as a busy insolent and envious priest who perplexed the simplicity of the faith violated the peace of the church and state and by his artful and separate addresses to the wife and sister of Theodosius presumed to suppose or to scatter the seeds of discord in the Imperial family At the stern command of his sovereign Cyril had repaired to Ephesus, where he was resisted threatened and confined by the magistrates in the interest of Nestorius and the Orientals who assembled the troops of Lydia and Ionia to suppress the fanatic and disorderly train of the patriarch Without expecting the royal licence he escaped from his guards precipitately embarked deserted the imperfect synod and retired to his episcopal fortress of safety and independence But his artful emissaries both in the court and city, successfully laboured to appease the resentment and to conciliate the favour of the emperor The feeble son of Arcadius was alternately swayed by his wife and sister by the eunuchs and women of the palace superstition and avarice were their ruling passions and the orthodox chiefs were assiduous in their endeavours to alarm the former and to gratify the latter Constantinople and the suburbs were sanctified with frequent monasteries, and the holy abbots Dalmatius and Eutyches [49] had devoted their zeal and fidelity to the cause of Cyril, the worship of Mary and the unity of Christ From the first moment of their monastic life they had never mingled with the world or trod the profane ground of the city But in this awful moment of the danger of the church, their vow was superseded by a more sublime and indispensable duty At the head of a long order of monks and hermits who carried burning tapers in their hands and chanted litanies to the mother of God they proceeded from their monasteries to the palace The people was edified and inflamed by this extraordinary spectacle and the trembling monarch listened to the prayers and adjurations of the saints who boldly pronounced that none could hope for salvation unless they embraced the person and the creed of the orthodox successor of Athanasius. At the same time every avenue of the throne was assaulted with gold Under the decent names of eulogies and benedictions the courtiers of both sexes were bribed according to the measure of their power and rapaciousness But their incessant demands despoiled the sanctuaries of Constantinople and Alexandria and the authority of the patriarch was unable to silence the just murmur of his clergy that a debt of sixty thousand pounds had already been contracted to support the expense of this scandalous corruption [50] Pulcheria, who relieved her brother from the weight of an empire was the firmest pillar of orthodoxy and so intimate was the alliance between the thunders of the synod and the whispers of the court that Cyril was assured of success if he could displace one eunuch and substitute another in the favour of Theodosius Yet the Egyptian could not boast of a glorious or decisive victory The emperor, with unaccustomed firmness adhered to his promise of protecting the innocence of the Oriental bishops and Cyril softened his anathemas and confessed with ambiguity and reluctance a twofold nature of Christ before he was permitted to satiate his revenge against the unfortunate Nestorius [51]

The rash and obstinate Nestorius before the end of the synod was oppressed by Cyril betrayed by the court and faintly supported by his Eastern friends A sentiment of fear or indignation prompted him while it was yet time to affect the glory of a voluntary abdication [52] his wish or at least his request was readily granted he was conducted with honour from Ephesus to his old monastery of Antioch and after a short pause his successors Maximian and Proclus, were acknowledged as the lawful bishops of Constantinople But in the silence of his cell the degraded patriarch could no longer resume the innocence and security of a private monk. The past he regretted he was discontented with the present and the future he had reason to dread the Oriental bishops successively disengaged their cause from his unpopular name and each day decreased the number of the schismatics who revered Nestorius as the confessor of the faith After a residence at Antioch of four years the hand of Theodosius subscribed an edict[33] which ranked him with Simon the magician proscribed his opinions and followers, condemned his writings to the flames and banished his person first to Petra in Arabia, and at length to Oasis, one of the islands of the Libyan desert [34] Secluded from the church and from the world the exile was still pursued by the rage of bigotry and war A wandering tribe of the Blemmyes or Nubians invaded his solitary prison in their retreat they dismissed a crowd of useless captives but no sooner had Nestorius reached the banks of the Nile than he would gladly have escaped from a Roman and orthodox city to the milder servitude of the savages. His flight was punished as a new crime the soul of the patriarch inspired the civil and ecclesiastical powers of Egypt the magistrates the soldiers, the monks devoutly tortured the enemy of Christ and St Cyril and as far as the confines of Æthiopia, the heretic was alternately dragged and recalled till his aged body was broken by the hardships and accidents of these reiterated journeys Yet his mind was still independent and erect the president of Thebais was awed by his pastoral letters he survived the Catholic tyrant of Alexandria and after sixteen years banishment the synod of Chalcedon would perhaps have restored him to the honours or at least to the communion of the church The death of Nestorius prevented his obedience to their welcome summons [35] and his disease might afford some colour to the scandalous report, that his tongue the organ of blasphemy had been eaten by the worms. He was buried in a city of Upper Egypt known by the names of Chemmis or Panopolis or Akmim [36] but the immortal malice of the Jacobites has persevered for ages to cast stones against his sepulchre and to propagate the foolish tradition that it was never watered by the rain of heaven which equally descends on the righteous and the ungodly [37] Humanity may drop a tear on the fate of Nestorius yet justice must observe that he suffered the persecution which he had approved and inflicted [38]

The death of the Alexandrian primate after a reign of thirty two years abandoned the Catholics to the intemperance of zeal and the abuse of victory [39] The monophysite doctrine (one incarnate nature) was rigorously preached in the churches of Egypt and the monasteries of the East the primitive creed of Apollinaris was protected by the sanctity of Cyril and the name of Eutyches, his venerable friend has been applied to the sect most adverse to the Syrian heresy of Nestorius His rival Eutyches was the abbot or archimandrite or superior of three hundred monks but the opinions of a simple and illiterate recluse might have expired in a cell where he had slept above seventy years if the resentment or indiscretion of Flavian the Byzantine pontiff, had not exposed the scandal to the eyes of the Christian world His domestic synod was instantly convened their proceedings were sullied with clamour and artifice and the aged heretic was surprised into a seeming confession that Christ had not derived his body from the substance of the Virgin Mary From their partial decree Eutyches appealed to a general council and his cause was vigorously asserted by his godson Chrysaphius the reigning eunuch of the palace and his accomplice Dioscorus, who had succeeded to the throne the creed the talents and the vices of the nephew of Theophilus By the special summons of Theodosius the second synod of Ephesus was judiciously composed of ten metropolitans and ten bishops from each of the six dioceses of the Eastern empire some exceptions of favour or merit enlarged the number to one hundred and thirty five and the Syrian Barsumas as the chief and representative of the monks was invited to sit and vote with the successors of the apostles But the despotism of the Alexandrian patriarch again oppressed the freedom of debate the same spiritual and carnal weapons were again drawn from the arsenals of Egypt the Asiatic veterans a band of archers served under the orders of Dioscorus and the more formidable monks whose minds were inaccessible to reason or mercy besieged the doors of the cathedral The general and as it should seem, the unconstrained voice of the fathers accepted the faith and even the anathemas of Cyril and the heresy of the two natures was formally condemned in the persons and writings of the most learned Orientals ' May those who divide Christ be divided with the sword may they be hewn in pieces may they be burned alive' were the charitable wishes of a Christian synod.[40] The innocence and sanctity of Euty

ches were acknowledged without hesitation but the prelates more especially those of Thrace and Asia, were unwilling to depose their patriarch for the use or even the abuse of his lawful jurisdiction They embraced the knees of Dioscorus as he stood with a threatening aspect on the footstool of his throne and conjured him to forgive the offences and to respect the dignity of his brother Do you mean to raise a sedition? exclaimed the relentless tyrant ' Where are the officers?" At these words a furious multitude of monks and soldiers with stakes and swords and chains, burst into the church the trembling bishops hid themselves behind the altar or under the benches and as they were not inspired with the zeal of martyrdom they successively subscribed a blank paper, which was afterwards filled with the condemnation of *the Byzantine pontiff Flavian was instantly de*livered to the wild beasts of this spiritual amphitheatre the monks were stimulated by the voice and example of Barsumas to avenge the injuries of Christ it is said that the patriarch of Alexandria reviled and buffeted, and kicked and trampled his brother of Constantinople [61] it is certain that the victim, before he could reach the place of his exile expired on the third day of the wounds and bruises which he had received at Ephesus This second synod has been justly branded as a gang of robbers and assassins yet the accusers of Dioscorus would magnify his violence to alleviate the cowardice and inconstancy of their own behaviour

The faith of Egypt had prevailed but the vanquished party was supported by the same pope who encountered without fear the hostile rage of Attila and Genseric The theology of Leo his famous tome or epistle on the mystery of the incarnation had been disregarded by the synod of Ephesus his authority and that of the Latin church was insulted in his legates who escaped from slavery and death to relate the melancholy tale of the tyranny of Dioscorus and the martyrdom of Flavian His provincial synod annulled the irregular proceedings of Ephesus but as this step was itself irregular, he solicited the convocation of a general council in the free and orthodox provinces of Italy From his independent throne the Roman bishop spoke and acted without danger as the head of the Christians and his dictates were obsequiously transcribed by Placidia and her son Valentinian, who addressed their Eastern colleague to restore the peace and unity of the church But the pageant of Oriental royalty was moved with equal dexterity by the hand of the eunuch and Theodosius could pronounce, without hesitation, that the church was already peaceful and triumphant and that the recent flame had been extinguished by the just punishment of the Nestorians Perhaps the Greeks would be still in*volved in the heresy of the Monophysites, if the* emperor's horse had not fortunately stumbled Theodosius expired his orthodox sister Pulcheria, with a nominal husband succeeded to the throne Chrysaphius was burnt Dioscorus was disgraced the exiles were recalled, and the tome of Leo was subscribed by the Oriental bishops Yet the pope was disappointed in his favourite project of a Latin council he disdained to preside in the Greek synod which was speedily assembled at Nice in Bithynia his legates required in a peremptory tone the presence of the emperor and the weary fathers were transport*ed to Chalcedon under the immediate eye of* Marcian and the senate of Constantinople A quarter of a mile from the Thracian Bosphorus the church of St Euphemia was built on the summit of a gentle though lofty ascent the triple structure was celebrated as a prodigy of art, and the boundless prospect of the land and sea might have raised the mind of a sectary to the contemplation of the God of the universe. Six hundred and thirty bishops were ranged in order in the nave of the church, but the patriarchs of the East were preceded by the legates, of whom the third was a simple priest and the place of honour was reserved for twenty laymen of consular or senatorian rank The gospel was ostentatiously displayed in the centre but the rule of faith was defined by the papal and imperial ministers who moderated the thirteen sessions of the council of Chalcedon [62] Their partial interposition silenced the intemperate shouts and execrations which degraded the episcopal gravity but on the formal accusation of the legates Dioscorus was compelled to descend from his throne to the rank of a criminal already condemned in the opinion of his judges The Orientals less adverse to Nestorius than to Cyril accepted the Romans as their deliverers Thrace and Pontus, and Asia were exasperated against the murderer of Flavian and the new patriarchs of Constantinople and Antioch secured their places by the sacrifice of their benefactor The bishops of Palestine Macedonia and Greece were attached to the faith of Cyril but in the face of the synod in the heat of the battle the leaders with their obsequious train passed from the right to the left wing and decided the victory by this seasonable desertion Of the seventeen suffragans who sailed from

Alexandria four were tempted from their allegiance, and the thirteen falling prostrate on the ground implored the mercy of the council with sighs and tears and a pathetic declaration, that if they yielded they should be massacred on their return to Egypt, by the indignant people A tardy repentance was allowed to expiate the guilt or error of the accomplices of Dioscorus but their sins were accumulated on his head he neither asked nor hoped for pardon and the moderation of those who pleaded for a general amnesty was drowned in the prevailing cry of victory and revenge. To save the reputation of his late adherents some personal offences were skilfully detected his rash and illegal excommunication of the pope and his contumacious refusal (while he was detained a prisoner) to attend the summons of the synod Witnesses were introduced to prove the special facts of his pride avarice, and cruelty and the fathers heard with abhorrence that the alms of the church were lavished on the female dancers that his palace and even his bath was open to the prostitutes of Alexandria and that the infamous Pansophia or Irene was publicly entertained as the concubine of the patriarch.[61]

For these scandalous offences Dioscorus was deposed by the synod and banished by the emperor but the purity of his faith was declared in the presence, and with the tacit approbation of the fathers Their prudence supposed rather than pronounced the heresy of Eutyches who was never summoned before their tribunal and they sat silent and abashed when a bold Monophysite casting at their feet a volume of Cyril challenged them to anathematise in his person the doctrine of the saint If we fairly peruse the acts of Chalcedon as they are recorded by the orthodox party [62] we shall find that a great majority of the bishops embraced the simple unity of Christ and the ambiguous concession that he was formed OF or FROM two natures might imply either their previous existence or their subsequent confusion or some dangerous interval between the conception of the man and the assumption of the God The Roman theology more positive and precise adopted the term most offensive to the ears of the Egyptians, that Christ existed IN two natures and this momentous particle[63] (which the memory rather than the understanding must retain) had almost produced a schism among the Catholic bishops. The tome of Leo had been respectfully perhaps sincerely subscribed but they protested in two successive debates that it was neither expedient nor lawful to transgress the sacred landmarks which had been fixed at Nice Constantinople, and Ephesus according to the rule of Scripture and tradition At length they yielded to the importunities of their masters but their infallible decree after it had been ratified with deliberate votes and vehement acclamations was overturned in the next session by the opposition of the legates and their Oriental friends It was in vain that a multitude of episcopal voices repeated in chorus The definition of the fathers is orthodox and immutable! The heretics are now discovered! Anathema to the Nestorians! Let them depart from the synod! Let them repair to Rome [64] The legates threatened the emperor was absolute and a committee of eighteen bishops prepared a new decree which was imposed on the reluctant assembly In the name of the fourth general council the Christ in one person, but in two natures was announced to the Catholic world an invisible line was drawn between the heresy of Apollinaris and the faith of St Cyril and the road to paradise a bridge as sharp as a razor was suspended over the abyss by the master hand of the theological artist During ten centuries of blindness and servitude Europe received her religious opinions from the oracle of the Vatican and the same doctrine already varnished with the rust of antiquity was admitted without dispute into the creed of the reformers who disclaimed the supremacy of the Roman pontiff The synod of Chalcedon still triumphs in the Protestant churches but the ferment of controversy has subsided and the most pious Christians of the present day are ignorant or careless, of their own belief concerning the mystery of the incarnation

Far different was the temper of the Greeks and Egyptians under the orthodox reigns of Leo and Marcian. Those pious emperors enforced with arms and edicts the symbol of their faith [67] and it was declared by the conscience or honour of five hundred bishops that the decrees of the synod of Chalcedon might be lawfully supported even with blood The Catholics observed with satisfaction that the same synod was odious both to the Nestorians and the Monophysites [68] but the Nestorians were less angry or less powerful and the East was distracted by the obstinate and sanguinary zeal of the Monophysites. Jerusalem was occupied by an army of monks in the name of the one incarnate nature, they pillaged they burnt they murdered the sepulchre of Christ was defiled with blood and the gates of the city were guarded in tumultuous rebellion against the troops of the emperor

After the disgrace and exile of Dioscorus the Egyptians still regretted their spiritual father, and detested the usurpation of his successor who was introduced by the fathers of Chalcedon The throne of Proterius was supported by a guard of two thousand soldiers he waged a five years war against the people of Alexandria and on the first intelligence of the death of Marcian he became the victim of their zeal On the third day before the festival of Easter the patriarch was besieged in the cathedral, and murdered in the baptistery The remains of his mangled corpse were delivered to the flames and his ashes to the wind and the deed was inspired by the vision of a pretended angel an ambitious monk who under the name of Timothy the Cat,[69] succeeded to the place and opinions of Dioscorus This deadly superstition was inflamed on either side by the principle and the practice of retaliation in the pursuit of a metaphysical quarrel many thousands[70] were slain and the Christians of every degree were deprived of the substantial enjoyments of social life and of the invisible gifts of baptism and the holy communion Perhaps an extravagant fable of the times may conceal an allegorical picture of these fanatics who tortured each other and themselves ' Under the consulship of Venantius and Celer says a grave bishop 'the people of Alexandria and all Egypt were seized with a strange and diabolical frenzy great and small slaves and freedmen monks and clergy, the natives of the land who opposed the synod of Chalcedon lost their speech and reason barked like dogs and tore with their own teeth the flesh from their hands and arms '[71]

The disorders of thirty years at length produced the famous HENOTICON[72] of the emperor Zeno which in his reign and in that of Anastasius was signed by all the bishops of the East, under the penalty of degradation and exile if they rejected or infringed this salutary and fundamental law The clergy may smile or groan at the presumption of a layman who defines the articles of faith yet if he stoops to the humiliating task his mind is less infected by prejudice or interest, and the authority of the magistrate can only be maintained by the concord of the people It is in ecclesiastical story that Zeno appears least contemptible and I am not able to discern any Manichæan or Eutychian guilt in the generous saying of Anastasius, That it was unworthy of an emperor to persecute the worshippers of Christ and the citizens of Rome The Henoticon was most pleasing to the Egyptians yet the smallest blemish has not been descried by the jealous and even jaundiced eyes of our orthodox schoolmen and it accurately represents the Catholic faith of the incarnation without adopting or disclaiming the peculiar terms or tenets of the hostile sects A solemn anathema is pronounced against Nestorius and Eutyches against all heretics by whom Christ is divided, or confounded or reduced to a phantom Without defining the number or the article of the word nature the pure system of St Cyril the faith of Nice Constantinople and Ephesus, is respectfully confirmed but instead of bowing at the name of the fourth council the subject is dismissed by the censure of all contrary doctrine , if any such have been taught either elsewhere or at Chalcedon Under this ambiguous expression the friends and the enemies of the last synod might unite in a silent embrace The most reasonable Christians acquiesced in this mode of toleration but their reason was feeble and inconstant, and their obedience was despised as timid and servile by the vehement spirit of their brethren On a subject which engrossed the thoughts and discourses of men it was difficult to preserve an exact neutrality a book a sermon a prayer rekindled the flame of controversy and the bonds of communion were alternately broken and renewed by the private animosity of the bishops The space between Nestorius and Eutyches was filled by a thousand shades of language and opinion the acephali[73] of Egypt and the Roman pontiffs, of equal valour though of unequal strength may be found at the two extremities of the theological scale The acephali without a king or bishop were separated above three hundred years from the patriarchs of Alexandria who had accepted the communion of Constantinople without exacting a formal condemnation of the synod of Chalcedon For accepting the communion of Alexandria without a formal approbation of the same synod the patriarchs of Constantinople were anathematised by the popes. Their inflexible despotism involved the most orthodox of the Greek churches in this spiritual contagion denied or doubted the validity of their sacraments [74] and fomented thirty five years the schism of the East and West till they finally abolished the memory of four Byzantine pontiffs who had dared to oppose the supremacy of St Peter [75] Before that period the precarious truce of Constantinople and Egypt had been violated by the zeal of the rival prelates Macedonius who was suspected of the Nestorian heresy asserted in disgrace and exile the synod of Chalcedon while the successor of Cyril would have purchased its overthrow with a bribe of two thousand pounds of gold

In the fever of the times the sense, or rather the sound of a syllable was sufficient to disturb the peace of an empire The TRISAGION[76] (thrice holy) Holy holy holy Lord God of Hosts! is supposed by the Greeks to be the identical hymn which the angels and cherubim eternally repeat before the throne of God and which, about the middle of the fifth century was miraculously revealed to the church of Constantinople The devotion of Antioch soon added who was crucified for us! and this grateful address either to Christ alone or to the whole Trinity may be justified by the rules of theology and has been gradually adopted by the Catholics of the East and West But it had been imagined by a Monophysite bishop [77] the gift of an enemy was at first rejected as a dire and dangerous blasphemy and the rash innovation had nearly cost the emperor Anastasius his throne and his life [78] The people of Constantinople was devoid of any rational principles of freedom but they held as a lawful cause of rebellion the colour of a livery in the races or the colour of a mystery in the schools The Trisagion with and without this obnoxious addition, was chanted in the cathedral by two adverse choirs and when their lungs were exhausted, they had recourse to the more solid arguments of sticks and stones the aggressors were punished by the emperor and defended by the patriarch and the crown and mitre were staked on the event of this momentous quarrel. The streets were instantly crowded with innumerable swarms of men women and children the legions of monks in regular array marched and shouted, and fought at their head Christian ! this is the day of martyrdom let us not desert our spiritual father anathema to the Manichæan tyrant ! he is unworthy to reign Such was the Catholic cry and the galleys of Anastasius lay upon their oars before the palace till the patriarch had pardoned his penitent, and hushed the waves of the troubled multitude. The triumph of Macedonius was checked by a speedy exile but the zeal of his flock was again exasperated by the same question Whether one of the Trinity had been crucified? On this momentous occasion the blue and green factions of Constantinople suspended their discord and the civil and military powers were annihilated in their presence The keys of the city and the standards of the guards were deposited in the forum of Constantine, the principal station and camp of the faithful. Day and night they were incessantly busied either in singing hymns to the honour of their God or in pillaging and murdering the servants of their prince The head of his favourite monk the friend as they styled him of the enemy of the Holy Trinity was borne aloft on a spear and the fire brands which had been darted against heretical structures diffused the undistinguishing flames over the most orthodox buildings The statues of the emperor were broken and his person was concealed in a suburb till at the end of three days he dared to implore the mercy of his subjects Without his diadem and in the posture of a suppliant Anastasius appeared on the throne of the circus The Catholics before his face rehearsed their genuine Trisagion they exulted in the offer which he proclaimed by the voice of a herald of abdicating the purple they listened to the admonition that since all could not reign they should previously agree in the choice of a sovereign and they accepted the blood of two unpopular ministers whom their master without hesitation condemned to the lions These furious but transient seditions were encouraged by the success of Vitalian who with an army of Huns and Bulgarians for the most part idolaters declared himself the champion of the Catholic faith In this pious rebellion he depopulated Thrace besieged Constantinople exterminated sixty five thousand of his fellow Christians till he obtained the recall of the bishops the satisfaction of the pope and the establishment of the council of Chalcedon an orthodox treaty reluctantly signed by the dying Anastasius and more faithfully performed by the uncle of Justinian And such was the event of the first of the religious wars which have been waged in the name and by the disciples of the God of Peace [79]

Justinian has been already seen in the various lights of a prince a conqueror and a lawgiver the theologian[80] still remains and it affords an unfavourable prejudice that his theology should form a very prominent feature of his portrait The sovereign sympathised with his subjects in their superstitious reverence for living and departed saints his Code and more especially his Novels confirm and enlarge the privileges of the clergy and in every dispute between a monk and a layman the partial judge was inclined to pronounce that truth and innocence and justice were always on the side of the church. In his public and private devotions the emperor was assiduous and exemplary his prayers vigils and fasts displayed the austere penance of a monk his fancy was amused by the hope or be lief of personal inspiration, he had secured the patronage of the Virgin and St Michael the archangel and his recovery from a dangerous disease was ascribed to the miraculous succour of the holy martyrs Cosmas and Damian The capital and the provinces of the East were decorated with the monuments of his religion [51] and though the far greater part of these costly structures may be attributed to his taste or ostentation, the zeal of the royal architect was probably quickened by a genuine sense of love and gratitude towards his invisible benefactors Among the titles of Imperial greatness the name of Pious was most pleasing to his ear to promote the temporal and spiritual interest of the church was the serious business of his life and the duty of father of his country was often sacrificed to that of defender of the faith The controversies of the times were congenial to his temper and understanding and the theological professors must inwardly deride the diligence of a stranger who cultivated their art and neglected his own

What can ye fear, said a bold conspirator to his associates, from your bigoted tyrant? Sleepless and unarmed he sits whole nights in his closet debating with reverend greybeards, and turning over the pages of ecclesiastical volumes [52] The fruits of these lucubrations were displayed in many a conference, where Justinian might shine as the loudest and most subtle of the disputants in many a sermon which under the name of edicts and epistles proclaimed to the empire the theology of their master While the barbarians invaded the provinces, while the victorious legions marched under the banners of Belisarius and Narses, the successor of Trajan unknown to the camp was content to vanquish at the head of a synod Had he invited to these synods a disinterested and rational spectator, Justinian might have learned that religious controversy is the offspring of arrogance and folly that true piety is most laudably expressed by silence and submission that man ignorant of his own nature should not presume to scrutinise the nature of his God and that it is sufficient for us to know that power and benevolence are the perfect attributes of the Deity [53]

Toleration was not the virtue of the times, and indulgence to rebels has seldom been the virtue of princes But when the prince descends to the narrow and peevish character of a disputant, he is easily provoked to supply the defect of argument by the plenitude of power and to chastise without mercy the perverse blindness of those who wilfully shut their eyes against the light of demonstration. The reign of Justinian was a uniform yet various scene of persecution and he appears to have surpassed his indolent predecessors, both in the contrivance of his laws and the rigour of their execution The insufficient term of three months was assigned for the conversion or exile of all heretics,[54] and if he still connived at their precarious stay, they were deprived under his iron yoke, not only of the benefits of society, but of the common birthright of men and Christians

At the end of four hundred years the Montanists of Phrygia[55] still breathed the wild enthusiasm of perfection and prophecy which they had imbibed from their male and female apostles, the special organs of the Paraclete On the approach of the Catholic priests and soldiers, they grasped with alacrity the crown of martyrdom the conventicle and the congregation perished in the flames but these primitive fanatics were not extinguished three hundred years after the death of their tyrant Under the protection of the Gothic confederates the church of the Arians at Constantinople had braved the severity of the laws their clergy equalled the wealth and magnificence of the senate and the gold and silver which were seized by the rapacious hand of Justinian might perhaps be claimed as the spoils of the provinces and the trophies of the barbarians A secret remnant of pagans who still lurked in the most refined and most rustic conditions of mankind excited the indignation of the Christians who were perhaps unwilling that any strangers should be the witnesses of their intestine quarrels A bishop was named as the inquisitor of the faith, and his diligence soon discovered in the court and city the magistrates, lawyers physicians and sophists who still cherished the superstition of the Greeks They were sternly informed that they must choose without delay between the displeasure of Jupiter or Justinian and that their aversion to the gospel could no longer be disguised under the scandalous mask of indifference or impiety The patrician Photius perhaps alone was resolved to live and to die like his ancestors he enfranchised himself with the stroke of a dagger, and left his tyrant the poor consolation of exposing with ignominy the lifeless corpse of the fugitive His weaker brethren submitted to their earthly monarch underwent the ceremony of baptism and laboured by their extraordinary zeal, to erase the suspicion or to expiate the guilt of idolatry The native country of Homer and the theatre of the Trojan war still retained the last sparks of his mythology by the care of the same bishop seventy thousand pagans were detected and converted in Asia, Phrygia Lydia, and Caria ninety six churches were built for the new proselytes and linen vestments bibles and liturgies and vases of gold and silver were supplied by the pious munificence of Justinian [86] The Jews who had been gradually stripped of their immunities were oppressed by a vexatious law which compelled them to observe the festival of Easter the same day on which it was celebrated by the Christians.[87] And they might complain with the more reason since the Catholics themselves did not agree with the astronomical calculations of their sovereign the people of Constantinople delayed the beginning of their Lent a whole week after it had been ordained by authority and they had the pleasure of fasting seven days, while meat was exposed for sale by the command of the emperor The Samaritans of Palestine[88] were a motley race, an ambiguous sect rejected as Jews by the pagans by the Jews as schismatics and by the Christians as idolators. The abomination of the cross had already been planted on their holy mount of Garizim [89] but the persecution of Justinian offered only the alternative of baptism or rebellion They chose the latter under the standard of a desperate leader they rose in arms and retaliated their wro gs on the lives the property and the temples of a defenceless people. The Samaritans were finally subdued by the regular forces of the East twenty thousand were slain, twenty thousand were sold by the Arabs to the infidels of Persia and India, and the remains of that unhappy nation atoned for the crime of treason by the sin of hypocrisy It has been computed that one hundred thousand Roman subjects were extirpated in the Samaritan war [90] which converted the once fruitful province into a desolate and smoking wilderness But in the creed of Justinian the guilt of murder could not be applied to the slaughter of unbelievers and he piously laboured to establish with fire and sword the unity of the Christian faith.[91]

With these sentiments it was incumbent on him at least to be always in the right In the first years of his administration he signalised his zeal as the disciple and patron of orthodoxy the reconciliation of the Greeks and Latins established the tome of St Leo as the creed of the emperor and the empire the Nestorians and Eutychians were exposed on either side to the double edge of persecution and the four synods, of Nice Constantinople Ephesus and Chalcedon were ratified by the code of a Catholic lawgiver [92] But while Justinian strove to maintain the uniformity of faith and worship his wife Theodora whose vices were not incompatible with devotion had listened to the Monophysite teachers and the open or clandestine enemies of the church revived and multiplied at the smile of their gracious patroness The capital, the palace the nuptial bed were torn by spiritual discord yet so doubtful was the sincerity of the royal consorts that their seeming disagreement was imputed by many to a secret and mischievous confederacy against the religion and happiness of their people [93] The famous dispute of the THREE CHAPTERS,[94] which has filled more volumes than it deserves lines is deeply marked with this subtle and disingenuous spirit. It was now three hundred years since the body of Origen[95] had been eaten by the worms his soul of which he held the pre-existence was in the hands of its Creator but his writings were eagerly perused by the monks of Palestine In these writings the piercing eye of Justinian descried more than ten metaphysical errors and the primitive doctor in the company of Pythagoras and Plato, was devoted by the clergy to the eternity of hell fire which he had presumed to deny Under the cover of this precedent a treacherous blow was aimed at the council of Chalcedon The fathers had listened without impatience to the praise of Theodore of Mopsuestia [96] and their justice or indulgence had restored both Theodoret of Cyrrhus and Ibas of Edessa to the communion of the church. But the characters of these Oriental bishops were tainted with the reproach of heresy the first had been the master the two others were the friends, of Nestorius their most suspicious passages were accused under the title of the three chapters and the condemnation of their memory must involve the honour of a synod whose name was pronounced with sincere or affected reverence by the Catholic world If these bishops whether innocent or guilty were annihilated in the sleep of death they would not probably be awakened by the clamour which, after a hundred years, was raised over their grave If th y were already in the fangs of the demon, their torments could neither be aggravated nor assuaged by human industry If in the company of saints and angels they enjoyed the rewards of piety they must have smiled at the idle fury of the theological insects who still crawled on the surface of the earth. The foremost of these insects the emperor or of the Romans darted his sting and distilled his venom perhaps without discerning the true motives of Theodora and her ecclesiastical faction. The victims were no longer subject to his

lief of personal inspiration he had secured the patronage of the Virgin and St Michael the archangel and his recovery from a dangerous disease was ascribed to the miraculous succour of the holy martyrs Cosmas and Damian The capital and the provinces of the East were decorated with the monuments of his religion,[81] and though the far greater part of these costly structures may be attributed to his taste or ostentation, the zeal of the royal architect was probably quickened by a genuine sense of love and gratitude towards his invisible benefactors Among the titles of Imperial greatness the name of Pious was most pleasing to his ear, to promote the temporal and spiritual interest of the church was the serious business of his life and the duty of father of his country was often sacrificed to that of defender of the faith The controversies of the times were congenial to his temper and understanding, and the theological professors must inwardly deride the diligence of a stranger who cultivated their art and neglected his own 'What can ye fear,' said a bold conspirator to his associates, from your bigoted tyrant? Sleepless and unarmed he sits whole nights in his closet debating with reverend greybeards and turning over the pages of ecclesiastical volumes'[82] The fruits of these lucubrations were displayed in many a conference where Justinian might shine as the loudest and most subtle of the disputants in many a sermon which under the name of edicts and epistles proclaimed to the empire the theology of their master While the barbarians invaded the provinces while the victorious legions marched under the banners of Belisarius and Narses the successor of Trajan unknown to the camp was content to vanquish at the head of a synod Had he invited to these synods a disinterested and rational spectator, Justinian might have learned that religious controversy is the offspring of arrogance and folly that true piety is most laudably expressed by silence and submission that man ignorant of his own nature should not presume to scrutinise the nature of his God and that it is sufficient for us to know that power and benevolence are the perfect attributes of the Deity[83]

Toleration was not the virtue of the times and indulgence to rebels has seldom been the virtue of princes But when the prince descends to the narrow and peevish character of a disputant he is easily provoked to supply the defect of argument by the plenitude of power and to chastise without mercy the perverse blindness of those who wilfully shut their eyes against the light of demonstration. sively imposed by the ecthesis or exposition of Heraclius the type or model of his grandson Constans [103] and the Imperial edicts were subscribed with alacrity or reluctance by the four patriarchs of Rome Constantinople Alexandria and Antioch. But the bishop and monks of Jerusalem sounded the alarm in the language or even in the silence of the Greeks the Latin churches detected a latent heresy and the obedience of pope Honorius to the commands of his sovereign was retracted and censured by the bolder ignorance of his successors They condemned the execrable and abominable heresy of the Monothelites who revived the errors of Manes Apolinaris, Eutyches etc. they signed the sentence of excommunication on the tomb of St Peter the ink was mingled with the sacramental wine the blood of Christ and no ceremony was omitted that could fill the superstitious mind with horror and affright As the representative of the Western church pope Martin and his Lateran synod anathematised the perfidious and guilty silence of the Greeks one hundred and five bishops of Italy for the most part the subjects of Constans presumed to reprobate his wicked type and the impious ecthesis of his grandfather and to confound the authors and their adherents with the twenty-one notorious heretics the apostates from the church and the organs of the devil. Such an insult under the tamest reign could not pass with impunity Pope Martin ended his days on the inhospitable shore of the Tauric Chersonesus and his oracle the abbot Maximus was inhumanly chastised by the amputation of his tongue and his right hand [104] But the same invincible spirit survived in their successors and the triumph of the Latins avenged their recent defeat and obliterated the disgrace of the three chapters The synods of Rome were confirmed by the sixth general council of Constantinople in the palace and the presence of a new Constantine a descendant of Heraclius The royal convert converted the Byzantine pontiff and a majority of the bishops [105] the dissenters, with their chief Macarius of Antioch, were condemned to the spiritual and temporal pains of heresy the East condescended to accept the lessons of the West and the creed was finally settled which teaches the Catholics of every age that two wills or energies are harmonised in the person of Christ The majesty of the pope and the Roman synod was represented by two priests one deacon and three bishops but these obscure Latins had neither arms to compel nor treasures to bribe nor language to persuade and I am ignorant by what arts they could determine the lofty emperor of the Greeks to abjure the catechism of his infancy and to persecute the religion of his fathers Perhaps the monks and people of Constantinople [106] were favourable to the Lateran creed which is indeed the least reasonable of the two and the suspicion is countenanced by the unnatural moderation of the Greek clergy who appear in this quarrel to be conscious of their weakness While the synod debated a fanatic proposed a more summary decision by raising a dead man to life the prelates assisted at the trial but the acknowledged failure may serve to indicate that the passions and prejudices of the multitude were not enlisted on the side of the Monothelites In the next generation when the son of Constantine was deposed and slain by the disciple of Macarius, they tasted the feast of revenge and dominion the image or monument of the sixth council was defaced and the original acts were committed to the flames But in the second year their patron was cast headlong from the throne the bishops of the East were released from their occasional conformity the Roman faith was more firmly replanted by the orthodox successors of Bardanes and the fine problems of the incarnation were forgotten in the more popular and visible quarrel of the worship of images [107]

Before the end of the seventh century the creed of the incarnation which had been de*fined at Rome* and Constantinople *was uni*formly preached in the remote islands of Britain and Ireland [108] the same ideas were entertained or rather the same words were repeated by all the Christians whose liturgy was performed in the Greek or the Latin tongue Their numbers and visible splendour bestowed an imperfect claim to the appellation of Catholics but in the East they were marked with the less honourable name of Melchites or Royalists [109] of men whose faith, instead of resting on the basis of Scripture reason or tradition had been established and was still maintained by the arbitrary power of a temporal monarch. Their adversaries might allege the words of the fathers of Constantinople who profess themselves the slaves of the king and they might relate with malicious joy how the decrees of Chalcedon had been inspired and reformed by the emperor Marcian and his virgin bride The prevailing faction will naturally inculcate the duty of submission nor is it less natural that dissenters should feel and assert the principles of freedom Under the rod of persecution the Nestorians and Monophysites degenerated into rebels and fugitives and the most

power, and the vehement style of his edicts could only proclaim their damnation and invite the clergy of the East to join in a full chorus of curses and anathemas The East with some hesitation consented to the voice of her sovereign the fifth general council, of three patriarchs and one hundred and sixty five bishop, was held at Constantinople and the authors as well as the defenders of the three chapters were separated from the communion of the saints, and solemnly delivered to the prince of darkness But the Latin churches were more jealous of the honour of Leo and the synod of Chalcedon, and if they had fought as they usually did under the standard of Rome they might have prevailed in the cause of reason and humanity But their chief was a prisoner in the hands of the enemy the throne of St Peter which had been disgraced by the simony, was betrayed by the cowardice of Vigilius who yielded after a long and inconsistent struggle, to the despotism of Justinian and the sophistry of the Greeks His apostasy provoked the indignation of the Latins and no more than two bishops could be found who would impose their hands on his deacon and successor Pelagius Yet the perseverance of the popes insensibly transferred to their adversaries the appellation of schismatics the Illyrian African and Italian churches were oppressed by the civil and ecclesiastical powers not without some effort of military force[97] the distant barbarians transcribed the creed of the Vatican and in the period of a century the schism of the three chapters expired in an obscure angle of the Venetian province[98] But the religious discontent of the Italians had already promoted the conquests of the Lombards and the Romans themselves were accustomed to suspect the faith and to detest the government of their Byzantine tyrant

Justinian was neither steady nor consistent in the nice process of fixing his volatile opinions and those of his subjects In his youth he was offended by the slightest deviation from the orthodox line in his old age he transgressed the measure of temperate heresy and the Jacobites not less than the Catholics were scandalised by his declaration that the body of Christ was incorruptible and that his manhood was never subject to any wants and infirmities the inheritance of our mortal flesh This fantastic opinion was announced in the last edicts of Justinian and at the moment of his seasonable departure, the clergy had refused to subscribe the prince was prepared to persecute and the people were resolved to suffer or resist A bishop of Trèves, secure beyond the limits of his power, addressed the monarch of the East in the language of authority and affection Most gracious Justinian, remember your baptism and your creed. Let not your grey hairs be defiled with heresy Recall your fathers from exile, and your followers from perdition You cannot be ignorant that Italy and Gaul Spain and Africa already deplore your fall and anathematise your name Unless without delay you destroy what you have taught, unless you exclaim with a loud voice I have erred I have sinned anathema to Nestorius anathema to Eutyches, you deliver your soul to the same flames in which they will eternally burn ' He died and made no sign.[99] His death restored in some degree the peace of the church and the reigns of his four successors, Justin Tiberius Maurice and Phocas, are distinguished by a rare though fortunate vacancy in the ecclesiastical history of the East[100]

The faculties of sense and reason are least capable of acting on themselves the eye is most inaccessible to the sight, the soul to the thought yet we think and even feel that one will a sole principle of action is essential to a rational and conscious being When Heraclius returned from the Persian war the orthodox hero consulted his bishops whether the Christ whom he adored, of one person but of two natures was actuated by a single or a double will They replied in the singular and the emperor was encouraged to hope that the Jacobites of Egypt and Syria might be reconciled by the profession of a doctrine most certainly harmless and most probably true since it was taught even by the Nestorians themselves[101] The experiment was tried without effect and the timid or vehement Catholics condemned even the semblance of a retreat in the presence of a subtle and audacious enemy The orthodox (the prevailing) party devised new modes of speech and argument and interpretation to either nature of Christ they speciously applied a proper and distinct energy but the difference was no longer visible when they allowed that the human and the divine will were invariably the same[102] The disease was attended with the customary symptoms but the Greek clergy as if satiate with the endless controversy of the incarnation instilled a healing counsel into the ear of the prince and people They delcared themselves MONOTHELITES (asserters of the unity of will) but they treated the words as new the questions as superfluous and recommended a religious silence as the most agreeable to the prudence and charity of the gospel. This law of silence was succes-

Monophysites who under the reigns of Zeno and Anastasius, had invaded the thrones of the East provoked their antagonists in a land of freedom to avow a moral rather than a physical union of the two persons of Christ Since the first preaching of the gospel the Sassanian kings beheld with an eye of suspicion a race of aliens and apostates who had embraced the religion and who might favour the cause of the hereditary foes of their country The royal edicts had often prohibited their dangerous correspondence with the Syrian clergy the progress of the schism was grateful to the jealous pride of Perozes and he listened to the eloquence of an artful prelate who painted Nestorius as the friend of Persia and urged him to secure the fidelity of his Christian subjects by granting a just preference to the victims and enemies of the Roman tyrant The Nestorians composed a large majority of the clergy and people they were encouraged by the smile and armed with the sword of despotism yet many of their weaker brethren were startled at the thought of breaking loose from the communion of the Christian world, and the blood of seven thousand seven hundred Monophysites or Catholics confirmed the uniformity of faith and discipline in the churches of Persia[116] Their ecclesiastical institutions are distinguished by a liberal principle of reason or at least of policy the austerity of the cloister was relaxed and gradually forgotten houses of charity were endowed for the education of orphans and foundlings the law of celibacy so forcibly recommended to the Greeks and Latins was disregarded by the Persian clergy and the number of the elect was multiplied by the public and reiterated nuptials of the priests the bishops and even the patriarch himself To this standard of natural and religious freedom myriads of fugitives resorted from all the provinces of the Eastern empire the narrow bigotry of Justinian was punished by the emigration of his most industrious subjects they transported into Persia the arts both of peace and war and those who deserved the favour were promoted in the service of a discerning monarch The arms of Nushirvan and his fiercer grandson were assisted with advice and money and troops by the desperate sectaries who still lurked in their native cities of the East their zeal was rewarded with the gift of the Catholic churches but when those cities and churches were recovered by Heraclius their open profession of treason and heresy compelled them to seek a refuge in the realm of their foreign ally But the seeming tranquillity of the Nestorians was often endangered and sometimes overthrown They were involved in the common evils of Oriental despotism their enmity to Rome could not always atone for their attachment to the gospel and a colony of three hundred thousand Jacobites the captives of Apamea and Antioch was permitted to erect a hostile altar in the face of the catholic and in the sunshine of the court In his last treaty Justinian introduced some conditions which tended to enlarge and fortify the toleration of Christianity in Persia The emperor ignorant of the rights of conscience was incapable of pity or esteem for the heretics who denied the authority of the holy synods but he flattered himself that they would gradually perceive the temporal benefits of union with the empire and the Church of Rome and if he failed in exciting their gratitude he might hope to provoke the jealousy of their sovereign. In a later age the Lutherans have been burnt at Paris and protected in Germany by the superstition and policy of the most Christian king

The desire of gaining souls for God and subjects for the church has excited in every age the diligence of the Christian priests From the conquest of Persia they carried their spiritual arms to the north the east and the south and the simplicity of the gospel was fashioned and painted with the colours of the Syriac theology In the sixth century according to the report of a Nestorian traveller[118] Christianity was successfully preached to the Bactrians the Huns the Persians the Indians the Persarmenians the Medes and the Elamites the barbaric churches, from the Gulf of Persia to the Caspian Sea were almost infinite and their recent faith was conspicuous in the number and sanctity of their monks and martyrs The pepper coast of Malabar and the isles of the ocean Socotora and Ceylon were peopled with an increasing multitude of Christians and the bishops and clergy of those sequestered regions derived their ordination from the catholic of Babylon In a subsequent age the zeal of the Nestorians overleaped the limits which had confined the ambition and curiosity both of the Greeks and Persians The missionaries of Balch and Samarcand pursued without fear the footsteps of the roving Tartar and insinuated themselves into the camps of the valleys of Imaus and the banks of the Selinga They exposed a metaphysical creed to those illiterate shepherds to those sanguinary warriors they recommended humanity and repose Yet a khan whose power they vainly magnified, is said to have received at their ancient and useful allies of Rome were taught to consider the emperor not as the chief but as the enemy of the Christians Language the leading principle which unites or separates the tribes of mankind soon discriminated the sectaries of the East by a peculiar and perpetual badge which abolished the means of intercourse and the hope or reconciliation The long dominion of the Greeks their colonies and above all their eloquence had propagated a language doubtless the most perfect that has been contrived by the art of man Yet the body of the people, both in Syria and Egypt still persevered in the use of their national idioms with this difference however that the Coptic was confined to the rude and illiterate peasants of the Nile while the Syriac[110] from the mountains of Assyria to the Red Sea was adapted to the higher topics of poetry and argument Armenia and Abyssinia were infected by the speech or learning of the Greeks and their barbaric tongues which have been revived in the studies of modern Europe, were unintelligible to the inhabitants of the Roman empire The Syriac and the Coptic the Armenian and the Æthiopic are consecrated in the service of their respective churches, and their theology is enriched by domestic versions[111] both of the scriptures and of the most popular fathers After a period of thirteen hundred and sixty years the spark of controversy, first kindled by a sermon of Nestorius still burns in the bosom of the East and the hostile communions still maintain the faith and discipline of their founders In the most abject state of ignorance poverty and servitude the Nestorians and Monophysites reject the spiritual supremacy of Rome and cherish the toleration of their Turkish masters which allows them to anathematise on one hand St Cyril and the synod of Ephesus on the other pope Leo and the council of Chalcedon The weight which they cast into the downfall of the Eastern empire demands our notice and the reader may be amused with the various prospect of I The Nestorians II The Jacobites[112] III The M ronites IV The Armenians V The Copts and VI The Abyssinians To the three former the Syriac is common, but of the latter each is discriminated by the use of a national idiom Yet the modern natives of Armenia and Abyssinia would be incapable of conversing with their ancestors and the Christians of Egypt and Syria who reject the religion have adopted the language of the Arabians The lapse of time has seconded the sacerdotal arts and in the East as well as in the West the Deity is addressed in an obsolete tongue unknown to the majority of the congregation

I Both in his native and his episcopal province the heresy of the unfortunate Nestorius was speedily obliterated The Oriental bishops, who at Ephesus had resisted to his face the arrogance of Cyril were mollified by his tardy concessions The same prelates or their successors, subscribed not without a murmur the decrees of Chalcedon the power of the Monophysites reconciled them with the Catholics in the conformity of passion of interest and insensibly of belief and their last reluctant sigh was breathed in the defence of the three chapters. Their dissenting brethren less moderate or more sincere were crushed by the penal laws and as early as the reign of Justinian, it became difficult to find a church of Nestorians within the limits of the Roman empire Beyond those limits they had discovered a new world in which they might hope for liberty and aspire to conquest In Persia notwithstanding the resistance of the Magi Christianity had struck a deep root and the nations of the East reposed under its salutary shade The catholic or primate resided in the capital in his synods and in their dioceses his metropolitans, bishops, and clergy represented the pomp and order of a regular hierarchy they rejoiced in the increase of proselytes who were converted from the Zendavesta to the Gospel from the secular to the monastic life, and their zeal was stimulated by the presence of an artful and formidable enemy The Persian church had been founded by the missionaries of Syria and their language discipline and doctrine were closely interwoven with its original frame The catholics were elected and ordained by their own suffragans but their filial dependence on the patriarchs of Antioch is attested by the canons of the Oriental church[113] In the Persian school of Edessa,[114] the rising generations of the faithful imbibed their theological idiom they studied in the Syriac version the ten thousand volumes of Theodore of Mopsuestia and they revered the apostolic faith and holy martyrdom of his disciple Nestorius whose person and language were equally unknown to the nations beyond the Tigris The first indelible lesson of Ibas bishop of Edessa taught them to execrate the Egyptians who in the synod of Ephesus had impiously confounded the two natures of Christ The flight of the masters and scholars who were twice expelled from the Athens of Syria dispersed a crowd of missionaries inflamed by the double zeal of religion and revenge And the rigid unity of the power of the Portuguese the arts of the Jesuits and the zeal of Alexis de Menezes archbishop of Goa in his personal visitation of the coast of Malabar The synod of Diamper at which he presided consummated the pious work of the re-union and rigorously imposed the doctrine and discipline of the Roman church without forgetting auricular confession the strongest engine of ecclesiastical torture The memory of Theodore and Nestorius was condemned and Malabar was reduced under the dominion of the pope of the primate and of the Jesuits who invaded the see of Angamala or Cranganor Sixty years of servitude and hypocrisy were patiently endured but as soon as the Portuguese empire was shaken by the courage and industry of the Dutch, the Nestorians asserted with vigour and effect the religion of their fathers. The Jesuits were incapable of defending the power which they had abused the arms of forty thousand Christians were pointed against their falling tyrants and the Indian archdeacon assumed the character of bishop till a fresh supply of episcopal gifts and Syriac missionaries could be obtained from the patriarch of Babylon Since the expulsion of the Portuguese the Nestorian creed is freely professed on the coast of Malabar The trading companies of Holland and England are the friends of toleration but if oppression be less mortifying than contempt the Christians of St Thomas have reason to complain of the cold and silent indifference of their brethren of Europe [124]

II The history of the Monophysites is less copious and interesting than that of the Nestorians Under the reigns of Zeno and Anastasius their artful leaders surprised the ear of the prince usurped the thrones of the East and crushed on its native soil the school of the Syrians. The rule of the Monophysite faith was defined with exquisite discretion by Severus patriarch of Antioch he condemned in the style of the Henoticon the adverse heresies of Nestorius and Eutyches maintained against the latter the reality of the body of Christ and constrained the Greeks to allow that he was a liar who spoke truth [125] But the approximation of ideas could not abate the vehemence of passion each party was the more astonished that their blind antagonist could dispute on so trifling a difference the tyrant of Syria enforced the belief of his creed and his reign was polluted with the blood of three hundred and fifty monks who were slain not perhaps without provocation or resistance under the walls of Apamea [126] The successor of Anastasius replanted the orthodox standard in the East Severus fled into Egypt and his friend the eloquent Xenaias [127] who had escaped from the Nestorians of Persia was suffocated in his exile by the Melchites of Paphlagonia Fifty four bishops were swept from their thrones eight hundred ecclesiastics were cast into prison [128] and notwithstanding the ambiguous favour of Theodora the Oriental flocks deprived of their shepherds must insensibly have been either famished or poisoned In this spiritual distress the expiring faction was revived and united and perpetuated by the labours of a monk and the name of James Baradæus [129] has been preserved in the appellation of Jacobites a familiar sound which may startle the ear of an English reader From the holy confessors in their prison of Constantinople he received the powers of bishop of Edessa and apostle of the East and the ordination of four score thousand bishops priests and deacons, is derived from the same inexhaustible source The speed of the zealous missionary was promoted by the fleetest dromedaries of a devout chief of the Arabs the doctrine and discipline of the Jacobites were secretly established in the dominions of Justinian and each Jacobite was compelled to violate the laws and to hate the Roman legislator The successors of Severus, while they lurked in convents or villages while they sheltered their proscribed heads in the caverns of hermits or the tents of the Saracens still asserted as they now assert their indefeasible right to the title the rank and the prerogatives of patriarch of Antioch under the milder yoke of the infidels they reside about a league from Merdin in the pleasant monastery of Zapharan which they have embellished with cells aqueducts and plantations The secondary though honourable place is filled by the maphrian who in his station at Mosul itself defies the Nestorian catholic with whom he contests the primacy of the East Under the patriarch and the maphrian one hundred and fifty *archbish*ops and bishops have been counted in the different ages of the Jacobite church but the order of the hierarchy is relaxed or dissolved and the greater part of their dioceses is confined to the neighbourhood of the Euphrates and the Tigris The cities of Aleppo and Amida which are often visited by the patriarch contain some wealthy merchants and industrious mechanics, but the multitude derive their scanty sustenance from their daily labour and poverty as well as superstition may impose their excessive fasts—five annual lents during which both the clergy and laity abstain not only from flesh or eggs but

hands the rites of baptism and even of ordination and the fame of Prester or Presbyter John[117] has long amused the credulity of Europe The royal convert was indulged in the use of a portable altar, but he despatched an embassy to the patriarch to inquire how in the season of Lent he should abstain from animal food and how he might celebrate the Eucharist in a desert that produced neither corn nor wine In their progress by sea and land the Nestorians entered China by the port of Canton and the northern residence of Sigan Unlike the senators of Rome, who assumed with a smile the characters of priests and augurs the mandarins who affect in public the reason of philosophers are devoted in private to every mode of popular superstition They cherished and they confounded the gods of Palestine and of India, but the propagation of Christianity awakened the jealousy of the state and after a short vicissitude of favour and persecution the foreign sect expired in ignorance and oblivion[118] Under the reign of the caliphs the Nestorian church was diffused from China to Jerusalem and Cyprus and their numbers, with those of the Jacobites were computed to surpass the Greek and Latin communions[119] Twenty five metropolitans or archbishops composed their hierarchy but several of these were dispensed by the distance and danger of the way from the duty of personal attendance on the easy condition that every six years they should testify their faith and obedience to the catholic or patriarch of Babylon a vague appellation which has been successively applied to the royal seats of Seleucia Ctesiphon and Bagdad These remote branches are long since withered, and the old patriarchal trunk[120] is now divided by the Elijahs of Mosul the representatives almost in lineal descent of the genuine and primitive succession the Josephs of Amida who are reconciled to the church of Rome[121] and the Simeons of Van or Ormia whose revolt, at the head of forty thousand families was promoted in the sixteenth century by the Sophis of Persia The number of three hundred thousand is allowed for the whole body of the Nestorians who under the name of Chaldæans or Assyrians are confounded with the most learned or the most powerful nation of Eastern antiquity

According to the legend of antiquity, the gospel was preached in India by St Thomas[122] At the end of the ninth century his shrine perhaps in the neighbourhood of Madras was devoutly visited by the ambassadors of Alfred and their return with a cargo of pearls and spices rewarded the zeal of the English monarch who entertained the largest projects of trade and discovery[123] When the Portuguese first opened the navigation of India the Christians of St Thomas had been seated for ages on the coast of Malabar, and the difference of their character and colour attested the mixture of a foreign race In arms, in arts, and possibly in virtue, they excelled the natives of Hindostan the husbandmen cultivated the palm tree the merchants were enriched by the pepper trade the soldiers preceded the nairs or nobles of Malabar, and their hereditary privileges were respected by the gratitude or the fear of the king of Cochin and the Zamorin himself They acknowledged a Gentoo sovereign but they were governed even in temporal concerns, by the bishop of Angamala He still asserted his ancient title of metropolitan of India, but his real jurisdiction was exercised in fourteen hundred churches, and he was intrusted with the care of two hundred thousand souls Their religion would have rendered them the firmest and most cordial allies of the Portuguese, but the inquisitors soon discerned in the Christians of St Thomas the unpardonable guilt of heresy and schism Instead of owning themselves the subjects of the Roman pontiff, the spiritual and temporal monarch of the globe, they adhered like their ancestors to the communion of the Nestorian patriarch and the bishops whom he ordained at Mosul traversed the dangers of the sea and land to reach their diocese on the coast of Malabar In their Syriac liturgy the names of Theodore and Nestorius were piously commemorated they united their adoration of the two persons of Christ the title of Mother of God was offensive to their ear and they measured with scrupulous avarice the honours of the Virgin Mary whom the superstition of the Latins had almost exalted to the rank of a goddess When her image was first presented to the disciples of St Thomas they indignantly exclaimed We are Christians not idolators! and their simple devotion was content with the veneration of the cross Their separation from the Western world had left them in ignorance of the improvements or corruptions of a thousand years and their conformity with the faith and practice of the fifth century would equally disappoint the prejudices of a Papist or a Protestant It was the first care of the ministers of Rome to intercept all correspondence with the Nestorian patriarch and several of his bishops expired in the prisons of the holy office The flock without a shepherd was assaulted by the

II The history of the Monophysites is less copious and interesting than that of the Nestorians Under the reigns of Zeno and Anastasius their artful leaders surprised the ear of the prince usurped the thrones of the East and crushed on its native soil the school of the Syrians The rule of the Monophysite faith was defined with exquisite discretion by Severus patriarch of Antioch he condemned in the style of the Henoticon the adverse heresies of Nestorius and Eutyches maintained against the latter the reality of the body of Christ and constrained the Greeks to allow that he was a liar who spoke truth.[125] But the approximation of ideas could not abate the vehemence of passion each party was the more astonished that their blind antagonist could dispute on so trifling a difference the tyrant of Syria enforced the belief of his creed and his reign was polluted with the blood of three hundred and fifty monks who were slain not perhaps without provocation or resistance under the walls of Apamea.[126] The successor of Anastasius replanted the orthodox standard in the East Severus fled into Egypt and his friend the eloquent Xenaias [127] who had escaped from the Nestorians of Persia was suffocated in his exile by the Melchites of Paphlagonia Fifty four bishops were swept from their thrones eight hundred ecclesiastics were cast into prison [128] and notwithstanding the ambiguous favour of Theodora the Oriental flocks deprived of their shepherds must insensibly have been either famished or poisoned In this spiritual distress the expiring faction was revived and united and perpetuated by the labours of a monk and the name of James Baradæus[129] has been preserved in the appellation of Jacobites a familiar sound which may startle the ear of an English reader From the holy confessors in their prison of Constantinople he received the powers of bishop of Edessa and apostle of the East and the ordination of fourscore thousand bishops priests and deacons is derived from the same inexhaustible source The speed of the zealous missionary was promoted by the fleetest dromedaries of a devout chief of the Arabs the doctrine and discipline of the Jacobites were secretly established in the dominions of Justinian and each Jacobite was compelled to violate the laws and to hate the Roman legislator The successors of Severus while they lurked in convents or villages while they sheltered their proscribed heads in the caverns of hermits or the tents of the Saracens still asserted as they now assert their indefeasible right to the title the rank and the prerogatives of patriarch of Antioch under the milder yoke of the infidels they reside about a league from Merdin in the pleasant monastery of Zapharan which they have embellished with cells aqueducts and plantations The secondary though honourable place is filled by the maphrian who in his station at Mosul itself defies the Nestorian catholic with whom he contests the primacy of the East Under the patriarch and the maphrian one hundred and fifty archbishops and bishops have been counted in the different ages of the Jacobite church but the order of the hierarchy is relaxed or dissolved and the greater part of their dioceses is confined to the neighbourhood of the Euphrates and the Tigris The cities of Aleppo and Amida which are often visited by the patriarch contain some wealthy merchants and industrious mechanics but the multitude derive their scanty sustenance from their daily labour and poverty as well as superstition may impose their excessive fasts—five annual lents during which both the clergy and laity abstain not only from flesh or eggs but even from the taste of wine, of oil, and of fish Their present numbers are esteemed from fifty to fourscore thousand souls the remnant of a populous church which has gradually decreased under the oppression of twelve centuries Yet in that long period some strangers of merit have been converted to the Monophysite faith, and a Jew was the father of Abulpharagius,[130] primate of the East so truly eminent both in his life and death In his life he was an elegant writer of the Syriac and Arabic tongues a poet physician and historian a subtle philosopher and a moderate divine In his death his funeral was attended by his rival the Nestorian patriarch with a train of Greeks and Armenians who forgot their disputes and mingled their tears over the grave of an enemy The sect which was honoured by the virtues of Abulpharagius appears, however to sink below the level of their Nestorian brethren The superstition of the Jacobites is more abject, their fasts more rigid[131] their intestine divisions are more numerous and their doctrines (as far as I can measure the degrees of nonsense) are more remote from the precincts of reason Something may possibly be allowed for the rigour of the Monophysite theology much more for the superior influence of the monastic order In Syria in Egypt, in Æthiopia the Jacobite monks have ever been distinguished by the austerity of their penance and the absurdity of their legends Alive or dead they are worshipped as the favourites of the Deity the crosier of bishop and patriarch is reserved for their venerable hands, and they assume the government of men while they are yet reeking with the habits and prejudices of the cloister[132]

III In the style of the Oriental Christians, the Monothelites of every age are described under the appellation of Maronites[133] a name which has been insensibly transferred from a hermit to a monastery from a monastery to a nation Maron a saint or savage of the fifth century displayed his religious madness in Syria the rival cities of Apamea and Emesa disputed his relics a stately church was erected on his tomb and six hundred of his disciples united their solitary cells on the banks of the Orontes In the controversies of the incarnation they nicely threaded the orthodox line between the sects of Nestorius and Eutyches but the unfortunate question of one will or operation in the two natures of Christ was generated by their curious leisure Their proselyte the emperor Heraclius was rejected as a Maronite from the walls of Emesa, he found a refuge in the monastery of his brethren and their theological lessons were repaid with the gift of a spacious and wealthy domain The name and doctrine of this venerable school were propagated among the Greeks and Syrians, and their zeal is expressed by Macarius patriarch of Antioch who declared before the synod of Constantinople, that sooner than subscribe the two wills of Christ he would submit to be hewn piecemeal and cast into the sea[134] A similar or a less cruel mode of persecution soon converted the unresisting subjects of the plain while the glorious title of Mardaites[135] or rebels was bravely maintained by the hardy natives of Mount Libanus John Maron one of the most learned and popular of the monks assumed the character of patriarch of Antioch his nephew, Abraham at the head of the Maronites defended their civil and religious freedom against the tyrants of the East The son of the orthodox Constantine pursued with pious hatred a people of soldiers who might have stood the bulwark of his empire against the common foes of Christ and of Rome An army of Greeks invaded Syria the monastery of St Maron was destroyed with fire, the bravest chieftains were betrayed and murdered and twelve thousand of their followers were transplanted to the distant frontiers of Armenia and Thrace Yet the humble nation of the Maronites has survived the empire of Constantinople and they still enjoy under their Turkish masters, a free religion and a mitigated servitude Their domestic governors are chosen among the ancient nobility the patriarch in his monastery of Canobin still fancies himself on the throne of Antioch nine bishops compose his synod and one hundred and fifty priests who retain the liberty of marriage are intrusted with the care of one hundred thousand souls Their country extends from the ridge of Mount Libanus to the shores of Tripoli and the gradual descent affords, in a narrow space each variety of soil and climate, from the Holy Cedars erect under the weight of snow[136] to the vine the mulberry and the olive trees of the fruitful valley In the twelfth century the Maronites abjuring the Monothelite error were reconciled to the Latin churches of Antioch and Rome[137] and the same alliance has been frequently renewed by the ambition of the popes and the distress of the Syrians But it may reasonably be questioned whether their union has ever been perfect or sincere and the learned Maronites of the college of Rome have vainly laboured to absolve their ancestors from the guilt of heresy and schism[138]

IV Since the age of Constantine, the Ar

MENIANS[139] had signalised their attachment to the religion and empire of the Christians The disorders of their country and their ignorance of the Greek tongue prevented their clergy from assisting at the synod of Chalcedon, and they floated eighty four years[140] in a state of indifference or suspense till their vacant faith was finally occupied by the missionaries of Julian of Halicarnassus[141] who in Egypt their common foe had been vanquished by the arguments or the influence of his rival Severus the Monophysite patriarch of Antioch. The Armenians alone are the pure disciples of Eutyches an unfortunate parent who has been renounced by the greater part of his spiritual progeny They alone persevere in the opinion that the manhood of Christ was created or existed without creation of a divine and incorruptible substance. Their adversaries reproach them with the adoration of a phantom and they retort the accusation by deriding or execrating the blasphemy of the Jacobites who impute to the Godhead the vile infirmities of the flesh even the natural effects of nutrition and digestion. The religion of Armenia could not derive much glory from the learning or the power of its inhabitants The royalty expired with the origin of their schism and their Christian kings, who arose and fell in the thirteenth century on the confines of Cilicia were the clients of the Latins and the vassals of the Turkish sultan of Iconium. The helpless nation has seldom been permitted to enjoy the tranquillity of servitude From the earliest period to the present hour Armenia has been the theatre of perpetual war the lands between Tauris and Erivan were dispeopled by the cruel policy of the Sophis and myriads of Christian families were transplanted to perish or to propagate in the distant provinces of Persia. Under the rod of oppression the zeal of the Armenians is fervent and intrepid they have often preferred the crown of martyrdom to the white turban of Mohammed they devoutly hate the error and idolatry of the Greeks and their transient union with the Latins is not less devoid of truth than the thousand bishops whom their patriarch offered at the feet of the Roman pontiff[142] The catholic or patriarch, of the Armenians resides in the monastery of Ekmiasin, three leagues from Erivan Forty-seven archbishops each of whom may claim the obedience of four or five suffragans, are consecrated by his hand but the far greater part are only titular prelates who dignify with their presence and service the simplicity of his court. As soon as they have performed the liturgy they cultivate the garden and our bishops will hear with surprise that the austerity of their life increases in just proportion to the elevation of their rank. In the fourscore thousand towns or villages of his spiritual empire the patriarch receives a small and voluntary tax from each person above the age of fifteen but the annual amount of six hundred thousand crowns is insufficient to supply the incessant demands of charity and tribute Since the beginning of the last century the Armenians have obtained a large and lucrative share of the commerce of the East in their return from Europe the caravan usually halts in the neighbourhood of Erivan, the altars are enriched with the fruits of their patient industry and the faith of Eutyches is preached in their recent congregations of Barbary and Poland.[143]

V In the rest of the Roman empire the despotism of the prince might eradicate or silence the sectaries of an obnoxious creed But the stubborn temper of the Egyptians maintained their opposition to the synod of Chalcedon and the policy of Justinian condescended to expect and to seize the opportunity of discord. The Monophysite church of Alexandria[144] was torn by the disputes of the corruptibles and incorruptibles and on the death of the patriarch the two factions upheld their respective candidates[145] Gaian was the disciple of Julian Theodosius had been the pupil of Severus the claims of the former were supported by the consent of the monks and senators, the city and the province the latter depended on the priority of his ordination the favour of the empress Theodora and the arms of the eunuch Narses which might have been used in more honourable warfare. The exile of the popular candidate to Carthage and Sardinia inflamed the ferment of Alexandria and after a schism of one hundred and seventy years the Gaianites still revered the memory and doctrine of their founder The strength of numbers and of discipline was tried in a desperate and bloody conflict the streets were filled with the dead bodies of citizens and soldiers the pious women, ascending the roofs of their houses showered down every sharp or ponderous utensil on the heads of the enemy and the final victory of Narses was owing to the flames with which he wasted the third capital of the Roman world But the lieutenant of Justinian had not conquered in the cause of a heretic Theodosius himself was speedily though gently removed and Paul of Tanis an orthodox monk was raised to the throne of Athanasius The powers of government were strained in his support he might appoint or displace the dukes and tribunes of Egypt the allowance of bread, which Diocletian had granted, was suppres ed the churches were shut, and a nation of schismatics was deprived at once of their spiritual and carnal food In his turn, the tyrant was excommunicated by the zeal and revenge of the people and none except his servile Mel chites would salute him as a man, a Christian or a bishop Yet such is the blindness of ambi tion, that, when Paul was expelled on a charge of murder he solicited, with a bribe of seven hundred pounds of gold, his restoration to the same station of hatred and ignominy His suc cessor Apollinaris entered the hostile city in military array alike qualified for prayer or for battle His troops under arms, were distributed through the streets the gates of the cathedral were guarded and a chosen band was stationed in the choir to defend the person of their chief He stood erect on his throne and throwing aside the upper garment of a warrior suddenly appeared before the eyes of the multitude in the robes of patriarch of Alexandria Astonishment held them mute but no sooner had Apollinaris begun to read the tome of St Leo than a volley of curses and invectives and stones assaulted the odious minister of the emperor and the synod A charge was instantly sounded by the successor of the apostles the soldiers waded to their knees in blood and two hundred thousand Christians are said to have fallen by the sword an incredible account even if it be extended from the slaughter of a day to the eighteen years of the reign of Apollinaris Two succeeding pa triarchs Eulogius[146] and John [147] laboured in the conversion of heretics with arms and argu ments more worthy of their evangelical profes sion The theological knowledge of Eulogius *was displayed in many a volume which magni*fied the errors of Eutyches and Severus and at tempted to reconcile the ambiguous language of St Cyril with the orthodox creed of pope Leo and the fathers of Chalcedon The bounteous alms of John the Eleemosynary were dictated by superstition or benevolence or policy Seven thousand five hundred poor were maintained at his expense, on his accession he found eight thousand pounds of gold in the treasury of the church he collected ten thousand from the liberality of the faithful yet the primate could boast in his testament that he left behind him no more than the third part of the smallest of the silver coins The churches of Alexandria were delivered to the Catholics the religion of the Monophysites was proscribed in Egypt and a law was revived which excluded the natives from the honours and emoluments of the sta ..

A more important conquest still remained, of the patriarch the oracle and leader of the Egyptian church Theodosius had resisted the threats and promises of Justinian with the spir of an apostle or an enthusiast Such' replied the patriarch were the offers of the tempter when he showed the kingdoms of the earth But my soul is far dearer to me than life or dominion The churches are in the hands of a prince who can kill the body but my conscience is my own and in exile poverty, or chains I will steadfast ly adhere to the faith of my holy predecessors, Athanasius Cyril, and Dioscorus Anathema to the tome of Leo and the synod of Chalce don! Anathema to all who embrace their creed! Anathema to them now and for evermore! Naked came I out of my mother's womb naked shall I descend into the grave Let those who love God follow me and seek their salvation." After comforting his brethren he embarked for Constantinople, and sustained in six successive interviews the almost irresistible weight of the royal presence His opinions were favourably entertained in the palace and the city the influence of Theodora assured him a safe-conduct and honourable dismission and he ended his days though not on the throne, yet in the bosom of his native country On the news of his death Apollinaris indecently feasted the nobles and the clergy but his joy was checked by the intelligence of a new election, and while he enjoyed the wealth of Alexandria his rivals reigned in the monasteries of Thebais and were maintained by the voluntary oblations of the people A perpetual succession of patriarchs arose from the ashes of Theodosius and the Monophysite churches of Syria and Egypt were united by the name of Jacobites and the com munion of the faith But the same faith which has been confined to a narrow sect of the Syri ans was diffused over the mass of the Egyptian or Coptic nation who almost unanimously rejected the decrees of the synod of Chalcedon A thousand years were now elapsed since Egypt had ceased to be a kingdom since the conquer ors of Asia and Europe had trampled on the ready necks of a people whose ancient wisdom and power ascends beyond the records of history The conflict of zeal and persecution rekindled some sparks of their national spirit They abjured with a foreign heresy the man ners and language of the Greeks every Mel chite in their eyes was a stranger every Jacobite a citizen the alliance of marriage the offices of humanity were condemned as a deadly sin the natives renounced all allegiance to the em ---or and his orders at a distance from Alex Ina were obeyed only under the pressure of itary force A generous effort might have re :med the religion and liberty of Egypt and : six hundred monasteries might have poured th their myriads of holy warriors for whom ath should have no terrors since life had no mfort or delight But experience has proved : distinction of active and passive courage e fanatic who endures without a groan the rture of the rack or the stake would tremble id fly before the face of an armed enemy The isillanimous temper of the Egyptians could ily hope for a change of masters the arms of hosroes d populated the land yet under his :on the Jacobites enjoyed a short and precari u respite The victory of Heraclius renewed nd aggravated the persecution and the patri rch again escaped from Alexandria to the lesert In his flight Benjamin was encouraged y a voice which bade him expect at the end of ten years the aid of a foreign nation marked ike the Egyptians themselves with the ancient ite of circumcision. The character of these de iverers and th nature of the deliverance will be hereafter explained and I shall step over the interval of eleven centuries to observe the pres ent misery of the Jacobites of Egypt The popu lous city of Cairo affords a residence or rather a shelter for their indigent patriarch and a rem nant of ten bishops forty monasteries have sur vived the inroads of the Arabs and the prog re s of servitude and apostasy has reduced the Coptic nation to the despicable number of twenty five or thirty thousand famil es [145] a race of illiterate beggars whose only consola tion is derived from the superior wretchedness of the Greek patriarch and his diminutive con gregation [149]

VI The Coptic patriarch, a rebel to the Cæ sars, or a slave to the Caliphs still gloried in the filial obedience of the kings of Nubia and Ethiopia. He repaid their homage by magni fying their greatness and it was boldly asserted that they cou d bring into the field a hundred thousand horse with an equal number of cam els [150] that their hand could pour or restrain the waters of the Nile [151] and the peace and plenty of Egypt was obtained, even in this world by the intercession of the patriarch In exile at Constantinople Theodosius recommended to his patroness the conversion of the black nations of Nubia, from the tropic of Cancer to the con fines of Abyssinia [152] Her design was suspected and emulated by the more orthodox emperor The rival missionaries a Melchite and a Jacob ite embarked at the same time but the em press from a motive of love or fear was more effectually obeyed and the Catholic priest was detained by the president of Thebais while the king of Nubia and his court were hastily bap tised in the faith of Dioscorus The tardy envoy of Justinian was received and dismissed with honour but when he accused the heresy and treason of the Egyptians the negro convert was instructed to reply that he would never aban don his brethren the true believers to the per secuting ministers of the synod of Chalcedon.[153] During several ages the bishops of Nubia were named and consecrated by the Jacobite patri arch of Alexandria as late as the twelfth cen tury Christianity prevailed and some rites some ruins, are still visible in the savage towns of Sennaar and Dongola.[154] But the Nubians at length executed their threats of returning to the worship of idols the climate required the indul gence of polygamy and they have finally pre ferred the triumph of the Koran to the abase ment of the Cross. A metaphysical religion may appear too refined for the capacity of the negro race yet a black or a parrot might be taught to repeat the words of the Chalcedonian or Mono physite creed

Christianity was more deeply rooted in the Abyssinian empire and although the corre spondence has been sometimes interrupted above seventy or a hundred years the mother church of Alexandria retains her colony in a state of perpetual pupilage Seven bishops once composed the Æthiopic synod had their num ber amounted to ten they might have elected an independent primate and one of their kings was ambitious of promoting his brother to the ecclesiastical throne. But the event was fore seen the increase was denied the episcopal office has been gradually confined to the abuna [155] the head and author of the Abyssinian priest hood the patriarch supplies each vacancy with an Egyptian monk and the character of a stranger appears more venerable in the eyes of the people less dangerous in those of the mon arch. In the sixth century when the schism of Egypt was confirmed the rival chiefs with their patrons Justinian and Theodora strove to outstrip each oth r in the conquest of a remote and independent province The industry of the empress was again victorious and the pious Theodora has established in that sequestered church the faith and discipline of the Jacob ites [156] Encompassed on all sides by the enemies of their religion the Æthiopians slept near a thousand years, forgetful of the world by whom they were forgotten They were awakened by the Portuguese who turning the southern promontory of Africa appeared in India and the Red Sea as if they had descended through the air from a distant planet In the first moments of their interview, the subjects of Rome and Alexandria observed the resemblance rather than the difference of their faith, and each nation expected the most important benefits from an alliance with their Christian brethren In their lonely situation the Æthiopians had almost relapsed into the savage life Their vessels which had traded to Ceylon scarcely presumed to navigate the rivers of Africa the ruins of Axume were deserted, the nation was scattered in villages and the emperor, a pompous name, was content both in peace and war with the movable residence of a camp Conscious of their own indigence the Abyssinians had formed the rational project of importing the arts and ingenuity of Europe [157] and their ambassadors at Rome and Lisbon were instructed to solicit a colony of smiths carpenters tilers, masons printers surgeons and physicians for the use of their country But the public danger soon called for the instant and effectual aid of arms and soldiers to defend an unwarlike people from the barbarians who ravaged the inland country and the Turks and Arabs who advanced from the sea-coast in more formidable array Æthiopia was saved by four hundred and fifty Portuguese who displayed in the field the native valour of Europeans, and the artificial powers of the musket and cannon In a moment of terror the emperor had promised to reconcile himself and his subjects to the Catholic faith a Latin patriarch represented the supremacy of the pope [158] the empire enlarged in a tenfold proportion was supposed to contain more gold than the mines of America and the wildest hopes of avarice and zeal were built on the willing submission of the Christians of Africa

But the vows which pain had extorted were forsworn on the return of health. The Abyssinians still adhered with unshaken constancy to the Monophysite faith, their languid belief was inflamed by the exercise of dispute they branded the Latins with the names of Arians and Nestorians, and imputed the adoration of four gods to those who separated the two natures of Christ Fremona a place of worship or rather of exile was assigned to the Jesuit missionaries Their skill in the liberal and mechanic arts, their theological learning and the decency of their manners inspired a barren esteem but they were not endowed with the gift of miracles,[159] and they vainly solicited a reinforcement of European troops The patience and dexterity of forty years at length obtained a more favourable audience, and two emperors of Abyssinia were persuaded that Rome could insure the temporal and everlasting happiness of her votaries The first of these royal converts lost his crown and his life and the rebel army was sanctified by the abuna who hurled an anathema at the apostate and absolved his subjects from their oath of fidelity The fate of Zadenghel was revenged by the courage and fortune of Susneus, who ascended the throne under the name of Segued and more vigorously prosecuted the pious enterprise of his kinsman After the amusement of some unequal combats between the Jesuits and his illiterate priests, the emperor declared himself a proselyte to the synod of Chalcedon presuming that his clergy and people would embrace without delay the religion of their prince The liberty of choice was succeeded by a law which imposed under pain of death the belief of the two natures of Christ the Abyssinians were enjoined to work and to play on the Sabbath and Segued in the face of Europe and Africa renounced his connection with the Alexandrian church A Jesuit, Alphonso Mendez the Catholic patriarch of Æthiopia accepted, in the name of Urban VIII the homage and abjuration of his penitent I confess said the emperor on his knees, I confess that the pope is the vicar of Christ, the successor of St Peter and the sovereign of the world To him I swear true obedience, and at his feet I offer my person and kingdom A similar oath was repeated by his son his brother the clergy the nobles and even the ladies of the court the Latin patriarch was invested with honours and wealth and his missionaries erected their churches or citadels in the most convenient stations of the empire The Jesuits themselves deplore the fatal indiscretion of their chief who forgot the mildness of the gospel and the policy of his order to introduce with hasty violence the liturgy of Rome and the inquisition of Portugal He condemned the ancient practice of circumcision which health rather than superstition had first invented in the climate of Æthiopia [160] A new baptism a new ordination was inflicted on the natives and they trembled with horror when the most holy of the dead were torn from their graves when the most illustrious of the living were excommunicated by a foreign priest In the defence of their religion and liberty the Abyssinians rose in arms with desperate but unsuccessful zeal! Five rebellions were extinguished in the blood of the insurgents; two abunas were slain in battle; whole legions were slaughtered in the field, or suffocated in their caverns; and neither merit, nor rank, nor sex could save from an ignominious death the enemies of Rome. But the victorious monarch was finally subdued by the constancy of the nation, of his mother, of his son, and of his most faithful friends. Segued listened to the voice of pity, of reason, perhaps of fear, and his edict of liberty of conscience instantly revealed the tyranny and weakness of the Jesuits. On the death of his father, Basilides expelled the Latin patriarch, and restored to the wishes of the nation the faith and discipline of Egypt. The Monophysite churches resounded with a song of triumph, "that the sheep of Æthiopia were now delivered from the hyænas of the West"; and the gates of that solitary realm were for ever shut against the arts, the science, and the fanaticism of Europe.[141]

CHAPTER XLVIII

Plan of the last two [quarto] Volumes. Succession and Characters of the Greek Emperors of Constantinople, from the Time of Heraclius to the Latin Conquest

I HAVE now deduced from Trajan to Constantine, from Constantine to Heraclius, the regular series of the Roman emperors; and faithfully exposed the prosperous and adverse fortunes of their reigns. Five centuries of the decline and fall of the empire have already elapsed; but a period of more than eight hundred years still separates me from the term of my labours, the taking of Constantinople by the Turks. Should I persevere in the same course, should I observe the same measure, a prolix and slender thread would be spun through many a volume, nor would the patient reader find an adequate reward of instruction or amusement. At every step, as we sink deeper in the decline and fall of the Eastern empire, the annals of each succeeding reign would impose a more ungrateful and melancholy task. These annals must continue to repeat a tedious and uniform tale of weakness and misery; the natural connection of causes and events would be broken by frequent and hasty transitions, and a minute accumulation of circumstances must destroy the light and effect of those general pictures which compose the use and ornament of a remote history. From the time of Heraclius, the Byzantine theatre is contracted and darkened: the line of empire, which had been defined by the laws of Justinian and the arms of Belisarius, recedes on all sides from our view; the Roman name, the proper subject of our inquiries, is reduced to a narrow corner of Europe, to the lonely suburbs of Constantinople; and the fate of the Greek empire has been compared to that of the Rhine, which loses itself in the sands before its waters can mingle with the ocean. The scale of dominion is diminished to our view by the distance of time and place; nor is the loss of external splendour compensated by the nobler gifts of virtue and genius. In the last moments of her decay, Constantinople was doubtless more opulent and populous than Athens at her most flourishing era, when a scanty sum of six thousand talents, or twelve hundred thousand pounds sterling, was possessed by twenty-one thousand male citizens of an adult age. But each of these citizens was a freeman, who dared to assert the liberty of his thoughts, words, and actions; whose person and property were guarded by equal law; and who exercised his independent vote in the government of the republic. Their numbers seem to be multiplied by the strong and various discriminations of character: under the shield of freedom, on the wings of emulation and vanity, each Athenian aspired to the level of the national dignity; from this commanding eminence some chosen spirits soared beyond the reach of a vulgar eye; and the chances of superior merit in a great and populous kingdom, as they are proved by experience, would excuse the computation of imaginary millions. The territories of Athens, Sparta, and their allies do not exceed a moderate province of France or England; but after the trophies of Salamis and Platæa, they expand in our fancy to the gigantic size of Asia, which had been trampled under the feet of the victorious Greeks. But the subjects of the Byzantine empire, who assume and dishonour the names both of Greeks and Romans, present a dead uniformity of abject vices, which are neither softened by the weakness of humanity nor animated by the vigour of memorable crimes. The freemen of antiquity might repeat with generous enthusiasm the sentence of Homer, "that on the first day of his servitude the captive is deprived of one half of his manly virtue But the poet had only seen the effects of civil or domestic slavery nor could he foretell that the second moiety of manhood must be annihilated by the spiritual despotism which shackles not only the actions but even the thoughts of the prostrate votary By this double yoke the Greeks were oppressed under the successors of Heraclius the tyrant a law of eternal justice was degraded by the vices of his subjects and on the throne in the camp in the schools we search perhaps with fruitless diligence the names and characters that may deserve to be rescued from oblivion Nor are the defects of the subject compensated by the skill and variety of the painters Of a space of eight hundred years, the four first centuries are overspread with a cloud interrupted by some faint and broken rays of historic light in the lives of the emperors from Maurice to Alexius Basil the Macedonian has alone been the theme of a separate work and the absence or loss, or imperfection of contemporary evidence must be poorly supplied by the doubtful authority of more recent compilers The four last centuries are exempt from the reproach of penury and with the Comnenian family the historic muse of Constantinople again revives but her apparel is gaudy her motions are without elegance or grace A succession of priests or courtiers treads in each other s footsteps in the same path of servitude and superstition their views are narrow their judgment is feeble or corrupt and we close the volume of copious barrenness, still ignorant of the causes of events the characters of the actors and the manners of the times, which they celebrate or deplore The observation which has been applied to a man may be extended to a whole people that the energy of the sword is communicated to the pen and it will be found by experience that the tone of history will rise or fall with the spirit of the age

From these considerations I should have abandoned without regret the Greek slaves and their servile historians had I not reflected that the fate of the Byzantine monarchy is passively connected with the most splendid and important revolutions which have changed the state of the world The space of the lost provinces was immediately replenished with new colonies and rising kingdoms the active virtues of peace and war deserted from the vanquished to the victorious nations and it is in their origin and conquests in their religion and government that we must explore the causes and effects of the decline and fall of the Eastern empire Nor will this scope of narrative the riches and variety of these materials be incompatible with the unity of design and composition As in his daily prayers the Musulman of Fez or Delhi still turns his face towards the temple of Mecca the historian s eye shall be always fixed on the city of Constantinople The excursive line may embrace the wilds of Arabia and Tartary, but the circle will be ultimately reduced to the decreasing limit of the Roman monarchy

On this principle I shall now establish the plan of the last two volumes of the present work The first chapter will contain in a regular series the emperors who reigned at Constantinople during a period of six hundred years, from the days of Heraclius to the Latin conquest a rapid abstract which may be supported by a general appeal to the order and text of the original historians In this introduction I shall confine myself to the revolutions of the throne, the succession of families the personal characters of the Greek princes, the mode of their life and death the maxims and influence of their domestic government and the tendency of their reign to accelerate or suspend the downfall of the Eastern empire Such a chronological review will serve to illustrate the various argument of the subsequent chapters and each circumstance of the eventful story of the barbarians will adapt itself in a proper place to the Byzantine annals The internal state of the empire and the dangerous heresy of the Paulicians, which shook the East and enlightened the West will be the subject of two separate chapters but these inquiries must be postponed till our farther progress shall have opened the view of the world in the ninth and tenth centuries of the Christian era After this foundation of Byzantine history the following nations will pass before our eyes and each will occupy the space to which it may be entitled by greatness or merit, or the degree of connection with the Roman world and the present age I The FRANKS a general appellation which includes all the barbarians of France Italy and Germany who were united by the sword and sceptre of Charlemagne The persecution of images and their votaries separated Rome and Italy from the Byzantine throne and prepared the restoration of the Roman empire in the West II The ARABS or SARACENS Three ample chapters will be devoted to this curious and interesting object In the first after a picture of the country and its inhabitants I shall investigate the character of Mohammed the character religion and suc cess of the prophet In the second I shall lead the Arabs to the conquest of Syria Egypt and Africa the provinces of the Roman empire nor can I check their victorious career till they have overthrown the monarchies of Persia and Spain In the third I shall inquire how Constantinople and Europe were saved by the luxury and arts the division and decay of the empire of the ca liphs A single chapter will include III The BULGARIANS, IV HUNGARIANS, and V RUSSIANS, who assaulted by sea or by land the prov inces and the capital but the last of these so important in their present greatness will excite ne curiosity in their origin and infancy VI ie NORMANS or rather the private adventur s of that warlike people, who founded a werful kingdom in Apulia and Sicily shook e throne of Constantinople displayed the ophies of chivalry and almost realised the onders of romance VII The LATINS the subjects of the pope the nations of the West who nlisted under the banner of the cross for the ecovery or relief of the holy sepulchre The Greek emperors were terrified and preserved y the myriads of pilgrims who marched to erusalem with Godfrey of Bouillon and the eers of Christendom The second and third rusades trod in the foot teps of the first Asia and Europe were mingl d in a sacred war of wo hundred years and the Christian powers were bravely resisted and finally expelled by Saladin and the Mamalukes of Egypt In these memorable crusades a fleet and army of French and Venetians were diverted from Syria to the Thracian Bosphorus they assaulted the capital they subverted the Greek monarchy and a dynasty of Latin princes was seated near three score years on the throne of Constantine VIII The GREEKS themselves during this period of captivity and exile must be considered as a foreign nation the enemies and again the sov ereigns of Constantinople Misfortune had re kindled a spark of national virtue and the Im perial series may be continued with some dig nity from their restoration to the Turkish con quest IX The MOGULS and TARTARS By the arms of Zingis and his descendants the globe was shaken from China to Poland and Greece the sultans were overthrown the caliphs fell and the Cæsars trembled on their throne The victories of Timour suspended above fifty years the final ruin of the Byzantine empire X I have already noticed the first appearance of the TURKS and the names of the names of the fathers of Seljuk and Othman discriminate the two successive dynasties of the nation which emerged in the eleventh century from the Scyth ian wilderness The former established a po tent and splendid kingdom from the banks of the Oxus to Antioch and Nice and the first crusade was provoked by the violation of Jeru salem and the danger of Constantinople From a humble origin the Ottomans arose the scourge and terror of Christendom Constantinople was besieged and taken by Mohammed II and his triumph annihilates the remnant the image the title of the Roman empire in the East The schism of the Greeks will be connected with their last calamities and the restoration of learn ing in the Western world I shall return from the captivity of the new to the ruins of ancient ROME and the venerable name the interesting theme will shed a ray of glory on the conclu sion of my labours

THE emperor Heraclius had punished a tyrant and ascended his throne and the memory of his reign is perpetuated by the transient conquest and irreparable loss of the Eastern provinces After the death of Eudocia, his first wife he disobeyed the patriarch and violated the laws by his second marriage with his niece Martina and the superstition of the Greeks beheld the judgment of Heaven in the diseases of the father and the deformity of his offspring But the opinion of an illegitimate birth is sufficient to distract the choice and loosen the obedience of the people the ambition of Martina was quickened by maternal love and perhaps by the envy of a stepmother and the aged husband was too feeble to withstand the arts of conjugal allurements Constantine his eldest son enjoyed in a mature age the title of Augustus but the weakness of his constitu tion required a colleague and a guardian and he yielded with secret reluctance to the parti tion of the empire. The senate was summoned to the palace to ratify or attest the association of Heracleonas the son of Martina the imposi tion of the diadem was consecrated by the pray er and blessing of the patriarch the senators and patricians adored the majesty of the great emperor and the partners of his reign and as soon as the doors were thrown open they were hailed by the tumultuary but important voice of the soldiers After an interval of five months the pompous ceremonies which formed the essence of the Byzantine state were celebrated in the cathedral and the hippodrome the concord of the royal brothers was affectedly displayed by th younger leaning on the arm of the elder and the name of Martina was mingled in the reluctant or venal acclamations of the people. Heraclius survived this association about two years his last testimony declared his two sons the equal heirs of the Eastern empire and commanded them to honour his widow Martina as their mother and their sovereign

When Martina first appeared on the throne with the name and attributes of royalty, she was checked by a firm, though respectful opposition, and the dying embers of freedom were kindled by the breath of superstitious prejudice 'We reverence,' exclaimed the voice of a citizen "we reverence the mother of our princes but to those princes alone our obedience is due, and Constantine the elder emperor is of an age to sustain in his own hands, the weight of the sceptre Your sex is excluded by nature from the toils of government How could you combat how could you answer, the barbarians who with hostile or friendly intentions may approach the royal city? May Heaven avert from the Roman republic this national disgrace which would provoke the patience of the slaves of Persia!' Martina descended from the throne with indignation and sought a refuge in the female apartment of the palace The reign of Constantine the Third lasted only one hundred and three days he expired in the thirtieth year of his age, and although his life had been a long malady a belief was entertained that poison had been the means and his cruel stepmother the author of his untimely fate Martina reaped indeed the harvest of his death, and assumed the government in the name of the surviving emperor but the incestuous widow of Heraclius was universally abhorred the jealousy of the people was awakened and the two orphans whom Constantine had left became the objects of the public care It was in vain that the son of Martina who was no more than fifteen years of age was taught to declare himself the guardian of his nephews one of whom he had presented at the baptismal font it was in vain that he swore on the wood of the true cross to defend them against all their enemies On his deathbed the late emperor had despatched a trusty servant to arm the troops and provinces of the East in the defence of his helpless children the eloquence and liberality of Valentin had been successful and from his camp of Chalcedon he boldly demanded the punishment of the assassins and the restoration of the lawful heir The licence of the soldiers who devoured the grapes and drank the wine of their Asiatic vineyards provoked the citizens of Constantinople against the domestic authors of their calamities and the dome of St Sophia re-echoed, not with prayers and hymns, but with the clamours and imprecations of an enraged multitude At their imperious command Heracleonas appeared in the pulpit with the eldest of the royal orphans Constans alone was saluted as emperor of the Romans, and a crown of gold, which had been taken from the tomb of Heraclius, was placed on his head with the solemn benediction of the patriarch. But, in the tumult of joy and indignation, the church was pillaged, the sanctuary was polluted by a promiscuous crowd of Jews and barbarians, and the Monothelite Pyrrhus, a creature of the empress, after dropping a protestation on the altar, escaped by a prudent flight from the zeal of the Catholics A more serious and bloody task was reserved for the senate who derived a temporary strength from the consent of the soldiers and people The spirit of Roman freedom revived the ancient and awful examples of the judgment of tyrants and the Imperial culprits were deposed and condemned as the authors of the death of Constantine But the severity of the conscript fathers was stained by the indiscriminate punishment of the innocent and the guilty Martina and Heracleonas were sentenced to the amputation the former of her tongue the latter of his nose and after this cruel execution they consumed the remainder of their days in exile and oblivion The Greeks who were capable of reflection might find some consolation for their servitude by observing the abuse of power when it was lodged for a moment in the hands of an aristocracy

We shall imagine ourselves transported five hundred years backwards to the age of the Antonines if we listen to the oration which Constans II pronounced in the twelfth year of his age before the Byzantine senate After returning his thanks for the just punishment of the assassins who had intercepted the fairest hopes of his father's reign By the divine Providence, said the young emperor and by your righteous decree Martina and her incestuous progeny have been cast headlong from the throne Your majesty and wisdom have prevented the Roman state from degenerating into lawless tyranny I therefore exhort and beseech you to stand forth as the counsellors and judges of the common safety The senators were gratified by the respectful address and liberal donative of their sovereign but these servile Greeks were unworthy and regardless of freedom and in his mind the lesson of an hour was quickly erased by the prejudices of the age and the habits of despotism He retained only a jealous fear lest the senate or people should one day invade the right of primogeniture and seat his brother Theodosius on an equal throne By the imposition of holy orders the grandson of Heraclius was disqualified for the purple but this ceremony which seemed to profane the sacraments of the church, was insufficient to appease the suspicions of the tyrant and the death of the deacon Theodosius could alone expiate the crime of his royal birth. His murder was avenged by the imprecations of the people and the assassin, in the fulness of power was driven from his capital into voluntary and perpetual exile Constans embarked for Greece and as if he meant to retort the abhorrence which he deserved he is said, from the imperial galley to have spit against the walls of his native city After passing the winter at Athens he sailed to Tarentum in Italy visited Rome and concluded a long pilgrimage of disgrace and sacrilegious rapine by fixing his residence at Syracuse But if Constans could fly from his people he could not fly from himself The remorse of his conscience created a phantom who pursued him by land and sea, by day and by night and the visionary Theodosius presenting to his lips a cup of blood said or seemed to say Drink, brother drink —a sure emblem of the aggravation of his guilt since he had received from the hands of the deacon the mystic cup of the blood of Christ. Odious to himself and to mankind Constans perished by domestic perhaps by episcopal treason in the capital of Sicily A servant who waited in the bath after pouring warm water on his head struck him violently with the vase He fell stunned by the blow and suffocated by the water and his attendants who wondered at the tedious delay beheld with indifference the corpse of their lifeless emperor The troops of Sicily invested with the purple an obscure youth, whose inimitable beauty eluded and it might easily elude the declining art of the painters and sculptors of the age

Constans had left in the Byzantine palace three sons the eldest of whom had been clothed in his infancy with the purple When the father summoned them to attend his person in Sicily these precious hostages were detained by the Greeks and a firm refusal informed him that they were the children of the state The news of his murder was conveyed with almost supernatural speed from Syracuse to Constantinople and Constantine, the eldest of his sons, inherited his throne without being the heir of the public hatred. His subjects contributed with zeal and alacrity to chastise the guilt and presumption of a province which had usurped the rights of the senate and people the young emperor sailed from the Hellespont with a powerful fleet and the legions of Rome and Carthage were assembled under his standard in the harbour of Syracuse The defeat of the Sicilian tyrant was easy his punishment just and his beauteous head was exposed in the hippodrome but I cannot applaud the clemency of a prince who, among a crowd of victims condemned the son of a patrician for deploring with some bitterness the execution of a virtuous father The youth was castrated he survived the operation, and the memory of this indecent cruelty is preserved by the elevation of Germanus to the rank of a patriarch and saint. After pouring this bloody libation on his father's tomb Constantine returned to his capital and the growth of his young beard during the Sicilian voyage was announced by the familiar surname of Pogonatus to the Grecian world But his reign like that of his predecessor was stained with fraternal discord On his two brothers Heraclius and Tiberius he had bestowed the title of Augustus —an empty title for they continued to languish, without trust or power in the solitude of the palace. At their secret instigation the troops of the Anatolian theme or province approached the city on the Asiatic side demanded for the royal brothers the partition or exercise of sovereignty, and supported their seditious claim by a theological argument They were Christians they cried and orthodox Catholics the sincere votaries of the holy and undivided Trinity Since there are three equal persons in heaven it is reasonable there should be three equal persons upon earth. The emperor invited these learned divines to a friendly conference in which they might propose their arguments to the senate they obeyed the summons but the prospect of their bodies hanging on the gibbet in the suburb of Galata reconciled their companions to the unity of the reign of Constantine. He pardoned his brothers and their names were still pronounced in the public acclamations but on the repetition or suspicion of a similar offence the obnoxious princes were deprived of their titles and noses in the presence of the Catholic bishops who were assembled at Constantinople in the sixth general synod. In the close of his life Pogonatus was anxious only to establish the right of primogeniture the heir of his two sons, Justinian and Heraclius was offered on the shrine of St. Peter as a symbol of their spiritual adoption by the pope but the elder was alone exalted to the rank of Augustus and the assur ance of the empire

After the decease of his father the inheritance of the Roman world devolved to Justinian II and the name of a triumphant lawgiver was dishonoured by the vices of a boy, who imitated his namesake only in the expensive luxury of building His passions were strong his under standing was feeble and he was intoxicated with a foolish pride that his birth had given him the command of millions of whom the smallest community would not have chosen him for their local magistrate His favourite ministers were two beings the least susceptible of human sympathy, a eunuch and a monk to the one he abandoned the palace to the other the finances, the former corrected the emperor's mother with a scourge, the latter suspended the insolvent tributaries with their heads downwards, over a slow and smoky fire Since the days of Com modus and Caracalla the cruelty of the Roman princes had most commonly been the effect of their fear but Justinian who possessed some vigour of character, enjoyed the sufferings and braved the revenge of his subjects about ten years till the measure was full of his crimes and of their patience In a dark dungeon Leontius, a general of reputation had groaned above three years with some of the noblest and most deserving of the patricians he was suddenly drawn forth to assume the government of Greece and this promotion of an injured man was a mark of the contempt rather than of the confidence of his prince As he was followed to the port by the kind offices of his friends Leon tius observed with a sigh, that he was a victim adorned for sacrifice and that inevitable death would pursue his footsteps They ventured to reply that glory and empire might be the rec ompence of a generous resolution that every order of men abhorred the reign of a monster and that the hands of two hundred thousand patriots expected only the voice of a leader The night was chosen for their deliverance and in the first effort of the conspirators the præfect was slain and the prisons were forced open the emissaries of Leontius proclaimed in every street Christians to St Sophia! and the seasonable text of the patriarch 'This is the day of the Lord! was the prelude of an in flammatory sermon From the church the people adjourned to the hippodrome Justinian in whose cause not a sword had been drawn was dragged before these tumultuary judges and their clamours demanded the instant death of the tyrant But Leontius who was already clothed with the purple cast an eye of pity on the prostrate son of his own benefactor and of so many emperors The life of Justinian was spared the amputation of his nose, perhaps of his tongue was imperfectly performed the hap py flexibility of the Greek language could im pose the name of Rhinotmetus and the muti lated tyrant was banished to Chersonæ in Crim Tartary, a lonely settlement, where corn wine and oil were imported as foreign luxuries.

On the edge of the Scythian wilderness Jus tinian still cherished the pride of his birth and the hope of his restoration After three years exile he received the pleasing intelligence that his injury was avenged by a second revolution and that Leontius in his turn had been de throned and mutilated by the rebel Apsimar who assumed the more respectable name of Ti berius But the claim of lineal succession was still formidable to a plebeian usurper and his jealousy was stimulated by the complaints and charges of the Chersonites who beheld the vices of the tyrant in the spirit of the exile With a band of followers attached to his person by common hope or common despair Justinian fled from the inhospitable shore to the horde of the Chozars who pitched their tents between the Tanais and Borysthenes The khan enter tained with piety and respect the royal suppli ant Phanagoria once an opulent city, on the Asiatic side of the lake Mæotis was assigned for his residence, and every Roman prejudice was stifled in his marriage with the sister of the barbarian who seems however from the name of Theodora to have received the sacrament of baptism But the faithless Chozar was soon tempted by the gold of Constantinople and had not the design been revealed by the con jugal love of Theodora her husband must have been assassinated or betrayed into the power of his enemies After strangling with his own hands the two emissaries of the khan Justinian sent back his wife to her brother and embarked on the Euxine in search of new and more faith ful allies His vessel was assaulted by a violent tempest and one of his pious companions ad vised him to deserve the mercy of God by a vow of general forgiveness if he should be restored to the throne Of forgiveness? replied the in trepid tyrant may I perish this instant—may the Almighty whelm me in the waves if I con sent to spare a single head of my enemies!' He survived this impious menace sailed into the mouth of the Danube trusted his person in the royal village of the Bulgarians and purchased the aid of Terbelis a pagan conqueror by the promise of his daughter and a fair partition of the treasures of the empire The Bulgarian kingdom extended to the confines of Thrace and the two princes besieged Constantinople at the head of fifteen thousand horse Apsimar was dismayed by the sudden and hostile apparition of his rival whose head had been promised by the Chozar and of whose evasion he was yet ignorant After an absence of ten years the crimes of Justinian were faintly remembered and the birth and misfortunes of their hereditary sovereign excited the pity of the multitude ever discontented with the ruling powers and by the active diligence of his adherents he was introduced into the city and palace of Constantine

In rewarding his allies and recalling his wife Justinian displayed some sense of honour and gratitude and Terbelis retired after sweeping away a heap of gold coin which he measured with his Scythian whip But never was vow more religiously performed than the sacred oath of revenge which he had sworn amidst the storms of the Euxine The two usurpers for I must reserve the name of tyrant for the conqueror were dragged into the hippodrome the one from his prison the other from his palace Before their execution Leontius and Apsimar were cast prostrate in chains beneath the throne of the emperor and Justinian planting a foot on each of their necks contemplated above an hour the chariot race while the inconstant people shouted, in the words of the Psalmist, Thou shalt trample on the asp and basilisk and on the lion and dragon shalt thou set thy foot[1] The universal defection which he had once experienced might provoke him to repeat the wish of Caligula that the Roman people had but one head Yet I shall presume to observe that such a wish is unworthy of an ingenious tyrant, since his revenge and cruelty would have been extinguished by a single blow instead of the slow variety of tortures which Justinian inflicted on the victims of his anger His pleasures were inexhaustible neither private virtue nor public service could expiate the guilt of active or even passive obedience to an established government and, during the six years of his new reign, he considered the axe the cord and the rack as the only instruments of royalty But his most implacable hatred was pointed against the Chersonites who had insulted his exile and violated the laws of hospitality Their remote situation afforded some means of defence or at least of escape and a grievous tax was imposed on Constantinople to supply the preparations of a fleet and army ' All are guilty and all must perish, was the mandate of Justinian and the bloody execution was intrusted to his favourite Stephen, who was recommended by the epithet of the Savage Yet even the savage Stephen imperfectly accomplished the intentions of his sovereign The slowness of his attack allowed the greater part of the inhabitants to withdraw into the country and the minister of vengeance contented himself with reducing the youth of both sexes to a state of servitude with roasting alive seven of the principal citizens, with drowning twenty in the sea, and with reserving forty two in chains to receive their doom from the mouth of the emperor In their return the fleet was driven on the rocky shores of Anatolia and Justinian applauded the obedience of the Euxine, which had involved so many thousands of his subjects and enemies in a common shipwreck but the tyrant was still insatiate of blood and a second expedition was commanded to extirpate the remains of the proscribed colony In the short interval the Chersonites had returned to their city and were prepared to die in arms the khan of the Chozars had renounced the cause of his odious brother the exiles of every province were assembled in Tauris and Bardanes, under the name of Philippicus was invested with the purple The Imperial troops unwilling and unable to perpetrate the revenge of Justinian escaped his displeasure by abjuring his allegiance the fleet under their new sovereign, steered back a more auspicious course to the harbours of Sinope and Constantinople and every tongue was prompt to pronounce every hand to execute the death of the tyrant Destitute of friends he was deserted by his barbarian guards and the stroke of the assassin was praised as an act of patriotism and Roman virtue. His son Tiberius had taken refuge in a church his aged grandmother guarded the door and the innocent youth, suspending round his neck the most formidable relics embraced with one hand the altar with the other the wood of the true cross But the popular fury that dares to trample on superstition is deaf to the cries of humanity and the race of Heraclius was extinguished after a reign of one hundred years

Between the fall of the Heraclian and the rise of the Isaurian dynasty a short interval of six years is divided into three reigns Bardanes or Philippicus, was hailed at Constantinople as a hero who had delivered his country from a tyrant and he might taste some moments of happiness in the first transports of sincere and

universal joy Justinian had left behind him an ample treasure the fruit of cruelty and rapine but this useful fund was soon and idly dissipated by his successor On the festival of his birthday Philippicus entertained the multitude with the games of the hippodrome from thence he paraded through the streets with a thousand banners and a thousand trumpets refreshed himself in the baths of Zeuxippus, and returning to the palace, entertained his nobles with a sumptuous banquet At the meridian hour he withdrew to his chamber, intoxicated with flattery and wine and forgetful that his example had made every subject ambitious and that every ambitious subject was his secret enemy Some bold conspirators introduced themselves in the disorder of the feast and the slumbering monarch was surprised bound blinded and deposed before he was sensible of his danger Yet the traitors were deprived of their reward and the free voice of the senate and people promoted Artemius from the office of secretary to that of emperor he assumed the title of Anastasius the Second, and displayed in a short and troubled reign the virtues both of peace and war But after the extinction of the Imperial line the rule of obedience was violated and every change diffused the seeds of new revolutions In a mutiny of the fleet an obscure and reluctant officer of the revenue was forcibly invested with the purple after some months of a naval war, Anastasius resigned the sceptre and the conqueror, Theodosius the Third submitted in his turn to the superior ascendant of Leo the general and emperor of the Oriental troops His two predecessors were permitted to embrace the ecclesiastical profession the restless impatience of Anastasius tempted him to risk and to lose his life in a treasonable enterprise, but the last days of Theodosius were honourable and secure The single sublime word, ' HEALTH which he inscribed on his tomb expresses the confidence of philosophy or religion and the fame of his miracles was long preserved among the people of Ephesus This convenient shelter of the church might sometimes impose a lesson of clemency but it may be questioned whether it is for the public interest to diminish the perils of unsuccessful ambition

I have dwelt on the fall of a tyrant I shall briefly represent the founder of a new dynasty who is known to posterity by the invectives of his enemies and whose public and private life is involved in the ecclesiastical story of the Iconoclasts Yet in spite of the clamours of superstition a favourable prejudice for the character of Leo the Isaurian may be reasonably drawn from the obscurity of his birth and the duration of his reign.—I In an age of manly spirit the prospect of an Imperial reward would have kindled every energy of the mind and produced a crowd of competitors as deserving as they were desirous to reign Even in the corruption and debility of the modern Greeks the elevation of a plebeian from the last to the first rank of society supposes some qualifications above the level of the multitude. He would probably be ignorant and disdainful of speculative science and in the pursuit of fortune he might absolve himself from the obligations of benevolence and justice but to his character we may ascribe the useful virtues of prudence and fortitude the knowledge of mankind, and the important art of gaining their confidence and directing their passions It is agreed that Leo was a native of Isauria and that Conon was his primitive name The writers whose awkward satire is praise describe him as an itinerant pedlar who drove an ass with some paltry merchandise to the country fairs and foolishly relate that he met on the road some Jewish fortune tellers who promised him the Roman empire on condition that he should abolish the worship of idols A more probable account relates the migration of his father from Asia Minor to Thrace where he exercised the lucrative trade of a grazier and he must have acquired considerable wealth since the first introduction of his son was procured by a supply of five hundred sheep to the Imperial camp. His first service was in the guards of Justinian where he soon attracted the notice, and by degrees the jealousy of the tyrant His valour and dexterity were conspicuous in the Colchian war from Anastasius he received the command of the Anatolian legions and by the suffrage of the soldiers he was raised to the empire with the general applause of the Roman world —II In this dangerous elevation Leo the Third supported himself against the envy of his equals the discontent of a powerful faction and the assaults of his foreign and domestic enemies The Catholics who accuse his religious innovations are obliged to confess that they were undertaken with temper and conducted with firmness Their silence respects the wisdom of his administration and the purity of his manners After a reign of twenty four years he peaceably expired in the palace of Constantinople and the purple which he had acquired was transmitted by the right of inheritance to the third generation

In a long reign of thirty four years the son and successor of Leo Constantine the Fifth surnamed Copronymus attacked with less temperate zeal the images or idols of the church Their votaries have exhausted the bitterness of religious gall in their portrait of this spotted panther this antichrist this flying dragon of the serpent's seed, who surpassed the vices of Elagabalus and Nero His reign was a long butchery of whatever was most noble or holy or innocent in his empire In person the emperor assisted at the execution of his victims surveyed their agonies listened to their groans and indulged without satiating his appetite for blood plate of noses was accepted as a grateful offering and his domestics were often scourged r mutilated by the royal hand His surname was derived from his pollution of his baptismal font. capital yet the clergy the senate, and the people of Constantinople adhered to the cause of Michael, and the troops and treasures of Asia might have protracted the mischiefs of civil war But his humanity (by the ambitious it will be termed his weakness) protested that not a drop of Christian blood should be shed in his quarrel and his messengers presented the conquerors with the keys of the city and the palace. They were disarmed by his innocence and submission his life and his eyes were spared and the Imperial monk enjoyed the comforts of solitude and religion above thirty two years after he had been stripped of the purple and separated from his wife.

A rebel, in the time of Nicephorus, the famous and unfortunate Bardanes, had once the curiosity to consult an Asiatic prophet who, after prognosticating his fall announced the fortunes of his three principal officers, Leo the Armenian Michael the Phrygian and Thomas the Cappadocian the successive reigns of the two former, the fruitless and fatal enterprise of the third. This prediction was verified or rather was produced, by the event. Ten years afterwards, when the Thracian camp rejected the husband of Procopia the crown was presented to the same Leo, the first in military rank and the secret author of the mutiny As he affected to hesitate "With this sword said his companion Michael I will open the gates of Constantinople to your Imperial sway or instantly plunge it into your bosom if you obstinately resist the just desires of your fellow-soldiers. The compliance of the Armenian was rewarded with the empire, and he reigned seven years and a half under the name of Leo the Fifth Educated in a camp, and ignorant both of laws and letters he introduced into his civil government the rigour and even cruelty of military discipline but if his severity was sometimes dangerous to the innocent it was always formidable to the guilty His religious inconstancy was taxed by the epithet of Chameleon, but the Catholics have acknowledged by the voice of a saint and confessors, that the life of the Iconoclast was useful to the republic. The zeal of his companion Michael was repaid with riches, honours, and military command and his subordinate talents were beneficially employed in the public service. Yet the Phrygian was dissatisfied at receiving as a favour a scanty portion of the Imperial prize which he had bestowed on his equal and his discontent which sometimes evaporated in hasty discourse at length assumed a more threatening and hostile aspect against a prince whom he represented as a cruel tyrant. That tyrant, however repeatedly detected warned and dismissed the old companion of his arms, till fear and resentment prevailed over gratitude and Michael, after a scrutiny into his actions and designs, was convicted of treason and sentenced to be burnt alive in the furnace of the private baths. The devout humanity of the empress Theophano was fatal to her husband and family A solemn day the twenty-fifth of December had been fixed for the execution she urged that the anniversary of the Saviour's birth would be profaned by this inhuman spectacle, and Leo consented with reluctance to a decent respite. But on the vigil of the feast his sleepless anxiety prompted him to visit at the dead of night the chamber in which his enemy was confined he beheld him released from his chain, and stretched on his gaoler's bed in a profound slumber Leo was alarmed at these signs of security and intelligence but though he retired with silent steps, his entrance and departure were noticed by a slave who lay concealed in a corner of the prison. Under the pretence of requesting the spiritual aid of a confessor Michael informed the conspirators that their lives depended on his discretion and that a few hours were left to assure their own safety by the deliverance of their friend and country On the great festivals a chosen band of priests and chanters was admitted into the palace by a private gate to sing matins in the chapel and Leo who regulated with the same strictness the discipline of the choir and of the camp was seldom absent from these early devotions. In the ecclesiastical habit, but with swords under their robes, the conspirators mingled with the procession, lurked in the angles of the chapel and expected as a signal of murder the intonation of the first psalm by the emperor himself The imperfect light and the uniformity of dress, might have favoured his escape while their assault was pointed against a harmless priest but they soon discovered their mistake, and encompassed on all sides the royal victim. Without a weapon and without a friend he grasped a weighty cross, and stood at bay against the hunters of his life but as he asked for mercy "This is the hour not of mercy but of vengeance" was the inexorable reply The stroke of a well aimed sword separated from his body the right arm and the cross, and Leo the Armenian was slain at the foot of the altar

A memorable reverse of fortune was displayed in Michael the Second who from a defect in his speech was surnamed the Stammerer He was snatched from the fiery furnace to the sovereignty of an empire and as in the tumult a smith could not readily be found the fetters remained on his legs several hours after he was seated on the throne of the Cæsars The royal blood which had been the price of his elevation was unprofitably spent in the purple he retained the ignoble vices of his origin and Michael lost his provinces with as supine indifference as if they had been the inheritance of his fathers His title was disputed by Thomas the last of the military triumvirate who transported into Europe fourscore thousand barbarians from the banks of the Tigris and the shores of the Caspian He formed the siege of Constantinople but the capital was defended with spiritual and carnal weapons a Bulgarian king assaulted the camp of the Orientals and Thomas had the misfortune or the weakness to fall alive into the power of the conqueror The hands and feet of the rebel were amputated he was placed on an ass, and, amidst the insults of the people was led through the streets which he sprinkled with his blood The depravation of manners as savage as they were corrupt is marked by the presence of the emperor himself Deaf to the lamentations of a fellow soldier he incessantly pressed the discovery of more accomplices till his curiosity was checked by the question of an honest or guilty minister Would you give credit to an enemy against the most faithful of your friends? After the death of his first wife the emperor at the request of the senate drew from her monastery Euphrosyne the daughter of Constantine the Sixth Her august birth might justify a stipulation in the marriage-contract that her children should equally share the empire with their elder brother But the nuptials of Michael and Euphrosyne were barren and she was content with the title of mother of Theophilus his son and successor

The character of Theophilus is a rare example in which religious zeal has allowed and perhaps magnified the virtues of a heretic and a persecutor His valour was often felt by the enemies and his justice by the subjects of the monarchy but the valour of Theophilus was rash and fruitless and his justice arbitrary and cruel. He displayed the banner of the cross against the Saracens but his five expeditions were concluded by a signal overthrow Amorium, the native city of his ancestors was levelled with the ground and from his military toils he derived only the surname of the Unfortunate. The wisdom of a sovereign is comprised in the institution of laws and the choice of magistrates and while he seems without action his civil government revolves round his centre with the silence and order of the planetary system. But the justice of Theophilus was fashioned on the model of the Oriental despots who in personal and irregular acts of authority consult the reason or passion of the moment without measuring the sentence by the law or the penalty by the offence A poor woman threw herself at the emperor's feet to complain of a powerful neighbour the brother of the empress who had raised his palace wall to such an inconvenient height that her humble dwelling was excluded from light and air! On the proof of the fact instead of granting like an ordinary judge, sufficient or ample damages to the plaintiff the sovereign adjudged to her use and benefit the palace and the ground Nor was Theophilus content with this extravagant satisfaction his zeal converted a civil trespass into a criminal act and the unfortunate patrician was stripped and scourged in the public place of Constantinople For some venial offences some defect of equity or vigilance the principal ministers a præfect a quæstor a captain of the guards were banished or mutilated, or scalded with boiling pitch or burnt alive in the hippodrome and as these dreadful examples might be the effects of error or caprice they must have alienated from his service the best and wisest of the citizens But the pride of the monarch was flattered in the exercise of power or as he thought of virtue and the people safe in their obscurity applauded the danger and debasement of their superiors This extraordinary rigour was justified in some measure by its salutary consequences since after a scrutiny of seventeen days not a complaint or abuse could be found in the court or city and it might be alleged that the Greeks could be ruled only with a rod of iron and that the public interest is the motive and law of the supreme judge Yet in the crime or the suspicion of treason that judge is of all others the most credulous and partial Theophilus might inflict a tardy vengeance on the assassins of Leo and the saviours of his father but he enjoyed the fruits of their crime and his jealous tyranny sacrificed a brother and a prince to the future safety of his life A Persian of the race of the Sassanides died in poverty and exile at Constantinople leaving an only son the issue of a plebeian marriage At the age of twelve years the royal birth of Theophobus was revealed, and his merit was not unworthy of his birth He was educated in the Byzantine palace, a Christian and a soldier advanced with rapid steps in the career of fortune and glory received the hand of the emperor s sister and was promoted to the command of thirty thousand Persians who like his father, had fled from the Mohammedan conquerors These troops doubly infected with mercenary and fanatic vices, were desirous of revolting against their benefactor and erecting the standard of their native king but the loyal Theophobus rejected their offers disconcerted their schemes and escaped from their hands to the camp or palace of his royal brother A generous confidence might have secured a faithful and able guardian for his wife and his infant son to whom Theophilus in the flower of his age, was compelled to leave the inheritance of the empire But his jealousy was exasperated by envy and disease he feared the dangerous virtues which might either support or oppress their infancy and weakness and the dying emperor demanded the head of the Persian prince With savage delight he recognised the familiar features of his brother ' Thou art no longer Theophobus he said, and, sinking on his couch, he added with a faltering voice Soon, too soon, I shall be no more Theophilus'

The Russians, who have borrowed from the Greeks the greatest part of their civil and ecclesiastical policy, preserved till the last century, a singular institution in the marriage of the Czar They collected not the virgins of every rank and of every province a vain and romantic idea but the daughters of the principal nobles, who awaited in the palace the choice of their sovereign. It is affirmed that a similar method was adopted in the nuptials of Theophilus With a golden apple in his hand he slowly walked between two lines of contending beauties his eye was detained by the charms of Icasia and in the awkwardness of a first declaration, the prince could only observe, that in this world, women had been the cause of much evil, And surely sir she pertly replied, ' they have likewise been the occasion of much good ' This affectation of unseasonable wit displeased the Imperial lover he turned aside in disgust, Icasia concealed her mortification in a convent and the modest silence of Theodora was rewarded with the golden apple She deserved the love but did not escape the severity, of her lord From the palace garden he beheld a vessel deeply laden, and steering into the port on the discovery that the precious cargo of Syrian luxury was the property of his wife, he condemned the ship to the flames, with a sharp reproach that her avarice had degraded the character of an empress into that of a merchant. Yet his last choice intrusted her with the guardianship of the empire and her son Michael who was left an orphan in the fifth year of his age The restoration of images, and the final extirpation of the Iconoclasts, has endeared her name to the devotion of the Greeks but in the fervour of religious zeal Theodora entertained a grateful regard for the memory and salvation of her husband After thirteen years of a prudent and frugal administration, she perceived the decline of her influence, but the second Irene imitated only the virtues of her predecessor Instead of conspiring against the life or government of her son she retired without a struggle though not without a murmur, to the solitude of private life, deploring the ingratitude the vices and the inevitable ruin of the worthless youth

Among the successors of Nero and Elagabalus we have not hitherto found the imitation of their vices the character of a Roman prince who considered pleasure as the object of life and virtue as the enemy of pleasure Whatever might have been the maternal care of Theodora in the education of Michael the Third her unfortunate son was a king before he was a man If the ambitious mother laboured to check the progress of reason she could not cool the ebullition of passion and her selfish policy was justly repaid by the contempt and ingratitude of the headstrong youth At the age of eighteen he rejected her authority without feeling his own incapacity to govern the empire and himself With Theodora all gravity and wisdom retired from the court, their place was supplied by the alternate dominion of vice and folly and it was impossible without forfeiting the public esteem, to acquire or preserve the favour of the emperor The millions of gold and silver which had been accumulated for the service of the state were lavished on the vilest of men who flattered his passions and shared his pleasures and in a reign of thirteen years the richest of sovereigns was compelled to strip the palace and the churches of their precious furniture Like Nero, he delighted in the amusements of the theatre and sighed to be surpassed in the accomplishments in which he should have blushed to excel Yet the studies of Nero in music and poetry betrayed some symptoms of a liberal taste the more ignoble arts of the son of Theophilus were confined to the chariot race of the hippodrome The four factions which had agitated the peace, still amused the idleness of the capital for him self the emperor assumed the blue livery the three rival colours were distributed to his fa vourites and in the vile though eager conten tion he forgot the dignity of his person and the safety of his dominions He silenced the messen ger of an invasion who presumed to divert his attention in the most critical moment of the race and by his command the importunate beacons were extinguished that too frequently spread the alarm from Tarsus to Constantino ple The most skilful charioteers obtained the first place in his confidence and esteem their merit was profusely rewarded the emperor feasted in their houses and presented their children at the baptismal font and while he applauded his own popularity he affected to blame the cold and stately reserve of his prede cessors The unnatural lusts which had degrad ed even the manhood of Nero were banished from the world yet the strength of Michael was consumed by the indulgence of love and intem perance In his midnight revels when his pas sions were inflamed by wine he was provoked to issue the most sangu nary commands and if any feelings of humanity were left he was re duced with the return of sense to approve the salutary disobedience of his servants But the most extraordinary feature in the character of Michael is the profane mockery of the religion of his country The superstition of the Greeks might indeed excite the smile of a philosopher but his smile would have been rational and temperate and he must have condemned the ignorant folly of a you h who insulted the ob jects of public ven ration A buffoon of the court was invested in the robes of the patriarch his twelve metropolitans, among whom the em peror was ranked assumed their ecclesiastical garments they used or abu ed the sacred ves sels of the altar and in their bacchanalian f asts the holy communion was admini ered in a nauseous compound of vinegar and mustard Nor were these impious spectacles concealed from the eyes of the city On the day of a solemn festival the emperor ith his bishops or buf foons rode on asses through the streets en countered the true patriarch at the head of his clergy and by their licentious shouts and ob scene gestures, disordered the gravity of the Christian procession. The devotion of Michael appeared only in some offence to reason or pi ety he received his theatrical crowns from the statue of the Virgin and an Imperial tomb as violated for the sake of burning the bones of Constantine the Iconoclast By this extravagant conduct the son of Theophilus became as con temptible as he was odious every citizen was impatient for the deliverance of his country and even the favourites of the moment were ap prehensive that a caprice might snatch away what a caprice had bestowed In the thirtieth year of his age and in the hour of intoxication and sleep Michael the Third was murdered in his chamber by the founder of a new dynasty whom the emperor had raised to an equality of rank and power

The g nealogy of Basil the Macedonian (if it be not the spurious offspring of pride and flat tery) exhibits a genuine picture of the revolu tion of the most illustrious families The Arsa cides the rivals of Rome possessed the sceptre of the East near four hundred years a younger branch of these Parthian kings continued to reign in Armenia and their royal descendants survived the partition and servitude of that an cient monarchy Two of these Artabanus and Chlienes escaped or retired to the court of Leo the First his bounty seated them in a safe and hospitable exile in the province of Macedonia Adrianople was their final settlement During several generations they maintained the dignity of their birth and their Roman patriotism re jected the tempting offers of the Persian and Arabian powers who recalled them to their native country But their splendour was in sensibly clouded by time and poverty and the father of Basil was reduced to a small farm, which he cultivated with his own hands yet he scorned to disgrace the blood of the Arsacides by a plebeian alliance his wife a widow of Adrianople was pleased to count among her ancestors the great Constantine and their royal infant was connected by some dark affinity of lineage or country with the Macedonian Alex ander No sooner was he born than the cradle of Basil his family and his city were swept away by an inundation of the Bulgarians he was educated a slave in a foreign land and in this severe discipline he acquired the hardiness of body and flexibility of mind which promoted his future eleva on In the age of youth or man hood he shared the deliverance of the Roman captives who generously broke their fetters marched through Bulgaria to the shores of the Euxine defeated two armies of barbarians em barked in the ships which had been stationed for their reception and returned to Constantino ple from whence they were distributed to their respective homes But the freedom of Basil was naked and destitute his farm was ruined by the calamities of war after his father s death his manual labour or service could no longer support a family of orphans and he resolved to seek a more conspicuous theatre, in which every virtue and every vice may lead to the paths of greatness The first night of his arrival at Constantinople, without friends or money, the weary pilgrim slept on the steps of the church of St Diomede he was fed by the casual hospitality of a monk and was introduced to the service of a cousin and namesake of the emperor Theophilus, who though himself of a diminutive person was always followed by a train of tall and handsome domestics Basil attended his patron to the government of Peloponnesus, eclipsed by his personal merit the birth and dignity of Theophilus and formed a useful connection with a wealthy and charitable matron of Patras Her spiritual or carnal love embraced the young adventurer, whom she adopted as her son Danielis presented him with thirty slaves and the produce of her bounty was expended in the support of his brothers and the purchase of some large estates in Macedonia His gratitude or ambition still attached him to the service of Theophilus and a lucky accident recommended him to the notice of the court A famous wrestler in the train of the Bulgarian ambassadors had defied, at the royal banquet the boldest and most robust of the Greeks The strength of Basil was praised he accepted the challenge, and the barbarian champion was overthrown at the first onset A beautiful but vicious horse was condemned to be hamstrung it was subdued by the dexterity and courage of the servant of Theophilus and his conqueror was promoted to an honourable rank in the Imperial stables But it was impossible to obtain the confidence of Michael without complying with his vices, and his new favourite the great chamberlain of the palace, was raised and supported by a disgraceful marriage with a royal concubine, and the dishonour of his sister who succeeded to her place The public administration had been abandoned to the Cæsar Bardas, the brother and enemy of Theodora but the arts of female influence persuaded Michael to hate and to fear his uncle he was drawn from Constantinople under the pretence of a Cretan expedition and stabbed in the tent of audience by the sword of the chamberlain, and in the presence of the emperor About a month after this execution Basil was invested with the title of Augustus and the government of the empire He supported this unequal association till his influence was fortified by popular esteem His life was endangered by the caprice of the emperor, and his dignity was profaned by a second colleague who had rowed in the galleys Yet the murder of his benefactor must be condemned as an act of ingratitude and treason and the churches which he dedicated to the name of St. Michael were a poor and puerile expiation of his guilt

The different ages of Basil the First may be compared with those of Augustus The situation of the Greek did not allow him in his earliest youth to lead an army against his country or to proscribe the noblest of her sons, but his aspiring genius stooped to the arts of a slave he dissembled his ambition and even his virtues and grasped, with the bloody hand of an assassin the empire which he ruled with the wisdom and tenderness of a parent A private citizen may feel his interest repugnant to his duty but it must be from a deficiency of sense or courage that an absolute monarch can separate his happiness from his glory or his glory from the public welfare The life or panegyric of Basil has indeed been composed and published under the long reign of his descendants but even their stability on the throne may be justly ascribed to the superior merit of their ancestor In his character his grandson Constantine has attempted to delineate a perfect image of royalty but that feeble prince unless he had copied a real model could not easily have soared so high above the level of his own conduct or conceptions But the most solid praise of Basil is drawn from the comparison of a ruined and a flourishing monarchy, that which he wrested from the dissolute Michael, and that which he bequeathed to the Macedonian dynasty The evils which had been sanctified by time and example were corrected by his master hand and he revived if not the national spirit at least the order and majesty of the Roman empire His application was indefatigable, his temper cool his understanding vigorous and decisive and in his practice he observed that rare and salutary moderation which pursues each virtue at an equal distance between the opposite vices His military service had been confined to the palace nor was the emperor endowed with the spirit or the talents of a warrior Yet under his reign the Roman arms were again formidable to the barbarians As soon as he had formed a new army by discipline and exercise he appeared in person on the banks of the Euphrates curbed the pride of the Saracens and suppressed the dangerous though just revolt of the Manichæans His indignation against a rebel who had long eluded his pursuit provoked him to wish and to pray that by the grace of God, he might drive three arrows into the head of Chrysocheir That odious head which had been obtained by treason rather than by valour was suspended from a tree and thrice exposed to the dexterity of the Imperial archer a base revenge against the dead more worthy of the times than of the character of Basil. But his principal merit was in the civil administration of the finances and of the laws To replenish an exhausted treasury it was proposed to resume the lavish and ill placed gifts of his predecessor his prudence abated one moiety of the restitution and a sum of twelve hundred thousand pounds was instantly procured to answer the most pressing demands and to allow some space for the mature operations of economy Among the various schemes for the improvement of the revenue a new mode was suggested of capitation or tribute which would have too much depended on the arbitrary discretion of the assessors A sufficient list of honest and able agents was instantly produced by the minister but on the more careful scrutiny of Basil himself only two could be found who might be safely intrusted with such dangerous powers and they justified his esteem by declining his confidence But the serious and successful diligence of the emperor established by degrees an equitable balance of property and payment, of receipt and expenditure a peculiar fund was appropriated to each service and a public method secured the interest of the prince and the property of the people After reforming the luxury he assigned two patrimonial estates to supply the decent plenty of the Imperial table the contributions of the subject were reserved for his defence and the residue was employed in the embellishment of the capital and provinces A taste for building however costly may deserve some praise and much excuse from thence industry is fed art is encouraged and some object is attained of public emolument or pleasure the use of a road an aqueduct or a hospital is obvious and solid and the hundred churches that arose by the command of Basil were consecrated to the devotion of the age In the character of a judge he was assiduous and impartial desirous to save but not afraid to strike the oppressors of the people were severely chastised but his personal foes whom it might be unsafe to pardon were condemned after the loss of their eyes to a life of solitude and repentance The change of language and manners demanded a revision of the obsolete jurisprudence of Justinian the voluminous body of his Institutes Pandects Code and Novels was digested under forty titles in the Greek idiom and the Basilics which were improved and completed by his son and grandson must be referred to the original genius of the founder of their race This glorious reign was terminated by an accident in the chase A furious stag entangled his horns in the belt of Basil and raised him from his horse he was rescued by an attendant who cut the belt and slew the animal but the fall or the fever exhausted the strength of the aged monarch, and he expired in the palace amidst the tears of his family and people If he struck off the head of the faithful servant for presuming to draw his sword against his sovereign the pride of despotism which had lain dormant in his life revived in the last moments of despair when he no longer wanted or valued the opinion of mankind.

Of the four sons of the emperor Constantine died before his father whose grief and credulity were amused by a flattering impostor and a vain apparition Stephen, the youngest was content with the honours of a patriarch and a saint both Leo and Alexander were alike invested with the purple but the powers of government were solely exercised by the elder brother The name of Leo the Sixth has been dignified with the title of philosopher and the union of the prince and the sage of the active and speculative virtues would indeed constitute the perfection of human nature But the claims of Leo are far short of this ideal excellence Did he reduce his passions and appetites under the dominion of reason? His life was spent in the pomp of the palace in the society of his wives and concubines and even the clemency which he showed and the peace which he strove to preserve must be imputed to the softness and indolence of his character Did he subdue his prejudices and those of his subjects? His mind was tinged with the most puerile superstition the influence of the clergy and the errors of the people were consecrated by his laws and the oracles of Leo which reveal in prophetic style the fates of the empire are founded on the arts of astrology and divination. If we still inquire the reason of his sage appellation it can only be replied that the son of Basil was less ignorant than the greater part of his contemporaries in church and state that his education had been directed by the learned Photius and that several books of profane and ecclesiastical science were composed by the pen, or in the name of the Imperial philosopher But the reputation of his philosophy and religion was overthrown by a domestic vice the repetition of his nuptials The primi tive ideas of the merit and holiness of celibacy were preached by the monks and entertained by the Greeks Marriage was allowed as a necessary means for the propagation of mankind after the death of either party the survivor might satisfy by a second union the weakness or the strength of the flesh but a third marriage was censured as a state of legal fornication and a fourth was a sin or scandal as yet unknown to the Christians of the East In the beginning of his reign Leo himself had abolished the state of concubines, and condemned without annulling, third marriages but his patriotism and love soon compelled him to violate his own laws, and to incur the penance which in a similar case he had imposed on his subjects In his first three alliances his nuptial bed was unfruitful the emperor required a female companion, and the empire a legitimate heir The beautiful Zoe was introduced into the palace as a concubine and after a trial of her fecundity and the birth of Constantine her lover declared his intention of legitimating the mother and the child by the celebration of his fourth nuptials But the patriarch Nicholas refused his blessing the Imperial baptism of the young prince was obtained by a promise of separation and the contumacious husband of Zoe was excluded from the communion of the faithful Neither the fear of exile nor the desertion of his brethren nor the authority of the Latin church nor the danger of failure or doubt in the succession to the empire could bend the spirit of the inflexible monk After the death of Leo he was recalled from exile to the civil and ecclesiastical administration and the edict of union which was promulgated in the name of Constantine condemned the future scandal of fourth marriages and left a tacit imputation on his own birth

In the Greek language purple and porphyry are the same word and as the colours of nature are invariable we may learn that a dark deep red was the Tyrian dye which stained the purple of the ancients An apartment of the Byzantine palace was lined with porphyry it was reserved for the use of the pregnant empresses and the royal birth of their children was expressed by the appellation of porphyrogenite or born in the purple Several of the Roman princes had been blessed with an heir but this peculiar surname was first applied to Constantine the Seventh His life and titular reign were of equal duration but of fifty four years six had elapsed before his father's death and the son of Leo was ever the voluntary or reluctant subject of those who oppressed his weakness or abused his confidence His uncle Alexander who had long been invested with the title of Augustus was the first colleague and governor of the young prince but in a rapid career of vice and folly the brother of Leo already emulated the reputation of Michael and when he was extinguished by a timely death he entertained a project of castrating his nephew and leaving the empire to a worthless favourite The succeeding years of the minority of Constantine were occupied by his mother Zoe and a succession or council of seven regents, who pursued their interest gratified their passions abandoned the republic, supplanted each other and finally vanished in the presence of a soldier From an obscure origin Romanus Lecapenus had raised himself to the command of the naval armies and in the anarchy of the times had deserved, or at least had obtained the national esteem With a victorious and affectionate fleet he sailed from the mouth of the Danube into the harbour of Constantinople and was hailed as the deliverer of the people and the guardian of the prince His supreme office was at first defined by the new appellation of father of the emperor but Romanus soon disdained the subordinate powers of a minister and assumed with the titles of Cæsar and Augustus the full independence of royalty which he held near five and twenty years His three sons Christopher, Stephen and Constantine were successively adorned with the same honours and the lawful emperor was degraded from the first to the fifth rank in this college of princes Yet in the preservation of his life and crown he might still applaud his own fortune and the clemency of the usurper The examples of ancient and modern history would have excused the ambition of Romanus the powers and the laws of the empire were in his hand the spurious birth of Constantine would have justified his exclusion and the grave or the monastery was open to receive the son of the concubine But Lecapenus does not appear to have possessed either the virtues or the vices of a tyrant The spirit and activity of his private life dissolved away in the sunshine of the throne and in his licentious pleasures he forgot the safety both of the republic and of his family Of a mild and religious character he respected the sanctity of oaths, the innocence of the youth the memory of his parents and the attachment of the people The studious temper and retirement of Constantine disarmed the jealousy of power his books and music his pen and his pencil were a constant source of amusement, and if he could improve a scanty allowance by the sale of his pictures if their price was not enhanced by the name of the artist he was endowed with a personal talent which few princes could employ in the hour of adversity

The fall of Romanus was occasioned by his own vices and those of his children After the decrease of Christopher his eldest son the two surviving brothers quarreled with each other and conspired against their father At the hour of noon, when all strangers were regularly excluded from the palace they entered his apartment with an armed force and conveyed him in the habit of a monk to a small island in the Propontis which was peopled by a religious community The rumour of this domestic revolution excited a tumult in the city but Porphyrogenitus alone the true and lawful emperor was the object of the public care and the sons of Lecapenus were taught by tardy experience that they had achieved a guilty and perilous enterprise for the benefit of their rival Their sister Helena the wife of Constantine revealed or supposed their treacherous design of assassinating her husband at the royal banquet His loyal adherents were alarmed and the two usurpers were prevented seized degraded from the purple and embarked for the same island and monastery where their father had been so lately confined. Old Romanus met them on the beach with a sarcastic smile and after a just reproach of their folly and ingratitude presented his Imperial colleagues with an equal share of his water and vegetable diet In the fortieth year of his reign Constantine the Seventh obtained the possession of the Eastern world which he ruled or seemed to rule near fifteen years But he was devoid of that energy of character which could emerge into a life of action and glory and the studies which had amused and dignified his leisure were incompatible with the serious duties of a sovereign The emperor neglected the practice to instruct his son Romanus in the theory of government while he indulged the habits of intemperance and sloth he dropped the reins of the administration into the hands of Helena his wife and in the shifting scene of her favour and caprice each minister was regretted in the promotion of a more worthless successor Yet the birth and misfortunes of Constantine had endeared him to the Greeks they excused his failings they respected his learning his innocence and charity his love of justice and the ceremony of his funeral was mourned with the unfeigned tears of his subjects The body according to ancient custom lay in state in the vestibule of the palace and the civil and military officers the patricians the senate and the clergy approached in due order to adore and kiss the inanimate corpse of their sovereign Before the procession moved towards the Imperial sepulchre a herald proclaimed this awful admonition Arise O king of the world and obey the summons of the King of kings!

The death of Constantine was imputed to poison and his son Romanus who derived that name from his maternal grandfather ascended the throne of Constantinople A prince who at the age of twenty could be suspected of anticipating his inheritance must have been already lost in the public esteem yet Romanus was rather weak than wicked and the largest share of the guilt was transferred to his wife Theophano a woman of base origin masculine spirit and flagitious manners The sense of personal glory and public happiness the true pleasures of royalty were unknown to the son of Constantine and while the two brothers Nicephorus and Leo triumphed over the Saracens the hours which the emperor owed to his people were consumed in strenuous idleness. In the morning he visited the circus at noon he feasted the senators the greater part of the afternoon he spent in the sphaeristerium or tennis court the only theatre of his victories from thence he passed over to the Asiatic side of the Bosphorus hunted and killed four wild boars of the largest size and returned to the palace, proudly content with the labours of the day In strength and beauty he was conspicuous above his equals tall and straight as a young cypress, his complexion was fair and florid, his eyes sparkling his shoulders broad his nose long and aquiline Yet even these perfections were insufficient to fix the love of Theophano and after a reign of four years, she mingled for her husband the same deadly draught which she had composed for his father

By his marriage with this impious woman Romanus the younger left two sons Basil the Second and Constantine the Ninth and two daughters Theophano and Anne The eldest sister was given to Otho the Second emperor of the West the younger became the wife of Wolodomir, great duke and apostle of Russia and by the marriage of her granddaughter with Henry the First king of France the blood of the Macedonians and perhaps of the Arsacides still flows in the veins of the Bourbon line. After the death of her husband the empress aspired to reign in the name of her sons the elder of whom was five and the younger only two years of age but she soon felt the instability of a throne which was supported by a female who could not be esteemed, and two infants who could not be feared Theophano looked around for a protector, and threw herself into the arms of the bravest soldier her heart was capacious, but the deformity of the new favourite rendered it more probable that interest was the motive and excuse of her love Nicephorus Phocas united in the popular opinion the double merit of a hero and a saint In the former character his qualifications were genuine and splendid the descendant of a race illustrious by their military exploits he had displayed in every station and in every province the courage of a sol*dier and the conduct of a chief*, and Nicephorus was crowned with recent laurels from the important conquest of the isle of Crete His religion was of a more ambiguous cast and his hair cloth his fasts, his pious idiom and his wish to retire from the business of the world were a convenient mask for his dark and dangerous ambition Yet he imposed on a holy patriarch by whose influence and by a decree of *the senate he was intrusted, during the minor*ity of the young princes with the absolute and independent command of the Oriental armies As soon as he had secured the leaders and the troops he boldly marched to Constantinople, trampled on his enemies avowed his corre*spondence with the empress and, without de*grading her sons, assumed with the title of Augustus the pre eminence of rank and the plenitude of power But his marriage with Theophano was refused by the same patriarch who had placed the crown on his head by his second nuptials he incurred a year of canonical penance, a bar of spiritual affinity was opposed to their celebration, and some evasion and perjury were required to silence the scruples of the clergy and people The popularity of the emperor was lost in the purple in a reign of six years he provoked the hatred of strangers and subjects, and the hypocrisy and avarice of the first Nicephorus were revived in his successor Hypocrisy I shall never justify or palliate but I will dare to observe that the odious vice of avarice is of all others most hastily arraigned and most unmercifully condemned In a private citizen our judgment seldom expects an accurate scrutiny into his fortune and expense and in a steward of the public treasure frugality is always a virtue, and the increase of taxes too often an indispensable duty In the use of his patrimony the generous temper of Nicephorus had been proved, and the revenue was strictly applied to the service of the state each spring the emperor marched in person against the Saracens and every Roman might compute the employment of his taxes in triumphs conquests, and the security of the Eastern barrier

Among the warriors who promoted his elevation and served under his standard a noble and valiant Armenian had deserved and obtained the most eminent rewards The stature of John Zimisces was below the ordinary standard but this diminutive body was endowed with strength beauty, and the soul of a hero By the jealousy of the emperor's brother he was degraded from the office of general of the East to that of director of the posts, and his murmurs were chastised with disgrace and exile But Zimisces was ranked among the numerous lovers of the empress on her intercession he was permitted to reside at Chalcedon in the neighbourhood of the capital her bounty was repaid in his clandestine and amorous visits to the palace and Theophano consented with alacrity to the death of an ugly and penurious husband Some bold and trusty conspirators were concealed in her most private chambers in the darkness of a winter night Zimisces with his principal companions embarked in a small boat, traversed the Bosphorus landed at the palace stairs, and silently ascended a ladder of ropes, which was cast down by the female attendants Neither his own suspicions nor the warnings of his friends, nor the tardy aid of his brother Leo nor the fortress which he had erected in the palace could protect Nicephorus from a domestic foe, at whose voice every door was opened to the assassins As he slept on a bear skin on the ground he was roused by their noisy intrusion, and thirty daggers glittered before his eyes It is doubtful whether Zimisces imbrued his hands in the blood of his sovereign but he enjoyed the inhuman spectacle of revenge The murder was protracted by insult and cruelty and as soon as the head of Nicephorus was shown from the window the tumult was hushed and the Armenian was emperor of the East On the day of his coronation he was stopped on the threshold of St Sophia by the intrepid patriarch, who charged his conscience with the deed of treason and blood and required as a sign of repentance, that he should separate himself from his more criminal associate This sally of apostolic zeal was not offensive to the prince since he could *neither love nor trust a woman who had re*peatedly violated the most sacred obligations and Theophano instead of sharing his Imperial fortune was dismissed with ignominy from his bed and palace In their last interview she displayed a frantic and impotent rage accused the ingratitude of her lover assaulted with words and blows, her son Basil as he stood silent and submissive in the presence of a superior colleague and avowed her own prostitution in proclaiming the illegitimacy of his birth The public indignation was appeased by her exile and the punishment of the meaner accomplices the death of an unpopular prince was forgiven and the guilt of Zimisces was forgotten in the splendour of his virtues Perhaps his profusion was less useful to the state than the avarice of Nicephorus but his gentle and generous behaviour delighted all who approached his person and it was only in the paths of victory that he trod in the footsteps of his predecessor The greatest part of his reign was employed in the camp and the field his personal valour and activity were signalized on the Danube and the Tigris, the ancient boundaries of the Roman world and by his double triumph over the Russians and the Saracens he deserved the titles of saviour of the empire and conqueror of the East In his last return from Syria he observed that the most fruitful lands of his new provinces were possessed by the eunuchs And is it for them, he exclaimed with honest indignation, that we have fought and conquered? Is it for them that we shed our blood and exhaust the treasures of our people? The complaint was re-echoed to the palace and the death of Zimisces is strongly marked with the suspicion of poison.

Under this usurpation or regency of twelve years the two lawful emperors Basil and Constantine had silently grown to the age of manhood Their tender years had been incapable of dominion the respectful modesty of their attendance and salutation was due to the age and merit of their guardians the childless ambition of those guardians had no temptation to violate their right of succession their patrimony was ably and faithfully administered and the premature death of Zimisces was a loss rather than a benefit to the sons of Romanus Their want of experience detained them twelve years longer the obscure and voluntary pupils of a minister who extended his reign by persuading them to indulge the pleasures of youth and to disdain the labours of government In this silken web the weakness of Constantine was for ever entangled but his elder brother felt the impulse of genius and the desire of action he frowned and the minister was no more Basil was the acknowledged sovereign of Constantinople and the provinces of Europe but Asia was oppressed by two veteran generals Phocas and Sclerus, who alternately friends and enemies subjects and rebels maintained their independence and laboured to emulate the example of successful usurpation Against these domestic enemies the son of Romanus first drew his sword and they trembled in the presence of a lawful and high-spirited prince The first in the front of battle was thrown from his horse by the stroke of poison or an arrow the second who had been twice loaded with chains, and twice invested with the purple was desirous of ending in peace the small remainder of his days As the aged suppliant approached the throne with dim eyes and faltering steps leaning on his two attendants the emperor exclaimed in the insolence of youth and power And is this the man who has so long been the object of our terror? After he had confirmed his own authority and the peace of the empire the trophies of Nicephorus and Zimisces would not suffer their royal pupil to sleep in the palace His long and frequent expeditions against the Saracens were rather glorious than useful to the empire but the final destruction of the kingdom of Bulgaria appears since the time of Belisarius the most important triumph of the Roman arms Yet instead of applauding their victorious prince his subjects detested the rapacious and rigid avarice of Basil and in the imperfect narrative of his exploits, we can only discern the courage, patience and ferociousness of a soldier A vicious education, which could not subdue his spirit had clouded his mind, he was ignorant of every science and the remembrance of his learned and feeble grandsire might encourage his real or affected contempt of laws and lawyers of artists and arts Of such a character in such an age superstition took a firm and lasting possession after the first licence of his youth Basil the Second devoted his life in the palace and the camp to the penance of a hermit wore the monastic habit under his robes and armour observed a vow of continence and imposed on his appetites a perpetual abstinence from wine and flesh. In the sixty-eighth year of his age his martial spirit urged him to embark in person for a holy war against the Saracens of Sicily he was prevented by death, and Basil surnamed the Slayer of the Bulgarians was dismissed from the world with the blessings of the clergy and the curses of the people After his decease, his brother Constantine enjoyed about three years the power or rather the pleasures of royalty and his only care was the settlement of the succession He had enjoyed sixty six years the title of Augustus, and the reign of the two brothers is the longest and most obscure of the Byzantine history

A lineal succession of five emperors in a period of one hundred and sixty years, had attached the loyalty of the Greeks to the Macedonian dynasty, which had been thrice respected by the usurpers of their power After the death of Constantine the Ninth the last male of the royal race a new and broken scene presents itself and the accumulated years of twelve emperors do not equal the space of his single reign His elder brother had preferred his private chastity to the public interest and Constantine himself had only three daughters—Eudocia who took the veil and Zoe and Theodora who were preserved till a mature age in a state of ignorance and virginity When their marriage was discussed in the council of their dying father, the cold or pious Theodora refused to give an heir to the empire but her sister Zoe presented herself a willing victim at the altar Romanus Argyrus, a patrician of a graceful person and fair reputation was chosen for her husband and, on his declining that honour was informed that blindness or death was the second alternative The motive of his reluctance was conjugal affection but his faithful wife sacrificed her own happiness to his safety and greatness and her entrance into a monastery removed the only bar to the Imperial nuptials After the decease of Constantine the sceptre devolved to Romanus the Third but his labours at home and abroad were equally feeble and fruitless and the mature age, the forty eight years of Zoe, were less favourable to the hopes of pregnancy than to the indulgence of pleasure Her favourite chamberlain was a handsome Paphlagonian of the name of Michael whose first trade had been that of a money-changer and Romanus either from gratitude or equity, connived at their criminal intercourse or accepted a slight assurance of their innocence But Zoe soon justified the Roman maxim that every adulteress is capable of poisoning her husband and the death of Romanus was instantly followed by the scandalous marriage and elevation of Michael the Fourth The expectations of Zoe were however disappointed instead of a vigorous and grateful lover she had placed in her bed a miserable wretch whose health and reason were impaired by epileptic fits and whose conscience was tormented by despair and remorse The most skilful physicians of the mind and body were summoned to his aid and his hopes were amused by frequent pilgrimages to the baths, and to the tombs of the most popular saints, the monks applauded his penance, and, except restitution (but to whom should he have restored?) Michael sought every method of expiating his guilt While he groaned and prayed in sackcloth and ashes his brother, the eunuch John smiled at his remorse, and enjoyed the harvest of a crime of which himself was the secret and most guilty author His administration was only the art of satiating his avarice and Zoe became a captive in the palace of her fathers and in the hands of her slaves When he perceived the irretrievable decline of his brother's health he introduced his nephew another Michael who derived his surname of Calaphates from his father's occupation in the careening of vessels at the command of the eunuch Zoe adopted for her son the son of a mechanic, and this fictitious heir was invested with the title and purple of the Cæsars in the presence of the senate and clergy So feeble was the character of Zoe that she was oppressed by the liberty and power which she recovered by the death of the Paphlagonian and at the end of four days she placed the crown on the head of Michael the Fifth who had protested with tears and oaths that he should ever reign the first and most obedient of her subjects The only act of his short reign was his base ingratitude to his benefactors the eunuch and the empress. The disgrace of the former was pleasing to the public but the murmurs and at length the clamours of Constantinople deplored the exile of Zoe the daughter of so many emperors her vices were forgotten and Michael was taught that there is a period in which the patience of the tamest slaves rises into fury and revenge The citizens of every degree assembled in a formidable tumult which lasted three days they besieged the palace forced the gates recalled their mothers Zoe from her prison Theodora from her monastery and condemned the son of Calaphates to the loss of his eyes or of his life For the first time the Greeks beheld with surprise the two royal sisters seated on the same throne presiding in the senate and giving audience to the ambassadors of the nations But this singular union subsisted no more than two months the two sovereigns their tempers interests and adherents were secretly hostile to each other and as Theodora was still averse to marriage the indefatigable Zoe at the age of sixty consented for the public good to sustain the embraces of a third husband and the censures of the Greek church His name and number were Constantine the Tenth and the epi thet of Monomachus the single combatant must have been expressive of his valour and victory in some public or private quarrel But his health was broken by the tortures of the gout and his dissolute reign was spent in the alternative of sickness and pleasure A fair and noble widow had accompanied Constantine in his exile to the isle of Lesbos and Sclerena gloried in the appellation of his mistress After his marriage and elevation she was invested with the title and pomp of Augusta and occupied a contiguous apartment in the palace The lawful consort (such was the delicacy or corruption of Zoe) consented to this strange and scandalous partition and the emperor appeared in public between his wife and his concubine He survived them both but the last measures of Constantine to change the order of succession were prevented by the more vigilant friends of Theodora and after his decease she resumed with the general consent, the possession of her inheritance In her name and by the influence of four eunuchs the Eastern world was peaceably governed about nineteen months and as they wished to prolong their dominion they persuaded the aged princess to nominate for her successor Michael the Sixth. The surname of Stratioticus declares his military profession but the crazy and decrepit veteran could only see with the eyes and execute with the hands of his ministers Whilst he ascended the throne Theodora sunk into the grave—the last of the Macedonian or Basilian dynasty I have hastily reviewed and gladly dismiss this shameful and destructive period of twenty-eight years in which the Greeks degraded below the common level of servitude were transferred like a herd of cattle by the choice or caprice of two impotent females

From this night of slavery a ray of freedom or at least of spirit, begins to emerge the Greeks either preserved or revived the use of surnames which perpetuate the fame of hereditary virtue and we now discern the rise succession and alliances of the last dynasties of Constantinople and Trebizond The Comneni who upheld for a while the fate of the sinking empire assumed the honour of a Roman origin but the family had been long since transported from Italy to Asia Their patrimonial estate was situate in the district of Castamona in the neighbourhood of the Euxine and one of their chiefs who had already entered the paths of ambition, revisited with affection perhaps with regret, the modest though honourable dwelling of his fathers The first of their line was the illustrious Manuel, who in the reign of the second Basil, contributed by war and treaty to appease the troubles of the East he left in a tender age two sons, Isaac and John whom, with the consciousness of desert he bequeathed to the gratitude and favour of his sovereign The noble youths were carefully trained in the learning of the monastery the arts of the palace and the exercises of the camp and from the domestic service of the guards they were rapidly promoted to the command of provinces and armies Their fraternal union doubled the force and reputation of the Comneni and their ancient nobility was illustrated by the marriage of the two brothers with a captive princess of Bulgaria and the daughter of a patrician who had obtained the name of Charon from the number of enemies whom he had sent to the infernal shades The soldiers had served with reluctant loyalty a series of effeminate masters the elevation of Michael the Sixth was a personal insult to the more deserving generals and their discontent was inflamed by the parsimony of the emperor and the insolence of the eunuchs. They secretly assembled in the sanctuary of St Sophia, and the votes of the military synod would have been unanimous in favour of the old and valiant Catacalon if the patriotism or modesty of the veteran had not suggested the importance of birth as well as merit in the choice of a sovereign Isaac Comnenus was approved by general consent and the associates separated without delay to meet in the plains of Phrygia at the head of their respective squadrons and detachments The cause of Michael was defended in a single battle by the mercenaries of the imperial guard who were aliens to the public interest and animated only by a principle of honour and gratitude After their defeat the fears of the emperor solicited a treaty which was almost accepted by the moderation of the Comnenian But the former was betrayed by his ambassadors and the latter was prevented by his friends The solitary Michael submitted to the voice of the people the patriarch annulled their oath of allegiance and as he shaved the head of the royal monk, congratulated his beneficial exchange of temporal royalty for the kingdom of heaven an exchange however which the priest on his own account would probably have declined. By the hands of the same patriarch Isaac Comnenus was solemnly crowned the sword which he inscribed on his coins might be an offensive symbol if it implied his title by conquest but this sword would have been drawn against the foreign and domestic enemies of the state. The decline of his health and vigour suspended the operation of active virtue and the prospect of approaching death determined him to interpose some moments between life and eternity But instead of leaving the empire as the marriage portion of his daughter, his reason and inclination concurred in the preference of his brother John, a soldier, a patriot and the father of five sons the future pillars of an hereditary succession His first modest reluctance might be the natural dictates of discretion and tenderness, but his obstinate and successful perseverance however it may dazzle with the show of virtue must be censured as a criminal desertion of his duty, and a rare offence against his family and country The purple which he had refused was accepted by Constantine Ducas a friend of the Comnenian house and whose noble birth was adorned with the experience and reputation of civil policy In the monastic habit Isaac recovered his health and survived two years his voluntary abdication At the command of his abbot, he observed the rule of St Basil, and executed the most servile offices of the convent but his latent vanity was gratified by the frequent and respectful visits of the reigning monarch, who revered in his person the character of a benefactor and a saint

If Constantine the Eleventh were indeed the subject most worthy of empire, we must pity the debasement of the age and nation in which he was chosen In the labour of puerile declamations he sought without obtaining, the crown of eloquence more precious in his opinion than that of Rome and in the subordinate functions of a judge he forgot the duties of a sovereign and a warrior Far from imitating the patriotic indifference of the authors of his greatness Ducas was anxious only to secure at the expense of the republic, the power and prosperity of his children His three sons, Michael *the Seventh Andronicus the First, and Con*stantine the Twelfth were invested in a tender age with the equal title of Augustus and the succession was speedily opened by their father s death His widow Eudocia was intrusted with the administration but experience had taught the jealousy of the dying monarch to protect his sons from the danger of her second nuptials and her solemn engagement attested by the principal senators was deposited in the hands of the patriarch Before the end of seven months the wants of Eudocia or those of the state called aloud for the male virtues of a soldier and her heart had already chosen Romanus Diogenes whom she raised from the scaffold to the throne The discovery of a treasonable attempt had exposed him to the severity of the laws his beauty and valour absolved him in the eyes of the empress and Romanus, from a mild exile was recalled on the second day to the command of the Oriental armies Her royal choice was yet unknown to the public and the promise which would have betrayed her falsehood and levity was stolen by a dexterous emissary from the ambition of the patriarch Xiphilin at first alleged the sanctity of oaths and the sacred nature of a trust but a whisper that his brother was the future emperor relaxed his scruples and forced him to confess that the public safety was the supreme law He resigned the important paper, and when his hopes were confounded by the nomination of Romanus, he could no longer regain his security, retract his declarations nor oppose the second nuptials of the empress Yet a murmur was heard in the palace and the barbarian guards had raised their battleaxes in the cause of the house of Ducas till the young princes were soothed by the tears of their mother and the solemn assurances of the fidelity of their guardian who filled the imperial station with dignity and honour Hereafter I shall relate his valiant but unsuccessful efforts to resist the progress of the Turks His defeat and captivity inflicted a deadly wound on the Byzantine mon*archy of the East* and after he was released from the chains of the sultan he vainly sought his wife and his subjects His wife had been thrust into a monastery and the subjects of Ro*manus had embraced the rigid maxim* of the civil law that a prisoner in the hands of the enemy is deprived as by the stroke of death of all the public and private rights of a citizen In the general consternation the Cæsar John asserted the indefeasible right of his three nephews Constantinople listened to his voice and the Turkish captive was proclaimed in the capital and received on the frontier as an enemy of the republic Romanus was not more fortunate in domestic than in foreign war the loss of two battles compelled him to yield on the as*surance of fair and honourable treatment* but his enemies were devoid of faith or humanity, and after the cruel extinction of his sight his wounds were left to bleed and corrupt till in a few days he was relieved from a state of misery Under the triple reign of the house of Ducas the two younger brothers were reduced to the vain honours of the purple but the eldest the pusillanimous Michael was incapable of sustaining the Roman sceptre and his surname of Parapinaces denotes the reproach which he shared with an avaricious favourite who enhanced the price and diminished the measure of wheat In the school of Psellus and after the example of his mother the son of Eudocia made some proficiency in philosophy and rhetoric but his character was degraded rather than ennobled by the virtues of a monk and the learning of a sophist. Strong in the contempt of their sovereign and their own esteem two generals at the head of the European and Asiatic legions assumed the purple at Adrianople and Nice. Their revolt was in the same month they bore the same name of Nicephorus but the two candidates were distinguished by the surnames of Bryennius and Botaniates the former in the maturity of wisdom and courag the latter conspicuous only by the memory of his past exploits While Botaniates advanced with cautious and dilatory steps his active competitor stood in arms before the gates of Constantinople. The name of Bryennius was illustrious his cause was popular but his licentious troops could not be restrained from burning and pillaging a suburb and the people who would have hailed the rebel rejected and repulsed the incendiary of his country This change of the public opinion was favourable to Botaniates, who at length, with an army of Turks approached the shores of Chalcedon A formal invitation in the name of the patriarch the synod, and the senate was circulated through the streets of Constantinople and the general assembly in the dome of St Sophia, debated with order and calmness on the choice of their sovereign. The guards of Michael would have dispersed this unarmed multitude but the feeble emperor applauding his own moderation and clem ncy resigned the ensigns of royalty and was rewarded with the monastic habit and the title of Archbishop of Ephesus He left a son, a Constantine born and educated in the purple and a daughter of the house of Ducas illustrated the blood and confirmed the succession of the Comnenian dynasty

John Comnenus the brother of the emperor Isaac, survived in peace and dignity his generous refusal of the sceptre By his wife Anne a woman of masculine spirit and policy he left eight children the three daughters multiplied the Comnenian alliances with the noblest of the Greeks of the five sons Manuel was stopped by a premature death Isaac and Alexius restored the Imperial greatness of their house, which was enjoyed without toil or danger by the two younger brethren Adrian and Nicephorus. Alexius the third and most illustrious of the brothers, was endowed by nature with the choicest gifts both of mind and body they were cultivated by a liberal education and exercised in the school of obedience and adversity The youth was dismissed from the perils of the Turkish war by the paternal care of the emperor Romanus but the mother of the Comneni with her aspiring race, was accused of treason and banished by the sons of Ducas to an island in the Propontis The two brothers soon emerged into favour and action fought by each other's side against the rebels and barbarians and adhered to the emperor Michael till he was deserted by the world and by himself In his first interview with Botaniates Prince ' said Alexius with a noble frankness, my duty rendered me your enemy the decrees of God and of the people have made me your subject Judge of my future loyalty by my past opposition. The successor of Michael entertained him with esteem and confidence his valour was employed against three rebels who disturbed the peace of the empire or at least of the emperors Ursel Bryennius and Basilacius were formidable by their numerous forces and military fame they were successively vanquished in the field, and led in chains to the foot of the throne and whatever treatment they might receive from a timid and cruel court they applauded the clemency as well as the courage of their conqueror But the loyalty of the Comneni was soon tainted by fear and suspicion nor is it easy to settle between a subject and a despot the debt of gratitude which the former is tempted to claim by a revolt, and the latter to discharge by an executioner The refusal of Alexius to march against a fourth rebel the husband of his sister destroyed the merit or memory of his past services the favourites of Botaniates provoked the ambition which they apprehended and accused and the retreat of the two brothers might be justified by the def nce of their life or liberty The women of the family were deposited in a sanctuary respected by tyrants the men mounted on horseback sallied from the city and erected the standard of civil war The soldiers who had been gradually assembled in the capital and the neighbourhood were devoted to the cause of a victorious and injured leader the ties of common interest and domestic alliance secured the attachment of the house of Ducas and the generous dispute of the Comneni was terminated by the decisive resolution of Isaac who was the first to invest his younger brother with the name and ensigns of royalty They returned to Constantinople to threaten rather than besiege that impregnable fortress but the fidelity of the guards was corrupted, a gate was surprised, and the fleet was occupied by the active courage of George Palæologus who fought against his father without foreseeing that he laboured for his posterity Alexius ascended the throne, and his aged competitor disappeared in a monastery An army of various nations was gratified with the pillage of the city, but the public disorders were expiated by the tears and fasts of the Comneni who submitted to every penance compatible with the possession of the empire

The life of the emperor Alexius has been delineated by a favourite daughter who was inspired by a tender regard for his person and a laudable zeal to perpetuate his virtues Conscious of the just suspicion of her readers the princess Anna Comnena repeatedly protests that besides her personal knowledge she had searched the discourse and writings of the most respectable veterans that, after an interval of thirty years forgotten by and forgetful of the world her mournful solitude was inaccessible to hope and fear, and that truth, the naked perfect truth, was more dear and sacred than the memory of her parent Yet, instead of the simplicity of style and narrative which wins our belief an elaborate affectation of rhetoric and science betrays in every page the vanity of a female author The genuine character of Alexius is lost in a vague constellation of virtues and the perpetual strain of panegyric and apology awakens our jealousy to question the veracity of the historian and the merit of the hero We cannot however refuse her judicious and important remark that the disorders of the times were the misfortune and the glory of Alexius, and that every calamity which can afflict a declining empire was accumulated on his reign by the justice of Heaven and the vices of his predecessors In the East the victorious Turks had spread from Persia to the Hellespont, the reign of the Koran and the Crescent the West was invaded by the adventurous valour of the Normans, and, in the moments of peace the Danube poured forth new swarms who had gained in the science of war what they had lost in the ferociousness of manners The sea was not less hostile than the land and while the frontiers were assaulted by an open enemy the palace was distracted with secret treason and conspiracy On a sudden the banner of the Cross was displayed by the Latins Europe was precipitated on Asia and Constantinople had almost been swept away by this impetuous deluge In the tempest Alexius steered the Imperial vessel with dexterity and courage At the head of his armies he was bold in action skilful in stratagem patient of fatigue, ready to improve his advantages, and rising from his defeats with inexhaustible vigour The discipline of the camp was revived, and a new generation of men and soldiers was created by the example and the precepts of their leader In his intercourse with the Latins Alexius was patient and artful his discerning eye pervaded the new system of an unknown world and I shall hereafter describe the superior policy with which he balanced the interests and passions of the champions of the first crusade. In a long reign of thirty seven years he subdued and pardoned the envy of his equals the laws of public and private order were restored the arts of wealth and science were cultivated the limits of the empire were enlarged in Europe and Asia and the Comnenian sceptre was transmitted to his children of the third and fourth generation Yet the difficulties of the times betrayed some defects in his character, and have exposed his memory to some just or ungenerous reproach. The reader may possibly smile at the lavish praise which his daughter so often bestows on a flying hero the weakness or prudence of his situation might be mistaken for a want of personal courage, and his political arts are branded by the Latins with the names of deceit and dissimulation The increase of the male and female branches of his family adorned the throne, and secured the succession but their princely luxury and pride offended the patricians exhausted the revenue and insulted the misery of the people Anna is a faithful witness that his happiness was destroyed and his health was broken, by the cares of a public life the patience of Constantinople was fatigued by the length and severity of his reign and before Alexius expired he had lost the love and reverence of his subjects The clergy could not forgive his application of the sacred riches to the defence of the state but they applauded his theological learning and ardent zeal for the orthodox faith which he defended with his tongue, his pen and his sword His character was degraded by the superstition of the Greeks and the same inconsistent principle of human nature enjoined the emperor to found a hospital for the poor and infirm and to direct the execution of a heretic who was burnt alive in the square of St Sophia Even the sincerity of his moral and religious virtues was suspected by the persons who had passed their lives in his familiar confidence In his last hours when he was pressed by his wife Irene to alter the succession he raised his head, and breathed a pious ejacul-

tion on the vanity of this world The indignant reply of th empress may be inscribed as an epitaph on his tomb You die as you have lived— A HYPOCRITE[1]

It was the wish of Irene to supplant the eldest of her surviving sons in favour of her daugh er the princess Anna whose philosophy would not have refus d the weight of a diadem But the order of male succession wa asserted by the friends of their country the lawful heir drew th royal signet from the finger of his insensible or conscious father and the empire obeyed the master of the palace Anna Comnena was stimulated by ambition and revenge to conspire against the life of her brother and when the design was prevented by the fears or scruples of h r husband she passionately exclaimed that nature had mistaken the two sexes and had endowed Bryennius with the soul of a woman The two sons of Alexius John and Isaac maintained th fraternal concord the hereditary virtue of their race and the younger brother was content with the title of Sebastocrat r wh h approached the dignity without sharing the power of the emperor In the same person the claims of primogeniture and merit were fortunately united his swarthy complexion harsh featu es, and d minutive stature had suggested the ironical su name of Calo-Johannes or John the Handsome which his grateful subjects more seriou ly applied to the beauties of his mind After th dis covery of her treason, the life and fortune of Anna were justly forfeited to the laws Her life was spared by the clemency of the emperor but he visited the pomp and treasures of her palace and bestowed the rich confiscation on the most deserving of his friends Th respect able friend Axuch a slave of Turkish extraction, presumed to decline the gift and to int r cede for the criminal his generous master applauded and imita ed he virtue of his favourite and the reproach or complaint of an injured brother was the only chas isement of the guilty princess After this exampl of c emency the remainder of his reign was never disturbed by conspiracy or rebellion feared by his nobles, belov ed by his people John was never reduced to the painful necessity of punishing or even of pardoning his personal enemies During his government of twenty five years the penalty of death was abolished in the Roman empire a law of mercy most delight ul to the humane theorist, but of which the pra tice in a large and vicious community is seldom consistent with the public safety Severe to himself indulgent to others chaste frugal, abstemious, the philosophic Marcus would not have disdained the artless virtues of his successor, derived from his heart and not borrowed from the schools. He despised and moderated the stately magnificence of the Byzantine court so oppressive to the people so contemptible to the eye of reason Under such a prince innocence had nothing to fear and merit had everything to hope and without assuming the tyrannic office of a censor he introduced a gradual though visible reformation in the public and private manners of Constantinople The only defect of this accomplished character was the frailty of noble minds —the love of arms and military glory Yet the frequent expeditions of John the Handsome may be justified at least in their principl by the necess ty of repelling the Turks from the Hellespont and the Bosphorus The sultan of Iconium was confined to his capital the barbarians were driven to the mountains and the maritime provinces of Asia enjoyed the transient blessings of their deliverance From Constantinople to Antioch and Aleppo he repeatedly marched at the head of a victorious army and in the sieges and battles of this holy war, his Latin allies were astonished by the superior spirit and prowess of a Greek As he began to indulge the ambitious hope of restoring the ancient limits of the empire as he revolved in his mind the Euphrates and Tigris the dominion of Syria and the conquest of Jerusalem the thread of his life and of the public felicity was broken by a singular accident He hunted the wild boar in the valley of Anazarbus and had fix d his javelin in the body of the furious animal but in the struggle a poisoned arrow dropped from his quiver and a slight wound in his hand, which produced a mortification wa fatal to the best and greatest of the Comnenian princes

A premature death had swept away the two eldest sons of John the Handsome of the two survivors Isaac and Manuel his judgment or affection preferred the younger and the choice of their dying prince was ratified by the soldiers who had applauded the valour of his favourite in the Turkish war The faithful Axuch hastened to th capital secured the person of Isaac in honourable confinement and purchased with a gift of two hundred pounds of silver the leading ecclesiastics of St Sophia, who posses ed a decisive voice in the consecration of an empero With his veteran and affectionate troops Manuel oon visited Constantinople his brother a quiesced in the title of Sebastocrator his subjects admired the lofty stature and martial graces of their new sovereign and listened with credulity to the flattering promise that he blended the wisdom of age with the activity and vigour of youth By the experience of his government they were taught that he emulated the spirit and shared the talents of his father, whose social virtues were buried in the grave A reign of thirty seven years is filled by a perpetual though various warfare against the Turks, the Christians, and the hordes of the wilderness beyond the Danube The arms of Manuel were exercised on Mount Taurus in the plains of Hungary on the coast of Italy and Egypt and on the seas of Sicily and Greece the influence of his negotiations extended from Jerusalem to Rome and Russia and the Byzantine monarchy for a while became an object of respect or terror to the powers of Asia and Europe Educated in the silk and purple of the East Manuel possessed the iron temper of a soldier, which cannot easily be paralleled, except in the lives of Richard the First of England, and of Charles the Twelfth of Sweden Such was his strength and exercise in arms that Raymond surnamed the Hercules of Antioch, was incapable of wielding the lance and buckler of the Greek emperor In a famous tournament he entered the lists on a fiery courser and overturned in his first career two of the stoutest of the Italian knights The first in the charge the last in the retreat his friends and his enemies alike trembled the former for his safety and the latter for their own After posting an ambuscade in a wood he rode forwards in search of some perilous adventure accompanied only by his brother and the faithful Axuch who refused to desert their sovereign Eighteen horsemen after a short combat, fled before them but the numbers of the enemy increased the march of the reinforcement was tardy and fearful and Manuel without receiving a wound cut his way through a squadron of five hundred Turks In a battle against the Hungarians impatient of the slowness of his troops he snatched a standard from the head of the column and was the first, almost alone who passed a bridge that separated him from the enemy In the same country after transporting his army beyond the Save he sent back the boats, with an order under pain of death to their commander that he should leave him to conquer or die on that hostile land In the siege of Corfu, towing after him a captive galley the emperor stood aloft on the poop opposing against the volleys of darts and stones a large buckler and a flowing sail, nor could he have escaped inevitable death, had not the Sicilian admiral enjoined his archers to respect the person of a hero In one day he is said to have slain above forty of the barbarians with his own hand, he returned to the camp, dragging along four Turkish prisoners whom he had tied to the rings of his saddle he was ever the foremost to provoke or to accept a single combat and the gigantic champions who encountered his arm were transpierced by the lance or cut asunder by the sword, of the invincible Manuel The story of his exploits, which appear as a model or a copy of the romances of chivalry, may induce a reasonable suspicion of the veracity of the Greeks I will not, to vindicate their credit endanger my own yet I may observe that, in the long series of their annals Manuel is the only prince who has been the subject of similar exaggeration With the valour of a soldier he did not unite the skill or prudence of a general his victories were not productive of any permanent or useful conquest, and his Turkish laurels were blasted in his last unfortunate campaign, in which he lost his army in the mountains of Pisidia and owed his deliverance to the generosity of the sultan But the most singular feature in the character of Manuel is the contrast and vicissitude of labour and sloth of hardiness and effeminacy In war he seemed ignorant of peace in peace he appeared incapable of war In the field he slept in the sun or in the snow tired in the longest marches the strength of his men and horses and shared with a smile the abstinence or diet of the camp No sooner did he return to Constantinople, than he resigned himself to the arts and pleasures of a life of luxury the expense of his dress his table and his palace surpassed the measure of his predecessors and whole summer days were idly wasted in the delicious isles of the Propontis in the incestuous love of his niece Theodora The double cost of a warlike and dissolute prince exhausted the revenue and multiplied the taxes and Manuel in the distress of his last Turkish campaign endured a bitter reproach from the mouth of a desperate soldier As he quenched his thirst, he complained that the water of a fountain was mingled with Christian blood ' It is not the first time ' exclaimed a voice from the crowd 'that you have drank O emperor the blood of your Christian subjects Manuel Comnenus was twice married to the virtuous Bertha or Irene of Germany, and to the beauteous Maria a French or Latin princess of Antioch The only daughter of his first wife was destined for Bela an Hungarian prince, who was educated at

Constantinople under the name of Alexius and the consummation of their nuptials might have transferred the Roman sceptre to a race of free and warlike barbarians But as soon as Maria of Antioch had given a son and heir to the empire the presumptive rights of Bela were abolished, and he was deprived of his promised bride but the Hungarian prince resumed his name and the kingdom of his fathers and displayed such virtues as might excite the regret and envy of the Greeks The son of Maria was nam d Alex ius and at the ag of ten years he ascended the Byzantine throne after his father s decease had closed the glories of the Comnenian line.

The fraternal concord of the two sons of the great Alexius had been sometimes clouded by an opposition of interest and passion By ambi tion Isaac the Sebastocrator was excited to flight and rebellion, from whence he was re claimed by the firmness and clemency of John the Handsom The errors of Isaac the father of the emperors of Trebizond, were short and venial but John the elder of his ons renounced for ever his religion Provoked by a real or im aginary insult of his uncle he escaped from the Roman to the Turkish camp his apostasy was rewarded with the sultan s daughter the title of Chelebi or noble and the inheritance of a princely estate and in the fifteenth century Mohammed the Second boasted of his Imperial descent from the Comnenian family Androni cus younger brother of John son of Isaac and grandson of Alexius Comnenus is one of the most conspicuous characters of the age and his genuine adventures might form the subject of a very singular romance To justify the choice of three ladies of royal birth, it is incumbent on me to observe that their fortunate lover was cast in the best proportions of strength and beauty and that the want of the softer graces was supplied by a manly countenance a lofty stature athletic muscles and the air and deportment of a sold er The preservation to his old age of health and vigour was the reward of temper ance and exercise A piece of bread and a draught of water was often his sole and evening repast and if he tasted of a wild boar or a stag which he had roasted with his own hands it was the well-earned fruit of a laborious chase Dexter ous in arms he was ignorant of fear his per suasive eloquence could bend to every situation and character of life his style though not his practice was fashioned by the example of St. Paul and, in every deed of mischief he had a heart to resolve a head to contrive, and a hand to execute In his youth, after the death of the emperor John he followed the retreat of the Roman army but, in the march through Asia Minor design or accident tempted him to wan der in the mountains the hunter was encom passed by the Turkish huntsmen and he re mained some time a reluctant or willing captive in the power of the sultan His virtues and vices recommended him to the favour of his cousin he shared the perils and the pleasures of Man uel and while the emperor lived in public in cest with his niece Theodora the affections of her sister Eudocia were seduced and enjoyed by Andronicus Above the decencies of her sex and rank, she gloried in the name of his concubine and both the palace and the camp could wit ness that she slept or watched, in the arms of her lover She accompanied him to his military command of Cilicia the first scene of his valour and imprudence He pressed with active ar dour the siege of Mopsuestia the day was em ployed in the boldest attacks but the night was wasted in song and dance and a band of Greek comedians formed the choicest part of his ret inue Andronicus was surprised by the sally of a vigilant foe but, while his troops fled in dis order his invincible lance transpierced the thickest ranks of the Armenians On his return to the Imperial camp in Macedonia he was re ceived by Manuel with public smiles and a pri vate reproof but the duchies of Naissus, Brani seba, and Castoria were the reward or consola tion of the unsuccessful general Eudocia still attended his motions at midnight their tent was suddenly attacked by her angry brothers, impatient to expiate her infamy in his blood his daring spirit refused her advice and the dis guise of a female habit and boldly starting from his couch he drew his sword and cut his way through the numerous assassins. It was here that he first betrayed his ingratitude and treach ery he engaged in a treasonable correspon dence with the king of Hungary and the Ger man emperor approached the royal tent at a suspicious hour with a drawn sword and un der the mask of a Latin soldier avowed an in tention of revenge against a mortal foe and im prudently praised the fleetness of his horse as an instrument of flight and safety The monarch dissembled his suspicions but after the close of the campaign Andronicus was arrested and strictly confined in a tower of the palace of Con stantinople

In this prison he was left above twelve years a most painful restraint from which the thirst of action and pleasure perpetually urged him to escape Alone and pensive he perceived some

ure and martial graces of their new sovereign and listened with credulity to the flattering promise that he blended the wisdom of age with the activity and vigour of youth By the experience of his government they were taught that he emulated the spirit and shared the talents of his father whose social virtues were buried in the grave A reign of thirty seven years is filled by a perpetual though various warfare against the Turks the Christians and the hordes of the wilderness beyond the Danube The arms of Manuel were exercised on Mount Taurus, in the plains of Hungary on the coast of Italy and Egypt and on the seas of Sicily and Greece the influence of his negotiations extended from Jerusalem to Rome and Russia, and the Byzantine monarchy for a while became an object of respect or terror to the powers of Asia and Europe Educated in the silk and purple of the East, Manuel possessed the iron temper of a soldier, which cannot easily be paralleled except in the lives of Richard the First of England, and of Charles the Twelfth of Sweden Such was his strength and exercise in arms that Raymond, surnamed the Hercules of Antioch was incapable of wielding the lance and buckler of the Greek emperor In a famous tournament he entered the lists on a fiery courser and overturned in his first career two of the stoutest of the Italian knights The first in the charge the last in the retreat his friends and his enemies alike trembled the former for his safety and the latter for their own After posting an ambuscade in a wood he rode forwards in search of some perilous adventure accompanied only by his brother and the faithful Axuch who refused to desert their sovereign Eighteen horsemen after a short combat fled before them but the numbers of the enemy increased, the march of the reinforcement was tardy and fearful and Manuel without receiving a wound cut his way through a squadron of five hundred Turks In a battle against the Hungarians impatient of the slowness of his troops he snatched a standard from the head of the column, and was the first almost alone, who passed a bridge that separated him from the enemy In the same country after transporting his army beyond the Save he sent back the boats with an order under pain of death, to their commander that he should leave him to conquer or die on that hostile land. In the siege of Corfu, towing after him a captive galley the emperor stood aloft on the poop opposing against the volleys of darts and stones a large buckler and a flowing sail nor could he have escaped inevitable death, had not the Sicilian admiral enjoined his archers to respect the person of a hero In one day he is said to have slain above forty of the barbarians with his own hand he returned to the camp, dragging along four Turkish prisoners, whom he had tied to the rings of his saddle he was ever the foremost to provoke or to accept a single combat and the gigantic champions who encountered his arm were transpierced by the lance or cut asunder by the sword, of the invincible Manuel. The story of his exploits, which appear as a model or a copy of the romances of chivalry, may induce a reasonable suspicion of the veracity of the Greeks I will not, to vindicate their credit endanger my own yet I may observe that in the long series of their annals Manuel is the only prince who has been the subject of similar exaggeration With the valour of a soldier he did not unite the skill or prudence of a general his victories were not productive of any permanent or useful conquest and his Turkish laurels were blasted in his last unfortunate campaign, in which he lost his army in the mountains of Pisidia and owed his deliverance to the generosity of the sultan But the most singular feature in the character of Manuel is the contrast and vicissitude of labour and sloth of hardiness and effeminacy In war he seemed ignorant of peace in peace he appeared incapable of war In the field he slept in the sun or in the snow, tired in the longest marches the strength of his men and horses and shared with a smile the abstinence or diet of the camp No sooner did he return to Constantinople than he resigned himself to the arts and pleasures of a life of luxury the expense of his dress his table and his palace surpassed the measure of his predecessors and whole summer days were idly wasted in the delicious isles of the Propontis in the incestuous love of his niece Theodora The double cost of a warlike and dissolute prince exhausted the revenue and multiplied the taxes and Manuel in the distress of his last Turkish campaign endured a bitter reproach from the mouth of a desperate soldier As he quenched his thirst he complained that the water of a fountain was mingled with Christian blood ' It is not the first time exclaimed a voice from the crowd that you have drank O emperor the blood of your Christian subjects Manuel Comnenus was twice married to the virtuous Bertha or Irene of Germany and to the beauteous Maria a French or Latin princess of Antioch The only daughter of his first wife was destined for Bela an Hungarian prince, who was educated at nounced him as the champion of the Cross he soon captivated both the clergy and the king and the Greek prince was invested with the lordship of Berytus on the coast of Phoenicia. In his neighbourhood resided a young and handsome queen of his own nation and family great granddaughter of the emperor Alexis and widow of Baldwin the Third king of Jerusalem She visited and loved her kinsman Theodora was the third victim of his amorous seduction and her shame was more public and scandalous than that of her predecessors The emperor still thirsted for revenge and his subjects and allies of the Syrian frontier were repeatedly pressed to seize the person and put out the eyes of the fugitive In Palestine he was no longer safe but the tender Theodora revealed his danger and accompanied his flight The queen of Jerusalem was exposed to the East his obsequious concubine and two illegitimate children were the living monuments of her weakness Damascus was his first refuge and in the characters of the great Noureddin and his servant Saladin the superstitious Greek might learn to revere the virtues of the Musulmans As the friend of Noureddin he visited most probably Bagdad and the courts of Persia and after a long circuit round the Caspian Sea and the mountains of Georgia, he finally settled among the Turks of Asia Minor the hereditary enemies of his country The sultan of Colonia afforded an hospitable retreat to Andronicus his mistress and his band of outlaws the debt of gratitude was paid by frequent inroads in the Roman province of Trebizond and he seldom returned without an ample harvest of spoil and of Christian captives In the story of his adventures he was fond of comparing himself to David who escaped by a long exile the snares of the wicked. But the royal prophet (he presumed to add) was content to lurk on the borders of Judæa to slay an Amalekite and to threaten, in his miserable state the life of the avaricious Nabal The excursions of the Comnenian prince had a wider range and he had spread over the Eastern world the glory of his name and religion By a sentence of the Greek church the licentious rover had been separated from the faithful but even this excommunication may prove that he never abjured the profession of Christianity

His vigilance had eluded or repelled the open and secret persecution of the emperor but he was at length ensnared by the captivity of his female companion The governor of Trebizond succeeded in his attempt to surprise the person of Theodora the queen of Jerusalem and her two children were sent to Constantinople and their loss embittered the tedious solitude of banishment The fugitive implored and obtained a final pardon, with leave to throw himself at the feet of his sovereign who was satisfied with the submission of this haughty spirit Prostrate on the ground he deplored with tears and groans the guilt of his past rebellion nor would he presume to arise unless some faithful subject would drag him to the foot of the throne by an iron chain with which he had secretly encircled his neck This extraordinary penance excited the wonder and pity of the assembly his sins were forgiven by the church and state but the just suspicion of Manuel fixed his residence at a distance from the court at Oenoe a town of Pontus surrounded with rich vineyards and situate on the coast of the Euxine The death of Manuel and the disorders of the minority soon opened the fairest field to his ambition The emperor was a boy of twelve or fourteen years of age without vigour or wisdom or experience his mother the empress Mary abandoned her person and government to a favourite of the Comnenian name and his sister another Mary, whose husband an Italian was decorated with the title of Cæsar excited a conspiracy and at length an insurrection against her odious stepmother The provinces were forgotten the capital was in flames and a century of peace and order was overthrown in the vice and weakness of a few months. A civil war was kindled in Constantinople the two factions fought a bloody battle in the square of the palace and the rebels sustained a regular siege in the cathedral of St Sophia The patriarch laboured with honest zeal to heal the wounds of the republic the most respectable patriots called aloud for a guardian and avenger and every tongue repeated the praise of the talents and even the virtues of Andronicus In his retirement he affected to revolve the solemn duties of his oath

If the safety or honour of the Imperial family be threatened I will reveal and oppose the mischief to the utmost of my power His correspondence with the patriarch and patricians was seasoned with apt quotations from the Psalms of David and the Epistles of St Paul and he patiently waited till he was called to her deliverance by the voice of his country In his march from Oenoe to Constantinople his slender train insensibly swelled to a crowd and an army his professions of religion and loyalty were mistaken for the language of his heart and the simplicity of a foreign dress which broken bricks in a corner of the chamber, and gradually widened the passage till he had explored a dark and forgotten recess Into this hole he conveyed himself and the remains of his provisions, replacing the bricks in their former *position and erasing with care the foot*steps of his retreat. At the hour of the customary visit, his guards were amazed by the silence and solitude of the prison and reported with shame and fear his incomprehensible flight The gates of the palace and city were instantly shut the strictest orders were despatched into the provinces for the recovery of the fugitive and his wife on the suspicion of a pious act was basely imprisoned in the same tower At the dead of night she beheld a spectre she recognised her husband, they shared their provisions and a son was the fruit of these stolen interviews which alleviated the tediousness of their confinement In the custody of a woman the vigilance of the keepers was insensibly relaxed and the captive had accomplished his real escape, when he was discovered, brought back to Constantinople and loaded with a double chain. At length he found the moment and the means of his deliverance A boy his domestic servant intoxicated the guards and obtained in wax the impression of the keys By the diligence of his friends a similar key with a bundle of ropes was introduced into the prison in the bottom of a hogshead Andronicus employed with industry and courage the instruments of his safety unlocked the doors descended from the tower concealed himself all day among the bushes and scaled in the night the garden wall of the palace A boat was stationed for his reception he visited his own house, embraced his children cast away his chain, mounted a fleet horse and directed his rapid course towards *the banks of the Dan*ube At Anchialus in Thrace an intrepid friend supplied him with horses and money he passed the river traversed with speed the desert of Moldavia and the Carpathian hills and had almost reached the town of Halicz in the Polish Russia when he was intercepted by a party of Walachians who resolved to convey their important captive to Constantinople His presence of mind again extricated him from this danger Under the pretence of sickness he dismounted in the night and was allowed to step aside from the troop he planted in the ground his long staff clothed it with his cap and upper garment and, stealing into the wood left a phantom to amuse for some time the eyes of the Wallachians From Halicz he was honourably conducted to Kiow, the residence of the great duke the subtle Greek soon obtained the esteem and confidence of Ieroslaus his character could assume the manners of every climate and the barbarians applauded his strength and courage in the chase of the elks and bears of the forest In this northern region he deserved the forgiveness of Manuel, who solicited the Russian prince to join his arms in the invasion of Hungary The influence of Andronicus achieved this important service his private treaty was signed with a promise of fidelity on one side and of oblivion on the other, and he marched, at the head of the Russian cavalry from the Borysthenes to the Danube In his resentment Manuel had ever sympathised with the martial and dissolute character of his cousin and his free pardon was sealed in the assault of Zemlin in which he was second and second only, to the valour of the emperor

No sooner was the exile restored to freedom and his country than his ambition revived at first to his own and at length to the public misfortune A daughter of Manuel was a feeble bar to the succession of the more deserving males of the Comnenian blood her future marriage with the prince of Hungary was repugnant to the hopes or prejudices of the princes and nobles But when an oath of allegiance was required to the presumptive heir Andronicus alone asserted the honour of the Roman name declined the unlawful engagement and boldly protested against the adoption of a stranger His patriotism was offensive to the emperor but he spoke the sentiments of the people and was removed from the royal presence by an honourable banishment a second command of the Cilician frontier with the absolute disposal of the revenues of Cyprus In this station the Ar*menians again* exercised his courage and exposed his negligence and the same rebel, who baffled all his operations was unhorsed and almost slain by the vigour of his lance But Andronicus soon discovered a more easy and pleasing conquest the beautiful Philippa sister of the empress Maria and daughter of Raymond of Poitou the Latin prince of Antioch For her sake he deserted his station and wasted the summer in balls and tournaments to his love she sacrificed her innocence her reputation and the offer of an advantageous marriage But the resentment of Manuel for this domestic affront interrupted his pleasures Andronicus left the indiscreet princess to weep and to repent, and, with a band of desperate adventurers undertook the pilgrimage of Jerusalem His birth his martial renown, and professions of zeal an

cruelty than the appellation of the Halcyon days which was applied to a rare and bloodless week of repose the tyrant strove to transfer on the laws and the judges some portion of his guilt, but the mask was fallen and his subjects could no longer mistake the true author of their calamities The noblest of the Greeks, more especially those who by descent or alliance might dispute the Comnenian inheritance escaped from the monster s den Nice or Prusa, Sicily or Cyprus were their places of refuge and as their flight was already criminal they aggravated their offence by an open revolt and the Imperial title Yet Andronicus resisted the daggers and swords of his most formidable enemies Nice and Prusa were reduced and chastised the Sicilians were content with the sack of Thessalonica and the distance of Cyprus was not more propitious to the rebel than to the tyrant. His throne was subverted by a rival without a merit, and a people without arms. Isaac Angelus a descendant in the female line from the great Alexius, was marked as a victim by the prudence or superstition of the emperor In a moment of despair Angelus defended his life and liberty slew the executioner and fled to the church of St Sophia. The sanctuary was insensibly filled with a curious and mournful crowd who in his fate prognosticated their own. But their lamentations were soon turned to curses and their curses to threats they dared to ask Why do we fear? why do we obey? We are many and he is one our patience is the only bond of our slavery With the dawn of day the city burst into a general sedition the prisons were thrown open the coldest and most servile were roused to the defence of their country and Isaac, the second of the name was raised from the sanctuary to the throne Unconscious of his danger the tyrant was absent —withdrawn from the toils of state, in the delicious islands of the Propontis He had contracted an indecent marriage with Alice or Agnes daughter of Lewis the Seventh of France and relict of the unfortunate Alexius and his society more suitable to his temper than to his age was composed of a young wife and a favourite concubine. On the first alarm he rushed to Constantinople impatient for the blood of the guilty but he was astonished by the silence of the palace the tumult of the city and the general desertion of mankind Andronicus proclaimed a free pardon to his subjects they neither desired nor would grant forgiveness he offered to resign the crown to his son Manuel but the virtues of the son could not expiate his father's crimes The sea was still open for his retreat but the news of the revolution had flown along the coast when fear had ceased obedience was no more the Imperial galley was pursued and taken by an armed brigantine, and the tyrant was dragged to the presence of Isaac Angelus, loaded with fetters, and a long chain round his neck. His eloquence and the tears of his female companions pleaded in vain for his life but, instead of the decencies of a legal execution the new monarch abandoned the criminal to the numerous sufferers whom he had deprived of a father a husband or a friend His teeth and hair an eye and a hand were torn from him, as a poor compensation for their loss and a short respite was allowed that he might feel the bitterness of death. Astride on a camel, without any danger of a rescue he was carried through the city and the basest of the populace rejoiced to trample on the fallen majesty of their prince After a thousand blows and outrages, Andronicus was hung by the feet between two pillars that supported the statues of a wolf and a sow and every hand that could reach the public enemy inflicted on his body some mark of ingenious or brutal cruelty till two friendly or furious Italians plunging their swords into his body released him from all human punishment. In this long and painful agony Lord have mercy upon me!" and Why will you bruise a broken reed? were the only words that escaped from his mouth. Our hatred for the tyrant is lost in pity for the man nor can we blame his pusillanimous resignation since a Greek Christian was no longer master of his life

I have been tempted to expatiate on the extraordinary character and adventures of Andronicus but I shall here terminate the series of the Greek emperors since the time of Heraclius The branches that sprang from the Comnenian trunk had insensibly withered and the male line was continued only in the posterity of Andronicus himself who in the public confusion usurped the sovereignty of Trebizond so obscure in history and so famous in romance. A private citizen of Philadelphia Constantine Angelus had emerged to wealth and honours by his marriage with the daughter of the emperor Alexius His son Andronicus is conspicuous only by his cowardice His grandson Isaac punished and succeeded the tyrant but he was dethroned by his own vices and the ambition of his brother and their discord introduced the Latins to the conquest of Constantinople, the first great period in the fall of the Eastern empire showed to advantage his majestic stature dis played a lively image of his poverty and exile All opposition sunk before him he reached the straits of the Thracian Bosphorus the Byzan tine navy sailed from the harbour to receive and transport the saviour of the empire the torrent was loud and irresistible, and the insects who had basked in the sunshine of royal favour dis appeared at the blast of the storm It was the first care of Andronicus to occupy the palace, to salute the emperor to confine his mother, to punish her minister, and to restore the public order and tranquillity He then visited the sep-ulchre of Manuel the spectators were ordered to stand aloof but as he bowed in the attitude of prayer, they heard or thought they heard, a murmur of triumph and revenge 'I no longer fear thee my old enemy who hast driven me a vagabond to every climate of the earth Thou art safely deposited under a seven fold dome from whence thou canst never arise till the sig nal of the last trumpet It is now my turn and speedily will I trample on thy ashes and thy posterity' From his subsequent tyranny we may impute such feelings to the man and the moment but it is not extremely probable that he gave an articulate sound to his secret thoughts In the first months of his administra tion his designs were veiled by a fair semblance of hypocrisy, which could delude only the eyes of the multitude the coronation of Alexius was performed with due solemnity and his perfid ious guardian, holding in his hands the body and blood of Christ most fervently declared that he lived and was ready to die for the ser vice of his beloved pupil But his numerous ad herents were instructed to maintain that the sinking empire must perish in the hands of a child, that the Romans could only be saved by a veteran prince, bold in arms skilful in policy, and taught to reign by the long experience of fortune and mankind and that it was the duty of every citizen to force the reluctant modesty of Andronicus to undertake the burden of the public care The young emperor was himself constrained to join his voice to the general ac clamation and to solicit the association of a col league who instantly degraded him from the supreme rank secluded his person and verified the rash declaration of the patriarch that Alex ius might be considered as dead so soon as he was committed to the custody of his guardian But his death was preceded by the imprison ment and execution of his mother After black ening her reputation and inflaming against her the passions of the multitude, the tyrant accused and tried the empress for a treasonable corre spondence with the king of Hungary His own son a youth of honour and humanity avowed his abhorrence of this flagitious act, and three of the judges had the merit of preferring their conscience to their safety but the obsequious tribunal without requiring any proof or hear ing any defence, condemned the widow of Manuel and her unfortunate son subscribed the sentence of her death Maria was strangled, her corpse was buried in the sea and her mem ory was wounded by the insult most offensive to female vanity a false and ugly representation of her beauteous form The fate of her son was not long deferred he was strangled with a bow string and the tyrant insensible to pity or re morse after surveying the body of the innocent youth struck it rudely with his foot Thy fa ther," he cried, was a knave, thy mother a whore and thyself a fool!"

The Roman sceptre, the reward of his crimes, was held by Andronicus about three years and a half as the guardian or sovereign of the em pire His government exhibited a singular con trast of vice and virtue When he listened to his passions he was the scourge when he consulted his reason the father of his people In the exer cise of private justice he was equitable and rig orous a shameful and pernicious venality was abolished and the offices were filled with the most deserving candidates by a prince who had sense to choose and severity to punish He pro hibited the inhuman practice of pillaging the goods and persons of shipwrecked mariners, the provinces, so long the objects of oppression or neglect revived in prosperity and plenty and millions applauded the distant blessings of his reign while he was cursed by the witnesses of his daily cruelties. The ancient proverb, that bloodthirsty is the man who returns from ban ishment to power had been applied with too much truth to Marius and Tiberius and was now verified for the third time in the life of An dronicus His memory was stored with a black list of the enemies and rivals who had traduced his merit opposed his greatness or insulted his misfortunes and the only comfort of his exile was the sacred hope and promise of revenge. The necessary extinction of the young emperor and his mother imposed the fatal obligation of extirpating the friends who hated and might punish the assassin and the repetition of mur der rendered him less willing and less able to forgive A horrid narrative of the victims whom he sacrificed by poison or the sword by the sea or the flames, would be less expressive of his

Introduction, Worship, and Persecution of Images Revolt of Italy and Rome Temporal Dominion of the Popes Conquest of Italy by the Franks Establishment of Images Character and Coronation of Charlemagne Restoration and Decay of the Roman Empire in the West Independence of Italy Constitution of the Germanic Body

In the connection of the church and state I have considered the former as subservient only and relative to the latter a salutary maxim if in fact as well as in narrative it had ever been held sacred The oriental philosophy of the Gnostics the dark abyss of predestination and grace and the strange transformation of the Eucharist from the sign to the substance of Christ s body[1] I have purposely abandoned to the curiosity of speculative divines But I have reviewed with diligence and pleasure the objects of ecclesiastical history by which the decline and fall of the Roman empire were materially affected, the propagation of Christianity the constitution of the Catholic church the ruin of Paganism and the sects that arose from the mysterious controversies concerning the Trinity and incarnation. At the head of this class we may justly rank the worship of images so fiercely disputed in the eighth and ninth centuries since a question of popular superstition produced the revolt of Italy the temporal power of the popes and the restoration of the Roman empire in the West

The primitive Christians were possessed with an unconquerable repugnance to the use and abuse of images and this aversion may be ascribed to their descent from the Jews and their enmity to the Greeks The Mosaic law had severely proscribed all representations of the Deity and that precept was firmly established in the principles and practice of the chosen people The wit of the Christian apologists was pointed against the foolish idolaters who bowed before the workmanship of their own hands the images of brass and marble which had they been endowed with sense and motion, should have started rather from the pedestal to adore the creative powers of the artist.[2] Perhaps some recent and imperfect converts of the Gnostic tribe might crown the statues of Christ and St. Paul with the profane honours which they paid to those of Aristotle and Pythagoras [3] but the public religion of the Catholics was uniformly simple and spiritual and the first notice of the use of pictures is in the censure of the council of Illiberis three hundred years after the Christian æra. Under the successors of Constantine in the peace and luxury of the triumphant church the more prudent bishops condescended to indulge a visible superstition for the benefit of the multitude and after the ruin of Paganism they were no longer restrained by the apprehension of an odious parallel The first introduction of a symbolic worship was in the veneration of the cross and of relics The saints and martyrs whose intercession was implored were seated on the right hand of God, but the gracious and often supernatural favours which in the popular belief, were showered round their tomb conveyed an unquestionable sanction of the devout pilgrims who visited and touched and kissed these lifeless remains the memorials of their merits and sufferings [4] But a memorial more interesting than the skull or the sandals of a departed worthy is the faithful copy of his person and features delineated by the arts of painting or sculpture In every age such copies so congenial to human feelings have been cherished by the zeal of private friendship or public esteem the images of the Roman emperors were adored with civil and almost religious honours a reverence less ostentatious but more sincere was applied to the statues of sages and patriots and these profane virtues these splendid sins disappeared in the presence of the holy men who had died for their celestial and everlasting country At first the experiment was made with caution and scruple and the venerable pictures were discreetly allowed to instruct the ignorant to awaken the cold and to gratify the prejudices of the heathen proselytes By a slow though inevitable progression the honours of the original were transferred to the copy the devout Christian prayed before the image of a saint and the Pagan rites of genuflexion luminaries and incense again stole into the Catholic church. The scruples of reason or piety were silenced by the strong evidence of visions and miracles and the pictures which speak and move and bleed,

If we compute the number and duration of the reigns it will be found that a period of six hundred years is filled by sixty emperors including in the Augustan list some female sovereigns, and deducting some usurpers who were never acknowledged in the capital and some princes who did not live to possess their inheritance The average proportion will allow ten years for each emperor—far below the chronological rule of Sir Isaac Newton who from the experience of more recent and regular monarchies, has defined about eighteen or twenty years as the term of an ordinary reign The Byzantine empire was most tranquil and prosperous when it could acquiesce in hereditary succession five dynasties the Heraclian Isaurian Amorian Basilian and Comnenian families, enjoyed and transmitted the royal patrimony during their respective series of five four, three, six and four generations several princes number the years of their reign with those of their infancy and Constantine the Seventh and his two grandsons occupy the space of an entire century But in the intervals of the Byzantine dynasties the succession is rapid and broken and the name of a successful candidate is speedily erased by a more fortunate competitor Many were the paths that led to the summit of royalty the fabric of rebellion was overthrown by the stroke of conspiracy, or undermined by the silent arts of intrigue the favourites of the soldiers or people of the senate or clergy of the women and eunuchs were alternately clothed with the purple the means of their elevation were base, and their end was often contemptible or tragic A being of the nature of man endowed with the same faculties but with a longer measure of existence, would cast down a smile of pity and contempt on the crimes and follies of human ambition, so eager in a narrow span, to grasp at a precarious and short lived enjoyment It is thus that the experience of history exalts and enlarges the horizon of our intellectual view In a composition of some days in a perusal of some hours six hundred years have rolled away and the duration of a life or reign is contracted to a fleeting moment the grave is ever beside the throne the success of a criminal is almost instantly followed by the loss of his prize, and our immortal reason survives and disdains the sixty phantoms of kings who have passed before our eyes, and faintly dwell on our remembrance The observation, that in every age and climate ambition has prevailed with the same commanding energy may abate the surprise of a philosopher, but while he condemns the vanity, he may search the motive of this universal desire to obtain and hold the sceptre of dominion To the greater part of the Byzantine series we cannot reasonably ascribe the love of fame and of mankind The virtue alone of John Comnenus was beneficent and pure the most illustrious of the princes who precede or follow that respectable name have trod with some dexterity and vigour the crooked and bloody paths of a selfish policy in scrutinising the imperfect characters of Leo the Isaurian Basil the First, and Alexius Comnenus of Theophilus, the second Basil, and Manuel Comnenus our esteem and censure are almost equally balanced and the remainder of the Imperial crowd could only desire and expect to be forgotten by posterity Was personal happiness the aim and object of their ambition? I shall not descant on the vulgar topics of the misery of kings, but I may surely observe that their condition, of all others is the most pregnant with fear and the least susceptible of hope For these opposite passions a larger scope was allowed in the revolutions of antiquity than in the smooth and solid temper of the modern world which cannot easily repeat either the triumph of Alexander or the fall of Darius But the peculiar infelicity of the Byzantine princes exposed them to domestic perils, without affording any lively promise of foreign conquest From the pinnacle of greatness Andronicus was precipitated by a death more cruel and shameful than that of the vilest malefactor but the most glorious of his predecessors had much more to dread from their subjects than to hope from their enemies The army was licentious without spirit the nation turbulent without freedom the barbarians of the East and West pressed on the monarchy, and the loss of the provinces was terminated by the final servitude of the capital

The entire series of Roman emperors from the first of the Cæsars to the last of the Constantines extends above fifteen hundred years and the term of dominion unbroken by foreign conquest, surpasses the measure of the ancient monarchies—the Assyrians or Medes, the successors of Cyrus, or those of Alexander immediate contact with the original endowed for that purpose with a miraculous and prolific virtue The most ambitious aspired from a filial to a fraternal relation with the image of Edessa and such is the veronica of Rome or Spain or Jerusalem which Christ in his agony and bloody sweat applied to his face and delivered to a holy matron. The fruitful precedent was speedily transferred to the Virgin Mary and the saints and martyrs In the church of Diospolis, in Palestine the features of the Mother of God[12] were deeply inscribed in a marble column the East and West have been decorated by the pencil of St. Luke and the Evangelist, who was perhaps a physician has been forced to exercise the occupation of a painter, so profane and odious in the eyes of the primitive Christians The Olympian Jove created by the muse of Homer and the chisel of Phidias might inspire a philosophic mind with momentary devotion but these Catholic images were faintly and flatly delineated by monkish artists in the last degeneracy of taste and genius.[13]

The worship of images had stolen into the church by insensible degrees, and each petty step was pleasing to the superstitious mind as productive of comfort and innocent of sin. But in the beginning of the eighth century in the full magnitude of the abuse the more timorous Greeks were awakened by an apprehension that under the mask of Christianity they had restored the religion of their fathers they heard with grief and impatience the name of idolaters—the incessant charge of the Jews and Mohammedans[14] who derived from the Law and the Koran an immortal hatred to graven images and all relative worship The servitude of the Jews might curb their zeal and depreciate their authority but the triumphant Musulmans, who reigned at Damascus and threatened Constantinople cast into the scale of reproach the accumulated weight of truth and victory The cities of Syria, Palestine and Egypt had been fortified with the images of Christ, his mother and his saints and each city presumed on the hope or promise of miraculous defence. In a rapid conquest of ten years the Arabs subdued those cities and these images and in their opinion the Lord of Hosts pronounced a decisive judgment between the adoration and contempt of these mute and inanimate idols For a while Edessa had braved the Persian assaults but the chosen city the spouse of Christ was involved in the common ruin and his divine resemblance became the slave and trophy of the infidels. After a servitude of three hundred years, the Palladium was yielded to the devotion of Constantinople for a ransom of twelve thousand pounds of silver the redemption of two hundred Musulmans and a perpetual truce for the territory of Edessa.[15] In this season of distress and dismay the eloquence of the monks was exercised in the defence of images and they attempted to prove that the sin and schism of the greatest part of the Orientals had forfeited the favour and annihilated the virtue of these precious symbols But they were now opposed by the murmurs of many simple or rational Christians who appealed to the evidence of texts, of facts, and of the primitive times and secretly desired the reformation of the church. As the worship of images had never been established by any general or positive law its progress in the Eastern empire had been retarded or accelerated by the differences of men and manners the local degrees of refinement and the personal characters of the bishops. The splendid devotion was fondly cherished by the levity of the capital and the inventive genius of the Byzantine clergy while the rude and remote districts of Asia were strangers to this innovation of sacred luxury Many large congregations of Gnostics and Arians maintained after their conversion the simple worship which had preceded their separation and the Armenians, the most warlike subjects of Rome were not reconciled in the twelfth century to the sight of images[16] These various denominations of men afforded a fund of prejudice and aversion of small account in the villages of Anatolia or Thrace but which in the fortune of a soldier, a prelate or a eunuch, might be often connected with the powers of the church and state

Of such adventurers the most fortunate was the emperor Leo the Third[17] who from the mountains of Isauria ascended the throne of the East He was ignorant of sacred and profane letters but his education his reason, perhaps his intercourse with the Jews and Arabs had inspired the martial peasant with a hatred of images and it was held to be the duty of a prince to impose on his subjects the dictates of his own conscience But in the outset of an unsettled reign during ten years of toil and danger Leo submitted to the meanness of hypocrisy bowed before the idols which he despised and satisfied the Roman pontiff with the annual professions of his orthodoxy and zeal In the reformation of religion his first steps were moderate and cautious he assembled a great council of senators and bishops and enacted with their consent, that all the images should be re

must be endowed with a divine energy and may be considered as the proper objects of religious adoration The most audacious pencil might tremble in the rash attempt of defining by forms and colours the infinite Spirit the eternal Father, who pervades and sustains the universe[5] But the superstitious mind was more easily reconciled to paint and to worship the angels and above all, the Son of God under the human shape which on earth they have condescended to assume The second person of the Trinity had been clothed with a real and mortal body, but that body had ascended into heaven and had not some similitude been presented to the eyes of his disciples, the spiritual worship of Christ might have been obliterated by the visible relics and representations of the saints A similar indulgence was requisite and propitious for the Virgin Mary the place of her burial was unknown and the assumption of her soul and body into heaven was adopted by the credulity of the Greeks and Latins The use, and even the worship, of images was firmly established before the end of the sixth century they were fondly cherished by the warm imagination of the Greeks and Asiatics the Pantheon and Vatican were adorned with the emblems of a new superstition but this semblance of idolatry was more coldly entertained by the rude barbarians and the Arian clergy of the West The bolder forms of culpture in brass or marble which peopled the temples of antiquity were offensive to the fancy or conscience of the Christian Greeks, and a smooth surface of colours has ever been esteemed a more decent and harmless mode of imitation[6]

The merit and effect of a copy depends on its resemblance with the original, but the primitive Christians were ignorant of the genuine features of the Son of God his mother and his apostles the statue of Christ at Paneas, in Palestine[7] was more probably that of some temporal saviour the Gnostics and their profane monuments were reprobated, and the fancy of the Christian artists could only be guided by the clandestine imitation of some heathen model In this distress a bold and dexterous invention assured at once the likeness of the image and the innocence of the worship A new superstructure of fable was raised on the popular basis of a Syrian legend on the correspondence of Christ and Abgarus so famous in the days of Eusebius so reluctantly deserted by our modern advocates The bishop of Cæsarea[8] records the epistle[9] but he most strangely forgets the picture of Christ[10]—the perfect impression of his face on a linen, with which he gratified the faith of the royal stranger who had invoked his healing power, and offered the strong city of Edessa to protect him against the malice of the Jews The ignorance of the primitive church is explained by the long imprisonment of the image in a niche of the wall from whence, after an oblivion of five hundred years it was released by some prudent bishop, and seasonably presented to the devotion of the times Its first and most glorious exploit was the deliverance of the city from the arms of Chosroes Nushirvan and it was soon revered as a pledge of the divine promise that Edessa should never be taken by a foreign enemy It is true, indeed that the text of Procopius ascribes the double deliverance of Edessa to the wealth and valour of her citizens who purchased the absence and repelled the assaults of the Persian monarch He was ignorant, the profane historian of the testimony which he is compelled to deliver in the ecclesiastical page of Evagrius, that the Palladium was exposed on the rampart, and that the water which had been sprinkled on the holy face instead of quenching added new fuel to the flames of the besieged After this important service the image of Edessa was preserved with respect and gratitude and if the Armenians rejected the legend the more credulous Greeks adored the similitude which was not the work of any mortal pencil but the immediate creation of the divine original The style and sentiments of a Byzantine hymn will declare how far their worship was removed from the grossest idolatry

How can we with mortal eyes contemplate this image whose celestial splendour the host of heaven presumes not to behold? He who dwells in heaven condescends this day to visit us by his venerable image He who is seated on the cherubim visits us this day by a picture which the Father has delineated with his immaculate hand which he has formed in an ineffable manner and which we sanctify by adoring it with fear and love Before the end of the sixth century these images made without hands (in Greek it is a single word[11]) were propagated in the camps and cities of the Eastern empire[12] they were the objects of worship and the instruments of miracles and in the hour of danger or tumult their venerable presence could revive the hope rekindle the courage or repress the fury of the Roman legions Of these pictures the far greater part the transcripts of a human pencil could only pretend to a secondary likeness and improper title but there were some of higher descent, who derived their resemblance from an

civil and military power Of the Archipelago or Holy Sea the numerous islands were filled with images and monks their votaries abjured without scruple the enemy of Christ his mother and the saints they armed a fleet of boats and galleys, displayed their consecrated banners and boldly steered for the harbour of Constantinople to place on the throne a new favourite of God and the people They depended on the succour of a miracle but their miracles were inefficient against the Greek fire and after the defeat and conflagration of their fleet the naked islands were abandoned to the clemency or justice of the conqueror The son of Leo in the first year of his reign had undertaken an expedition against the Saracens during his absence the capital the palace and the purple were occupied by his kinsman Artavasdes the ambitious champion of the orthodox faith. The worship of images was triumphantly restored the patriarch renounced his dissimulation or dissembled his sentiments and the righteous claim of the usurper was acknowledged both in the new and in ancient Rome Constantine flew for refuge to his paternal mountains but he descended at the head of the bold and affectionate Isaurian and his final victory confounded the arms and predictions of the fanatics His long reign was distracted with clamour sedition, conspiracy and mutual hatred and sanguinary revenge the persecution of images was the motive or pretence of his adversaries and if they missed a temporal diadem they were rewarded by the Greeks with the crown of martyrdom In every act of open and clandestine treason the emperor felt the unforgiving enmity of the monks the faithful slaves of the superstition to which they owed their riches and influence They prayed, they preached they absolved they inflamed, they conspired the solitude of Palestine poured forth a torrent of invective and the pen of St John Damascenus is[22] the last of the Greek fathers devoted the tyrant's head, both in this world and the next[23] I am not at leisure to examine how far the monks provoked nor how much they have exaggerated their real and pretended sufferings nor how many lost their lives or limbs their eyes or their beards by the cruelty of the emperor From the chastisement of individuals he proceeded to the abolition of the order and as it was wealthy and useless, his resentment might be stimulated by avarice and justified by patriotism The formidable name and mission of the Dragon[24] his visitor-general excited the terror and abhorrence of the black nation the religious communities were dissolved the buildings were converted into magazines or barracks the lands moveables and cattle were confiscated and our modern precedents will support the charge that much wanton or malicious havoc was exercised against the relics and even the books of the monasteries With the habit and profession of monks the public and private worship of images was rigorously proscribed and it should seem that a solemn abjuration of idolatry was exacted from the subjects or at least from the clergy of the Eastern empire[25]

The patient East abjured with reluctance her sacred images they were fondly cherished and vigorously defended by the independent zeal of the Italians In ecclesiastical rank and jurisdiction the patriarch of Constantinople and the pope of Rome were nearly equal But the Greek prelate was a domestic slave under the eye of his master at whose nod he alternately passed from the convent to the throne and from the throne to the convent A distant and dangerous station amidst the barbarians of the West excited the spirit and freedom of the Latin bishops Their popular election endeared them to the Romans the public and private indigence was relieved by their ample revenue and the weakness or neglect of the emperors compelled them to consult both in peace and war the temporal safety of the city In the school of adversity the priest insensibly imbibed the virtues and the ambition of a prince the same character was assumed the same policy was adopted by the Italian the Greek or the Syrian who ascended the chair of St Peter and, after the loss of her legions and provinces the genius and fortune of the popes again restored the supremacy of Rome It is agreed that in the eighth century their dominion was founded on rebellion and that the rebellion was produced and justified by the heresy of the Iconoclasts but the conduct of the second and third Gregory in this memorable contest is variously interpreted by the wishes of their friends and enemies The Byzantine writers unanimously declare that after a fruitless admonition they pronounced the separation of the East and West and deprived the sacrilegious tyrant of the revenue and sovereignty of Italy Their excommunication is still more clearly expressed by the Greeks who beheld the accomplishment of the paper triumphs and as they are more strongly attached to their religion than to their country they praise instead of blaming the zeal and orthodoxy of these apostolical men.[26] The modern champions of Rome are eager to accept the

moved from the sanctuary and altar to a proper height in the churches where they might be visible to the eyes, and inaccessible to the superstition, of the people But it was impossible on either side to check the rapid though adverse impulse of veneration and abhorrence in their lofty position the sacred images still edified their votaries and reproached the tyrant He was himself provoked by resistance and invective and his own party accused him of an imperfect discharge of his duty, and urged for his imitation the example of the Jewish king who had broken without scruple the brazen serpent of the temple By a second edict he proscribed the existence as well as the use of religious pictures, the churches of Constantinople and the provinces were cleansed from idolatry the images of *Christ the Virgin and the saints were demol*ished or a smooth surface of plaster was spread over the walls of the edifice The sect of the Iconoclasts was supported by the zeal and despotism of six emperors and the East and West were involved in a noisy conflict of one hundred and twenty years It was the design of Leo the Isaurian to pronounce the condemnation of images as an article of faith and by the authority of a general council but the convocation of such an assembly was reserved for his son Constantine [19] and though it is stigmatised by triumphant bigotry as a meeting of fools and atheists their own partial and mutilated acts betray many symptoms of reason and piety The debates and decrees of many provincial synods introduced the summons of the general council which met in the suburbs of Constantinople and was composed of the respectable number of three hundred and thirty eight bishops of Europe and Anatolia for the patriarchs of Antioch and Alexandria were the slaves of the caliph and the Roman pontiff had withdrawn the churches of Italy and the West from the communion of the Greeks This Byzantine synod assumed the rank and powers of the seventh general council, yet even this title was a recognition of the six preceding assemblies which had laboriously built the structure of the Catholic faith After a serious deliberation of six months the three hundred and thirty-eight bishops pronounced and subscribed a unanimous decree that all visible symbols of Christ except in the Eucharist were either blasphemous or heretical that image worship was a corruption of Christianity and a renewal of Paganism, that all such monuments of idolatry should be broken or erased and that those who should refuse to deliver the objects of their private superstition were guilty of disobedience to the authority of the church and of the emperor In their loud and loyal acclamations they celebrated the merits of their temporal redeemer and to his zeal and justice they intrusted the execution of their spiritual censures At Constantinople as in the former councils the will of the prince was the rule of episcopal faith but on this occasion I am inclined to suspect that a large majority of the prelates sacrificed their secret conscience to the temptations of hope and fear In the long night of superstition the Christians had wandered far away from the simplicity of the Gospel nor was it easy for them to discern the clue and tread back the mazes of the labyrinth The worship of images was inseparably blended at least to a pious fancy with the Cross, the Virgin the saints and their relics the holy ground was involved in a cloud of miracles and visions, and the nerves of the mind curiosity and scepticism were benumbed by the habits of obedience and belief Constantine himself is accused of indulging a royal licence to doubt or deny, or deride the mysteries of the Catholics [20] but they were deeply inscribed in the public and private creed of his bishops and the boldest Iconoclast might assault with a secret horror the monuments of popular devotion, which were consecrated to the honour of his celestial patrons In the reformation of the sixteenth century freedom and knowledge had expanded all the faculties of man the thirst of innovation superseded the reverence of antiquity and the vigour of Europe could disdain those phantoms which terrified the sickly and servile weakness of the Greeks

The scandal of an abstract heresy can be only proclaimed to the people by the blast of the ecclesiastical trumpet but the most ignorant can perceive the most torpid must feel the profanation and downfall of their visible deities The first hostilities of Leo were directed against a lofty Christ on the vestibule and above the gate of the palace A ladder had been planted for the assault, but it was furiously shaken by a crowd of zealots and women they beheld with pious transport the ministers of sacrilege tumbling from on high and dashed against the pavement and the honours of the ancient martyrs were prostituted to these criminals who justly suffered for murder and rebellion [21] The execution of the Imperial edicts was resisted by frequent tumults in Constantinople and the provinces the person of Leo was endangered his officers were massacred and the popular enthusiasm was quelled by the strongest efforts of the

to visit one of their most pow rful monarchs who desires to receive from our hands the sacra ment of baptism [36] The barbarians have sub mitted to the yoke of the Gospel while you alone are deaf to the voice of the shepherd These pious barbarians are kindled into rage they thirst to avenge the persecution of the East. Abandon your rash and fatal enterprise reflect, tremble and repent If you persist we are innocent of the blood that will be spilt in the contest may it fall on your own head!"

The fir assault of Leo against the images of Constantinople had been witnessed by a crowd of strangers from Italy and the West who re lated with grief and indignation the sacrilege of the emperor But on the reception of his pro scriptive edict they trembled for their domestic deities the images of Christ and the Virgin of the angels martyrs and saints were abolished in all the churches of Italy and a strong alter native was proposed to the Roman pontiff the royal favour as the price of his compliance deg radation and exile as the penalty of his dis obedience Neither zeal nor policy allowed him to hesitate and the haughty strain in which Gregory addressed the emperor displays his confidence in the truth of his doctrine or the powers of resistance Withou depending on prayers or miracles he boldly armed against the public enemy and his pastoral letters ad monished the Italians of their danger and their duty [37] At this signal Ravenna Venice and the cities of the Exarchate and Pentapolis adhered to the cause of religion their military force by sea and land consisted for the most part, of the natives and the spirit of patriotism and zeal was transfused into the mercenary strangers. The Italians swor to live and die in the defence of the pope and the holy images the Roman people was devoted to their father and even the Lombards were ambitious to share the merit and advantage of this holy war The most trea sonable act but th mos obvious revenge was the destruction of th statues of Leo himself the most effectual and pleasing measure of rebellion was the withholding the tribute of Italy and depriving him of a power which he had recently abused by the imposition of a new capitation [38] A form of administration was preserved by the election of magistrates and gov rors and so high was the public indigna ion that the Ital ians were prepared to create an orthodox em peror and to conduct him with a fleet and army to the palace of Constantinople In that palace the Roman bishops, the second a d third Greg ory were condemned as the authors of the re volt and every attempt was made either by fraud or force, to seize their persons and to strike at their lives The city was repeatedly visited or assaulted by captains of the guards, and dukes and exarchs of high dignity or secret trust they landed with foreign troops, they ob tained some domestic aid and the superstition of Naples may blush that her fathers were at tached to the cause of heresy But these clandes tine or open attacks were repelled by the cour age and vigilance of the Romans the Greeks were overthrown and massacred their leaders suffered an ignominious death, and the popes however inclined to mercy refused to inter cede for these guilty victims At Ravenna [39] the several quarters of the city had long exer cised a bloody and hereditary feud, in religious controversy they found a new aliment of fac tion but the votaries of images were superior in numbers or spirit and the exarch, who at tempted to stem the torrent, lost his life in a popular sedition To punish this flagitious deed, and restore his dominion in Italy the emperor sent a fleet and army into the Hadriatic gulf. After suffering from the winds and waves much loss and delay the Greeks made their descent in the neighbourhood of Ravenna they threat ened to depopulate the guilty capital and to imitate, perhaps to surpass the example of Jus tinian the Second, who had chastised a former rebellion by the choice and execution of fifty of the principal inhabitants The women and clergy in sackcloth and ashes, lay prostrate in prayer the men were in arms for the defence of their country the common danger had united the factions and the event of a battle was preferred to the slow miseries of a siege In a hard fought day, as the two armies alternately yielded and advanced, a phantom was seen a voice was heard, and Ravenna was victorious by the assurance of victory The strangers re treated to their ships but the populous sea coast poured forth a multitude of boats the waters of the Po were so deeply infected with blood that during six years the public preju dice abstained from the fish of the river and the institution of an annual feast perpetuated the worship of images and the abhorrence of the Greek tyrant Amidst the triumph of the Cath olic arms the Roman pontiff convened a synod of ninety three bishops against the heresy of the Iconoclasts With their consent he pronounced a general excommunication against all who by word or deed should attack the tradition of the fathers and the images of the saints in this sen tence the emperor was tacitly involved [40] but praise and the precedent this great and glorious example of the deposition of royal heretics is celebrated by the cardinals Baronius and Bellarmine,[27] and if they are asked why the same thunders were not hurled against the Neros and Julians of antiquity? they reply that the weakness of the primitive church was the sole cause of her patient loyalty[28] On this occasion the effects of love and hatred are the same and the zealous Protestants, who seek to kindle the indignation and to alarm the fears of princes and magistrates, expatiate on the insolence and treason of the two Gregories against their lawful sovereign[29] They are defended only by the moderate Catholics, for the most part of the Gallican church[30] who respect the saint without approving the sin These common advocates of the crown and mitre circumscribe the truth of facts by the rule of equity Scripture, and tradition and appeal to the evidence of the Latins,[31] and the lives[32] and epistles of the popes themselves

Two original epistles, from Gregory the Second to the emperor Leo, are still extant,[33] and if they cannot be praised as the most perfect models of eloquence and logic they exhibit the portrait, or at least the mask of the founder of the papal monarchy "During ten pure and fortunate years," says Gregory to the emperor "we have tasted the annual comfort of your royal letters subscribed in purple ink with your own hand, the sacred pledges of your attachment to the orthodox creed of our fathers How deplorable is the change! how tremendous the scandal! You now accuse the Catholics of idolatry, and by the accusation, you betray your own impiety and ignorance To this ignorance we are compelled to adapt the grossness of our style and arguments the first elements of holy letters are sufficient for your confusion and were you to enter a grammar school and avow yourself the enemy of our worship the simple and pious children would be provoked to cast their horn books at your head" After this decent salutation the pope attempts the usual distinction between the idols of antiquity and the Christian images The former were the fanciful representations of phantoms or demons at a time when the true God had not manifested his person in any visible likeness The latter are the genuine forms of Christ, his mother and his saints, who had approved, by a crowd of miracles the innocence and merit of this relative worship He must indeed have trusted to the ignorance of Leo since he could assert the perpetual use of images from the apostolic age, and their venerable presence in the six synods of the Catholic church A more specious argument is drawn from present possession and recent practice the harmony of the Christian world supersedes the demand of a general council and Gregory frankly confesses that such assemblies can only be useful under the reign of an orthodox prince To the impudent and inhuman Leo more guilty than a heretic he recommends peace silence, and implicit obedience to his spiritual guides of Constantinople and Rome. The limits of civil and ecclesiastical powers are defined by the pontiff To the former he appropriates the body, to the latter the soul the sword of justice is in the hands of the magistrate the more formidable weapon of excommunication is intrusted to the clergy and in the exercise of their divine commission a zealous son will not spare his offending father the successor of St Peter may lawfully chastise the kings of the earth "You assault us, O tyrant! with a carnal and military hand unarmed and naked we can only implore the Christ the prince of the heavenly host, that he will send unto you a devil for the destruction of your body and the salvation of your soul You declare, with foolish arrogance, I will despatch my orders to Rome I will break in pieces the image of St Peter, and Gregory, like his predecessor Martin shall be transported in chains and in exile to the foot of the imperial throne Would to God that I might be permitted to tread in the footsteps of the holy Martin! but may the fate of Constans serve as a warning to the persecutors of the church" After his just condemnation by the bishops of Sicily the tyrant was cut off in the fulness of his sins by a domestic servant the saint is still adored by the nations of Scythia among whom he ended his banishment and his life But it is our duty to live for the edification and support of the faithful people nor are we reduced to risk our safety on the event of a combat Incapable as you are of defending your Roman subjects the maritime situation of the city may perhaps expose it to your depredation but we can remove to the distance of four and twenty stadia,[34] to the first fortress of the Lombards and then—you may pursue the winds Are you ignorant that the popes are the bond of union the mediators of peace between the East and West? The eyes of the nations are fixed on our humility and they revere as a God upon earth the apostle St Peter whose image you threaten to destroy[35] The remote and interior kingdoms of the West present their homage to Christ and his vicegerent and we now prepare to visit one of their most powerful monarchs who desires to receive from our hands the sacrament of baptism [34] The barbarians have submitted to the yoke of the Gospel while you alone are deaf to the voice of the shepherd. These pious barbarians are kindled into rage they thirst to avenge the persecution of the East Abandon your rash and fatal enterprise reflect, tremble and repent If you persist, we are innocent of the blood that will be spilt in the contest may it fall on your own head!"

The first assault of Leo against the images of Constantinople had been witnessed by a crowd of strangers from Italy and the West who related with grief and indignation the sacrilege of the emperor But on the reception of his proscriptive edict they trembled for their domestic deities the images of Christ and the Virgin of the angels martyrs and saints were abolished in all the churches of Italy and a strong alternative was proposed to the Roman pontiff the royal favour as the price of his compliance degradation and exile as the penalty of his disobedience Neither zeal nor policy allowed him to hesitate and the haughty strain in which Gregory addressed the emperor displays his confidence in the truth of his doctrine, or the powers of resistance Without depending on prayers or miracles he boldly armed against the public enemy and his pastoral letters admonished the Italians of their danger and their duty [17] At this signal Ravenna Venice and the cities of the Exarchate and Pentapolis adhered to the cause of religion their military force by sea and land consisted, for the most part, of the natives and the spirit of patriotism and zeal was transfused into the mercenary strangers. the vote of a last and hopeless remonstrance may seem to imply that the anathema was yet suspended over his guilty head No sooner had they confirmed their own safety, the worship of images and the freedom of Rome and Italy than the popes appear to have relaxed of their severity, and to have spared the relics of the Byzantine dominion Their moderate counsels delayed and prevented the election of a new emperor, and they exhorted the Italians not to separate from the body of the Roman monarchy The exarch was permitted to reside with in the walls of Ravenna a captive rather than a master and till the Imperial coronation of Charlemagne the governmen of Rome and Italy was exercised in the name of the successors of Constantine [41]

The liberty of Rome which had been oppressed by the arms and arts of Augustus, was rescued after seven hundred and fifty years of servitude, from the persecution of Leo the Isaurian By the Cæsars the triumphs of the consuls had been annihilated in the decline and fall of the empire, the god Terminus, the sacred boundary had insensibly receded from the ocean the Rhine the Danube, and the Euphrates, and Rome was reduced to her ancient territory from Viterbo to Terracina and from Narni to the mouth of the Tiber [42] When the kings were banished the republic reposed on the firm basis which had been founded by their wisdom and virtue Their perpetual jurisdiction was divided between two annual magistrates the senate continued to exercise the powers of administration and counsel and the legislative authority was distributed in the assemblies of the people by a well proportioned scale of property and service Ignorant of the arts of luxury the primitive Romans had improved the science of government and war the will of the community was absolute the rights of individuals were sacred one hundred and thirty thousand citizens were armed for defence or conquest and a band of robbers and outlaws was moulded into a nation deserving of freedom and ambitious of glory [43] When the sovereignty of the Greek emperors was extinguished the ruins of Rome presented the sad image of depopulation and decay her slavery was a habit her liberty an accident the effect of superstition and the object of her own amazement and terror The last vestige of the substance or even the forms of the constitution was obliterated from the practice and memory of the Romans, and they were devoid of knowledge or virtue again to build the fabric of a commonwealth Their scanty remnant the offspring of slaves and strangers was despicable in the eyes of the victorious barbarians As often as the Franks or Lombards expressed their most bitter contempt of a foe, they called him a Roman "and in this name" says the bishop Liutprand, "we include whatever is base whatever is cowardly whatever is perfidious the extremes of avarice and luxury, and every vice that can prostitute the dignity of human nature" [44] By the necessity of their situation the inhabitants of Rome were cast into the rough model of a republican government they were compelled to elect some judges in peace and some leaders in war the nobles assembled to deliberate and their resolves could not be executed without the union and consent of the multitude The style of the Roman senate and people was revived [45] but the spirit was fled and their new independence was disgraced by the tumultuous conflict of licentiousness and oppression The want of laws could only be supplied by the influence of religion and their foreign and domestic counsels were moderated by the authority of the bishop His alms his sermons, his correspondence with the kings and prelates of the West, his recent services their gratitude and oath accustomed the Romans to consider him as the first magistrate or prince of the city The Christian humility of the popes was not offended by the name of Dominus or Lord and their face and inscription are still apparent on the most ancient coins [46] Their temporal dominion is now confirmed by the reverence of a thousand years and their noblest title is the free choice of a people whom they had redeemed from slavery

In the quarrels of ancient Greece the holy people of Elis enjoyed a perpetual peace, under the protection of Jupiter and in the exercise of the Olympic games [47] Happy would it have been for the Romans if a similar privilege had guarded the patrimony of St Peter from the calamities of war if the Christians who visited the holy threshold would have sheathed their swords in the presence of the apostle and his successor But this mystic circle could have been traced only by the want of a legislator and a sage this pacific system was incompatible with the zeal and ambition of the popes the Romans were not addicted like the inhabitants of Elis, to the innocent and placid labours of agriculture and the barbarians of Italy though softened by the climate were far below the Grecian states in the institutions of public and private life A memorable example of repentance and piety was exhibited by Liutprand king of the

Lombards In arms at the gate of the Vatican, the conqueror listened to the voice of Gregory the Second [48] withdrew his troops resigned his conquests respectfully visited the church of St. Peter and after performing his devotions offered his sword and dagger his cuirass and mantle his silver cross, and his crown of gold on the tomb of the apostle But this religious fervour was the illusion perhaps the artifice of the moment the sense of interest is strong and lasting the love of arms and rapine was congenial to the Lombards and both the prince and people were irresistibly tempted by the disorders of Italy the nakedness of Rome and the unwarlike profession of her new chief On the first edicts of the emperor they declared themselves the champions of the holy images Liutprand invaded the province of Romagna which had already assumed that distinctive appellation the Catholics of the Exarchate yielded without reluctance to his civil and military power and a foreign enemy was introduced for the first time into the impregnable fortress of Ravenna. That city and fortress were speedily recovered by the active diligence and maritime forces of the Venetians and those faithful subjects obeyed the exhortation of Gregory himself in separating the personal guilt of Leo from the general cause of the Roman empire [49] The Greeks were less mindful of the service than the Lombards of the injury the two nations hostile in their faith were reconciled in a dangerous and unnatural alliance the king and the exarch marched to the conquest of Spoleto and Rome the storm evaporated without effect but the policy of Liutprand alarmed Italy with a vexatious alternative of hostility and truce His successor Astolphus declared himself the equal enemy of the emperor and the pope Ravenna was subdued by force or treachery [50] and this final conquest extinguished the series of the exarchs who had reigned with a subordinate power since the time of Justinian and the ruin of the Gothic kingdom Rome was summoned to acknowledge the victorious Lombard as her lawful sovereign the annual tribute of a piece of gold was fixed as the ransom of each citizen and the sword of destruction was unsheathed to exact the penalty of her disobedience The Romans hesitated they entreated they complained and the threatening barbarians were checked by arms and negotiations, till the popes had engaged the friendship of an ally and avenger beyond the Alps [51]

In his distress the first Gregory had implored the aid of the hero of the age of Charles Martel who governed the French monarchy with the humble title of mayor or duke and who by his signal victory over the Saracens had saved his country and perhaps Europe from the Mohammedan yoke The ambassadors of the pope were received by Charles with decent reverence but the greatness of his occupations and the shortness of his life prevented his interference in the affairs of Italy except by a friendly and ineffectual mediation His son Pepin the heir of his power and virtues assumed the office of champion of the Roman church and the zeal of the French prince appears to have been prompted by the love of glory and religion But the danger was on the banks of the Tiber the succour on those of the Seine and our sympathy is cold to the relation of distant misery Amidst the tears of the city Stephen the Third embraced the generous resolution of visiting in person the courts of Lombardy and France to deprecate the injustice of his enemy or to excite the pity and indignation of his friend After soothing the public despair by litanies and orations he undertook this laborious journey with the ambassadors of the French monarch and the Greek emperor The king of the Lombards was inexorable but his threats could not silence the complaints nor retard the speed, of the Roman pontiff who traversed the Pennine Alps reposed in the abbey of St. Maurice and hastened to grasp the right hand of his protector a hand which was never lifted in vain, either in war or friendship Stephen was entertained as the visible successor of the apostle at the next assembly the field of March or of May his injuries were exposed to a devout and warlike nation, and he repassed the Alps not as a suppliant, but as a conqueror at the head of a French army, which was led by the king in person The Lombards after a weak resistance obtained an ignominious peace and swore to restore the possessions, and to respect the sanctity of the Roman church. But no sooner was Astolphus delivered from the presence of the French arms than he forgot his promise and resented his disgrace Rome was again encompassed by his arms and Stephen apprehensive of fatiguing the zeal of his Transalpine allies enforced his complaint and request by an eloquent letter in the name and person of St Peter himself [52] The apostle assures his adoptive sons the king the clergy and the nobles of France that, dead in the flesh he is still alive in the spirit that they now hear and must obey the voice of the founder and guardian of the Roman church that the Virgin the angels the saints and the martyrs, and all the host of heaven unanimously urge the request and will confess the obligation that riches victory, and paradise will crown their pious enterprise, and that eternal damnation will be the penalty of their neglect, if they suffer his tomb his temple and his people to fall into the hands of the perfidious Lombards The second expedition of Pepin was not less rapid and fortunate than the first St Peter was satisfied, Rome was again saved and Astolphus was taught the lessons of justice and sincerity by the scourge of a foreign master After this double chastisement the Lombards languished about twenty years in a state of languor and decay But their minds were not yet humbled to their condition and instead of affecting the pacific virtues of the feeble they peevishly harassed the Romans with a repetition of claims, evasions, and inroads which they undertook without reflection and terminated without glory On either side, their expiring monarchy was pressed by the zeal and prudence of Pope Adrian the First, the genius, the fortune and greatness of Charlemagne the son of Pepin these heroes of the church and state were united in public and domestic friendship, and, while they trampled on the prostrate they varnished their proceedings with the fairest colours of equity and moderation [53] The passes of the Alps and the walls of Pavia were the only defence of the Lombards, the former were surprised the latter were invested by the son of Pepin, and after a blockade of two years Desiderius, the last of their native princes, surrendered his sceptre and his capital Under the dominion of a foreign king but in the possession of their national laws, the Lombards became the brethren rather than the subjects, of the Franks who derived their blood and manners and language from the same Germanic origin [54]

The mutual obligations of the popes and the Carlovingian family form the important link of ancient and modern, of civil and ecclesiastical history In the conquest of Italy the champions of the Roman church obtained a favourable occasion, a specious title the wishes of the people the prayers and intrigues of the clergy But the most essential gifts of the popes to the Carlovingian race were the dignities of king of France[55] and of patrician of Rome I Under the sacerdotal monarchy of St Peter the nations began to resume the practice of seeking on the banks of the Tiber their kings their laws and the oracles of their fate The Franks were perplexed between the name and substance of their government All the powers of royalty were exercised by Pepin mayor of the palace and nothing, except the regal title was wanting to his ambition His enemies were crushed by his valour, his friends were multiplied by his liberality his father had been the saviour of Christendom, and the claims of personal merit were repeated and ennobled in a descent of four generations The name and image of royalty was still preserved in the last descendant of Clovis the feeble Childeric but his obsolete right could only be used as an instrument of sedition the nation was desirous of restoring the simplicity of the constitution, and Pepin a subject and a prince was ambitious to ascertain his own rank and the fortune of his family The mayor and the nobles were bound, by an oath of fidelity, to the royal phantom the blood of Clovis was pure and sacred in their eyes and their common ambassadors addressed the Roman pontiff to dispel their scruples or to absolve their promise The interest of Pope Zachary, the successor of the two Gregories prompted him to decide, and to decide in their favour he pronounced that the nation might lawfully unite in the same person the title and authority of king and that the unfortunate Childeric a victim of the public safety should be degraded, shaved and confined in a monastery for the remainder of his days An answer so agreeable to their wishes was accepted by the Franks as the opinion of a casuist, the sentence of a judge, or the oracle of a prophet the Merovingian race disappeared from the earth and Pepin was exalted on a buckler by the suffrage of a free people accustomed to obey his laws and to march under his standard His coronation was twice performed with the sanction of the popes by their most faithful servant St Boniface th apostle of Germany and by the grateful hands of Stephen the Third who, in the monastery of St Denys placed the diadem on the head of his benefactor The royal unction of the kings of Israel was dexterously applied [56] the successor of St Peter assumed the character of a divine ambassador a German chieftain was transformed into the Lord s anointed and this Jewish rite has been diffused and maintained by the superstition and vanity of modern Europe The Franks were absolved from their ancient oath but a dire anathema was thundered against them and their posterity if they should dare to renew the same freedom of choice or to elect a king except in the holy and meritorious race of the Carlovingian princes Without apprehending the future danger these princes gloried in their present security the secretary of Charle

magne affirms that the French sceptre was transferred by the authority of the popes [57] and, in their boldest enterprises they insist with confidence on this signal and successful act of temporal jurisdiction

II In the change of manners and language the patricians of Rome [58] were far removed from the senate of Romulus or the palace of Constantine—from the free nobles of the republic, or the fictitious parents of the emperor After the recovery of Italy and Africa by the arms of Justinian the importance and danger of those remote provinces required the presence of a supreme magistrate he was indifferently styled the exarch or the patrician and these governors of Ravenna, who fill their place in the chronology of princes extended their jurisdiction over the Roman city Since the revolt of Italy and the loss of the Exarchate the distress of the Romans had exacted some sacrifice of their independence. Yet, even in this act they exercised the right of disposing of themselves and the decrees of the senate and people successively invested Charles Martel and his posterity with the honours of patrician of Rome The leaders of a powerful nation would have disdained a servile title and subordinate office but the reign of the Greek emperors was suspended and in the vacancy of the empire they derived a more glorious commission from the pope and the republic. The Roman ambassadors presented these patricians with the keys of the shrine of St Peter as a pledge and symbol of sovereignty with a holy banner which it was their right and duty to unfurl in the defence of the church and the city [59] In the time of Charles Martel and of Pepin, the interposition of the Lombard kingdom covered the freedom while it threatened the safety of Rome and the patriciate represented only the title the service the alliance of these distant protectors The power and policy of Charlemagne annihilated an enemy and imposed a master In his first visit to the capital he was received with all the honours which had formerly been paid to the exarch, the representative of the emperor and these honours obtained some new decorations from the joy and gratitude of Pope Adrian the First [60] No sooner was he informed of the sudden approach of the monarch than he despatched the magistrates and nobles of Rome to meet him with the banner about thirty miles from the city At the distance of one mile the Flaminian Way was lined with the schools or national communities, of Greeks Lombards Saxons &c the Roman youth was under arms and the children of a more tender age with palms and olive branches in their hands chanted the praises of their great deliverer At the aspect of the holy crosses and ensigns of the saints he dismounted from his horse led the procession of his nobles to the Vatican and as he ascended the stairs devoutly kissed each step of the threshold of the apostles In the portico Adrian expected him at the head of his clergy they embraced as friends and equals but in their march to the altar the king or patrician assumed the right hand of the pope Nor was the Frank content with these vain and empty demonstrations of respect In the twenty-six years that elapsed between the conquest of Lombardy and his Imperial coronation Rome which had been delivered by the sword was subject as his own to the sceptre of Charlemagne The people swore allegiance to his person and family in his name money was coined and justice was administered and the election of the popes was examined and confirmed by his authority Except an original and self inherent claim of sovereignty there was not any prerogative remaining which the title of emperor could add to the patrician of Rome [61]

The gratitude of the Carlovingians was adequate to these obligations and their names are consecrated as the saviours and benefactors of the Roman church. Her ancient patrimony of farms and houses was transformed by their bounty into the temporal dominion of cities and provinces and the donation of the Exarchate was the first fruits of the conquests of Pepin [62] Astolphus with a sigh relinquished his prey the keys and the hostages of the principal cities were delivered to the French ambassador and in his master's name he presented them before the tomb of St Peter The ample measure of the Exarchate [63] might comprise all the provinces of Italy which had obeyed the emperor and his vicegerent but its strict and proper limits were included in the territories of Ravenna Bologna, and Ferrara its inseparable dependency was the Pentapolis which stretched along the Hadriatic from Rimini to Ancona and advanced into the midland country as far as the ridges of the Apennine In this transaction the ambition and avarice of the popes has been severely condemned. Perhaps the humility of a Christian priest should have rejected an earthly kingdom which it was not easy for him to govern without renouncing the virtues of his profession Perhaps a faithful subject or even a generous enemy would have been less impatient to divide the spoils of the barbarian and if the emperor had intrusted Stephen to solicit in his name the restitution of the Exarchate I will not absolve the pope from the reproach of treachery and false hood But in the rigid interpreta ion of the laws, every one may accept, without injury, what ever his benefactor can bestow without injus tice The Greek emperor had abdicated or for feited his right to the Exarchate and the sword of Astolphus was broken by the stronger sword of the Carlovingian It was not in the cause of the Iconoclast that Pepin had exposed his per son and army in a double expedition beyond the Alps he possessed and might lawfully alienate, his conquests and to the importuni ties of the Greeks he piously replied that no hu man consideration should tempt him to resume the gift which he had conferred on the Roman pontiff for the remission of his sins and the sal vation of his soul The splendid donation was granted in supreme and absolute dominion, and the world beheld for the first time a Chris tian bishop invested with the prerogatives of a temporal prince—the choice of magistrates the exercise of justice the imposition of taxes, and the wealth of the palace of Ravenna In the dis- solution of the Lombard kingdom the inhabi tants of the duchy of Spoleto[64] sought a refuge from the storm shaved their heads after the Ro man fashion declared themselves the servants and subjects of St Peter, and completed by this voluntary surrender, the present circle of the ecclesiastical state That mysterious circle was enlarged to an indefinite extent by the ver bal or written donation of Charlemagne [65] who, in the first transports of his victory, despoiled himself and the Greek emperor of the cities and islands which had formerly been annexed to the Exarchate But in the cooler moments of ab sence and reflection he viewed with an eye of jealousy and envy the recent greatness of his ecclesiastic ally The execution of his own and his father s promises was respectfully eluded the king of the Franks and Lombards asserted the inalienable rights of the empire and in his life and death Ravenna,[66] as well as Rome was numbered in the list of his metropolitan cities The sovereignty of the Exarchate melted away in the hands of the popes they found in the archbishops of Ravenna a dangerous and do- mestic rival [67] the nobles and people disdained the yoke of a priest and in the disorders of the times they could only retain the memory of an ancient claim which in a more prosperous age they have revived and realised

Fraud is the resource of weakness and cun ning and the strong though ignorant, barba rian was often entangled in the net of sacerdotal policy The Vatican and Lateran were an ar senal and manufacture which according to the occasion have produced or concealed a various collection of false or genuine, of corrupt or sus- picious acts as they tended to promote the in terest of the Roman church Before the end of the eighth century some apostolical scribe per haps the notorious Isidore, composed the decre tals and the donation of Constantine the two magic pillars of the spiritual and temporal mon archy of the popes This memorable donation was introduced to the world by an epistle of Adrian the First who exhorts Charlemagne to imitate the liberality and revive the name of the great Constantine [68] According to the legend, the first of the Christian emperors was healed of the leprosy, and purified in the waters of bap- tism by St Silvester, the Roman bishop a d never was physician more gloriously recom pensed His royal proselyte withdrew from the seat and patrimony of St Peter declared his resolution of founding a new capital in the East and resigned to the popes the free and perpetual sovereignty of Rome Italy and the provinces of the West [69] This fiction was productive of the most beneficial effects The Greek princes were convicted of the guilt of usurpation, and the re volt of Gregory was the claim of his lawful in heritance The popes were delivered from their debt of gratitude and the nominal gifts of the Carlovingians were no more than the just and irrevocable restitution of a scanty portion of the ecclesiastical state The sovereignty of Rome no longer depended on the choice of a fickle peo- ple and the successors of St Peter and Con stantine were invested with the purple and pr rogatives of the Cæsars So deep was the igno- rance and credulity of the times that the mo absurd of fables was received with equal rever ence in Greece and in France and is still en rolled among the decrees of the canon law [70] The emperors and the Romans were incapable of discerning a forgery that subverted their rights and freedom and the only opposition proceeded from a Sabine monastery, which in the beginning of the twelfth century disputed the truth and validity of the donation of Con stantine [71] In the revival of letters and liberty this fictitious deed was transpierced by the pen of Laurentius Valla the pen of an eloquent critic and a Roman patriot [72] His contempora ries of the fifteenth century were astonished at his sacrilegious boldness yet such is the silent and irresistible progress of reason that before the end of the next age the fable was rejected by the contempt of historians[73] and poets [74] and th

tacit or modest censure of the advocates of the Roman church.[75] The popes themselves have indulged a smile at the credulity of the vulgar [76] but a false and obsolete title still sanctifies their reign and by the same fortune which has attend d the decretals and the Sibylline oracles the edifice has subsisted after the foundations have been undermined

While the popes established in Italy their freedom and dominion the images the first cause of their revolt were restored in the East ern empire.[77] Under the reign of Constantine the Fifth, the union of civil and ecclesiastical power had overthrown the tree, without extir pating the root of superstition The idols for such they were now held were secretly cher ished by the order and the sex most prone to devotion and the fond alliance of the monks and females obtained a final victory over the reason and authority of man Leo the Fourth maintained with less rigour the religion of his father and grandfather but his wife the fair and ambitious Irene had imbibed the zeal of the Athenians the heirs of the idolatry rather than the philosophy of their ancestors During the life of h r husband these sentiments were in flamed by danger and dissimulation and she could only labour to protect and promote some favourite monks whom she drew from their caverns and seated on the metropolitan thrones of the East But as soon as she reigned in her own name and that of he son Irene more seri ously undertook the ruin of the Iconoclasts and the first step of h r future persecution was a general edict for liberty of conscience In the resto ration of the monks a thousand images were ex posed to the public veneration a thousand legends were invented of their sufferings and miracl s By the opportunities of death or re moval the episcopal seats were judiciously filled the most eager competitors for earthly or celes tial favour anticipated and flattered the judg ment of their sovereign and the promotion of h r secretary Tarasius gave Irene the pa riarch of Constantinople and the command of the Oriental church. But the decrees of a general council could only be repeal d by a similar as sembly [78] the Iconoclasts whom he convened wer bold in possession and averse to debate and the feeble voice of the bishops was re echoed by the more formidable clamour of the soldiers and people of Constantinople The de lay and intrigues of a year the separation of the disaffected troops and the choice of Nice for a second orthodox synod removed these obsta cles and the episcopal conscience was again, after the Greek fashion in the hands of the prince No more than eighteen days were al lowed for the consummation of this important work the Iconoclasts appeared not as judges, but as criminals or penitents the scene was decorated by the legates of Pope Adrian and the Eastern patriarchs [79] the decrees were framed by the president Tarasius and ratified by the acclamations and subscriptions of three hun dred and fifty bishops They unanimously pro nounced that the worship of images is agreeable to Scripture and reason to the fathers and councils of the church but they hesitate whe ther that worship be relative or direct whether the Godhead and the figure of Christ be en titled to the same mode of adoration Of this second Nicene council the acts are still extant a curious monument of superstition and igno rance of falsehood and folly I shall only notice the judgment of the bishops on the comparative merit of image worship and morality A monk had concluded a truce with the demon of forni cation on condition of interrupting his daily prayers to a picture that hung in his cell. His scruples prompted him to consult the abbot. Rather than abs ain from adoring Christ and his Mother in their holy images it would be better for you replied the casuist to enter every brothel and vis t every prostitute in the city [80] For the honour of orthodoxy at least the orthodoxy of the Roman church it is some what unfortunate that the two princes who con vened the two councils of Nice are both stained with the blood of their sons The second of these assemblies was approved and rigorously exe cuted by the despotism of Irene and she re fused her adversaries the toleration which at first she had granted to her friends During the five succeeding reigns a period of thirty-eigh years the contest was maintained with un abated rage and various success between the worshippers and the breakers of the images but I am not inclined to pursue with minute dilig nce the repetition of the same events. Nicephorus allowed a general liberty of speech and practice and the only virtue of his reign is accused by the monks as the cause of his tem poral and eternal perdition Superstition and weakness formed the character of Michael the First but the saints and images were incapable of supporting their votary on the throne In the purple Leo the Fifth asserted the name and re ligion of an Armenian and the idols, with their seditious adherents were condemned to a second exile Their applause would have sancti fied the murder of an impious tyrant but his

assassin and successor, the second Michael, was tainted from his birth with the Phrygian heresies he attempted to mediate between the contending parties, and the intractable spirit of the Catholics insensibly cast him into the opposite scale His moderation was guarded by timidity, but his son Theophilus alike ignorant of fear and pity was the last and most cruel of the Iconoclasts The enthusiasm of the times ran strongly against them, and the emperors, who stemmed the torrent were exasperated and punished by the public hatred After the death of Theophilus the final victory of the images was achieved by a second female, his widow Theodora whom he left the guardian of the empire Her measures were bold and decisive The fiction of a tardy repentance absolved the fame and the soul of her deceased husband, the sentence of the Iconoclast patriarch was commuted from the loss of his eyes to a whipping of two hundred lashes the bishops trembled the monks shouted and the festival of orthodoxy preserves the annual memory of the triumph of the images A single question yet remained whether they are endowed with any proper and inherent sanctity, it was agitated by the Greeks of the eleventh century,[81] and as this opinion has the strongest recommendation of absurdity I am surprised that it was not more explicitly decided in the affirmative In the West Pope Adrian the First accepted and announced the decrees of the Nicene assembly, which is now revered by the Catholics as the seventh in rank of the general councils Rome and Italy were docile to the voice of their father, but the greatest part of the Latin Christians were far behind in the race of superstition The churches of France Germany, England and Spain steered a middle course between the adoration and the destruction of images, which they admitted into their temples not as objects of worship but as lively and useful memorials of faith and history An angry book of controversy was composed and published in the name of Charlemagne [82] under his authority a synod of three hundred bishops was assembled at Frankfort [83] they blamed the fury of the Iconoclasts, but they pronounced a more severe censure against the superstition of the Greeks and the decrees of their pretended council, which was long despised by the barbarians of the West [84] Among them the worship of images advanced with a silent and insensible progress but a large atonement is made for their hesitation and delay by the gross idolatry of the ages which precede the reformation and of the countries both in Europe and America which are still immersed in the gloom of superstition

It was after the Nicene synod and under the reign of the pious Irene that the popes consummated the separation of Rome and Italy by the translation of the empire to the less orthodox Charlemagne They were compelled to choose between the rival nations religion was not the sole motive of their choice and while they dissembled the failings of their friends they beheld, with reluctance and suspicion the Catholic virtues of their foes The difference of language and manners had perpetuated the enmity of the two capitals, and they were alienated from each other by the hostile opposition of seventy years In that schism the Romans had tasted of freedom and the popes of sovereignty their submission would have exposed them to the revenge of a jealous tyrant, and the revolution of Italy had betrayed the impotence as well as the tyranny of the Byzantine court The Greek emperors had restored the images but they had not restored the Calabrian estates[85] and the Illyrian diocese [86] which the Iconoclasts had torn away from the successors of St Peter and Pope Adrian threatens them with a sentence of excommunication unless they speedily abjure this practical heresy [87] The Greeks were now orthodox but their religion might be tainted by the breath of the reigning monarch the Franks were now contumacious but a discerning eye might discern their approaching conversion from the use to the adoration of images The name of Charlemagne was stained by the polemic acrimony of his scribes but the conqueror himself conformed with the temper of a statesman to the various practice of France and Italy In his four pilgrimages or visits to the Vatican he embraced the popes in the communion of friendship and piety knelt before the tomb and consequently before the image, of the apostle, and joined without scruple in all the prayers and processions of the Roman liturgy Would prudence or gratitude allow the pontiffs to renounce their benefactor? Had they a right to alienate his gift of the Exarchate? Had they power to abolish his government of Rome? The title of patrician was below the merit and greatness of Charlemagne and it was only by reviving the Western empire that they could pay their obligations or secure their establishment By this decisive measure they would finally eradicate the claims of the Greeks from the debasement of a provincial town the majesty of Rome would be restored the Latin Christians would be united under a supreme head in their ancient metropolis and the conquerors of the West would receive their crown from the successors of St. Peter The Roman church would acquire a zealous and respectable advocate and, under the shadow of the Carlovingian power the bishop might exercise with honour and safety the government of the city [88]

Before the ruin of Paganism in Rome the competition for a wealthy bishopric had often been productive of tumult and bloodshed The people was less numerous but the times were more savage the prize more important, and the chair of St. Peter was fiercely disputed by the leading ecclesiastics who aspired to the rank of sovereign The reign of Adrian the First[89] surpasses the measure of past or succeeding ages [90] the walls of Rome the sacred patrimony the ruin of the Lombards and the friendship of Charlemagne were the trophies of his fame he secretly edified the throne of his successors, and displayed in a narrow space the virtues of a great prince His memory was revered but in the next election, a priest of the Lateran, Leo the Third, was preferred to the nephew and the favourite of Adrian whom he had promoted to the first dignities of the church. Their acquiescence or repentance disguised above four years, the blackest intention of revenge till the day of a procession when a furious band of conspirators dispersed the unarmed multitude and assaulted with blows and wounds the sacred person of the pope But their enterprise on his life or liberty was disappointed perhaps by their own confusion and remorse Leo was left for dead on the ground on his revival from the swoon the effect of his loss of blood he recovered his speech and sight and this natural event was improved to the miraculous restoration of his eyes and tongue of which he had been deprived twice deprived, by the knife of the assassins [91] From his prison he escaped to the Vatican the duke of Spoleto hastened to his rescue, Charlemagne sympathised in his injury and in his camp of Paderborn in Westphalia accepted or solicited a visit from the Roman pontiff Leo repassed the Alps with a commission of counts and bishops the guards of his safety and the judges of his innocence and it was not without reluctance that the conqueror of the Saxons delayed till the ensuing year the personal discharge of this pious office In his fourth and last pilgrimage he was received at Rome with the due honours of king and patrician Leo was permitted to purge himself by oath of the crimes imputed to his charge his enemies were silenced and the sacrilegious attempt against his life was punished by the mild and insufficient penalty of exile On the festival of Christmas, the last year of the eighth century Charlemagne appeared in the church of St Peter and, to gratify the vanity of Rome he had exchanged the simple dress of his country for the habit of a patrician [92] After the celebration of the holy mysteries Leo suddenly placed a precious crown on his head [93] and the dome resounded with the acclamations of the people Long life and victory to Charles the most pious Augustus, crowned by God the great and pacific emperor of the Romans! The head and body of Charlemagne were consecrated by the royal unction after the example of the Cæsars he was saluted or adored by the pontiff his coronation oath represents a promise to maintain the faith and privileges of the church and the first fruits were paid in his rich offerings to the shrine of the apostle In his familiar conversation the emperor protested his ignorance of the intentions of Leo which he would have disappointed by his absence on that memorable day But the preparations of the ceremony must have disclosed the secret and the journey of Charlemagne reveals his knowledge and expectation he had acknowledged that the Imperial title was the object of his ambition and a Roman synod had pronounced that it was the only adequate reward of his merit and services [94]

The appellation of great has been often bestowed and sometimes deserved but CHARLEMAGNE is the only prince in whose favour the title has been indissolubly blended with the name. That name with the addition of saint is inserted in the Roman calendar and the saint by a rare felicity is crowned with the praises of the historians and philosophers of an enlightened age [95] His real merit is doubtless en*hanced by the barbarism of the nation* and the times from which he emerged but the apparent magnitude of an object is likewise enlarged by an unequal comparison and the ruins of Palmyra derive a casual splendour from the nakedness of the surrounding desert. Without injus*tice to his fame* I may discern some blemishes in the sanctity and greatness of the restorer of the Western empire Of his moral virtues chastity is not the most conspicuous [96] but the public happiness could not be materially injured by his nine wives or concubines the various indulgence of meaner or more transient amours the multitude of his bastards whom he bestowed on the church, and the long celibacy and licentious manners of his daughters,[97] whom the father was suspected of loving with too fond a passion I shall be scarcely permitted to accuse the ambition of a conqueror but in a day of equal retribution the sons of his brother Carloman the Merovingian princes of Aquitain and the four thousand five hundred Saxons who were beheaded on the same spot, would have something to allege against the justice and humanity of Charlemagne His treatment of the vanquished Saxons[98] was an abuse of the right of conquest his laws were not less sanguinary than his arms and in the discussion of his motives whatever is subtracted from bigotry must be imputed to temper The sedentary reader is amazed by his incessant activity of mind and body and his subjects and enemies were not less astonished at his sudden presence at the moment when they believed him at the most distant extremity of the empire neither peace nor war, nor summer nor winter were a season of repose and our fancy cannot easily reconcile the annals of his reign with the geography of his expeditions But this activity was a national rather than a personal virtue the vagrant life of a Frank was spent in the chase in pilgrimage in military adventures and the journeys of Charlemagne were distinguished only by a more numerous train and a more important purpose His military renown must be tried by the scrutiny of his troops his enemies, and his actions Alexander conquered with the arms of Philip but the two heroes who preceded Charlemagne bequeathed him their name their examples and the companions of their victories At the head of his veteran and superior armies he oppressed the savage or degenerate nations who were incapable of confederating for their common safety nor did he ever encounter an equal antagonist in numbers in discipline or in arms The science of war has been lost and revived with the arts of peace but his campaigns are not illustrated by any siege or battle of singular difficulty and success and he might behold with envy the Saracen trophies of his grandfather After his Spanish expedition his rear guard was defeated in the Pyrenæan mountains and the soldiers whose situation was irretrievable and whose valour was useless might accuse with their last breath the want of skill or caution of their general[99] I touch with reverence the laws of Charlemagne so highly applauded by a respectable judge They compose not a system but a series of occasional and minute edicts, for the correction of abuses the reformation of manners the economy of his farms the care of his poultry and even the sale of his eggs He wished to improve the laws and the character of the Franks and his attempts, however feeble and imperfect are deserving of praise the inveterate evils of the times were suspended or mollified by his government[100] but in his institutions I can seldom discover the general views and the immortal spirit of a legislator who survives himself for the benefit of posterity The union and stability of his empire depended on the life of a single man he imitated the dangerous practice of dividing his kingdoms among his sons and after his numerous diets the whole constitution was left to fluctuate between the disorders of anarchy and despotism. His esteem for the piety and knowledge of the clergy tempted him to intrust that aspiring order with temporal dominion and civil jurisdiction and his son Lewis when he was stripped and degraded by the bishops might accuse, in some measure the imprudence of his father His laws enforced the imposition of tithes because the demons had proclaimed in the air that the default of payment had been the cause of the last scarcity[101] The literary merits of Charlemagne are attested by the foundation of schools the introduction of arts the works which were published in his name and his familiar connection with the subjects and strangers whom he invited to his court to educate both the prince and people His own studies were tardy laborious and imperfect if he spoke Latin and understood Greek he derived the rudiments of knowledge from conversation rather than from books and, in his mature age, the emperor strove to acquire the practice of writing which every peasant now learns in his infancy[102] The grammar and logic, the music and astronomy of the times were only cultivated as the handmaids of superstition but the curiosity of the human mind must ultimately tend to its improvement and the encouragement of learning reflects the purest and most pleasing lustre on the character of Charlemagne[103] The dignity of his person[104] the length of his reign the prosperity of his arms, the vigour of his government and the reverence of distant nations distinguish him from the royal crowd and Europe dates a new era from his restoration of the Western empire

That empire was not unworthy of its title[105] and some of the fairest kingdoms of Europe were the patrimony or conquest of a prince who reigned at the same time in France Spain Italy Germany and Hungary[106] I The Roman province of Gaul had been transformed into the name and monarchy of FRANCE but in the decay of the Merovingian line its limits

were contracted by the independence of the Britons and the revolt of Aquitain Charlemagne pursued and confined the Britons on the shores of the ocean and that ferocious tribe whose origin and language are so different from the French, was chastised by the imposition of tribute hostages and peace After a long and evasive contest the rebellion of the dukes of Aquitain was punished by the forfeiture of their province their liberty and their lives Harsh and rigorous would have been such treatment of ambitious governors who had too faithfully copied the mayors of the palace But a recent discovery[107] has proved that these unhappy princes were the last and lawful heirs of the blood and sceptre of Clovis a younger branch, from the brother of Dagobert of the Merovingian house Their ancient kingdom was reduced to the duchy of Gascogne to the counties of Fesenzac and Armagnac, at the foot of the Pyrenees their race was propagated till the beginning of the sixteenth century and after surviving their Carlovingian tyrants they were reserved to feel the injustice or the favours of a third dynasty By the re union of Aquitain France was enlarged to its present boundaries with the additions of the Netherlands and Spain as far as the Rhine II The Saracens had been expelled from France by the grandfather and father of Charlemagne but they still possessed the greatest part of SPAIN from the rock of Gibraltar to the Pyrenees Amidst their civil divisions an Arabian emir of Saragossa implored his protection in the diet of Paderborn Charlemagne undertook the expedition, restored the emir and without distinction of faith, impartially crushed the resistance of the Christians and rewarded the obedience and service of the Mohammedans In his absence he instituted the Spanish march[108] which extended from the Pyrenees to the river Ebro Barcelona was the residence of the French governor he possessed the counties of Rousillon and Catalonia, and the infant kingdoms of Navarre and Arragon were subject to his jurisdiction III As king of the Lombards and patrician of Rome he reigned over the greatest part of ITALY[109] a tract of a thousand miles from the Alps to the borders of Calabria The duchy of Beneventum a Lombard fief had spread at the expense of the Greeks over the modern kingdom of Naples But Arrechis, the reigning duke refused to be included in the slavery of his country assumed the independent title of prince and opposed his sword to the Carlovingian monarchy His defence was firm his submission was not inglorious and the emperor was content with an easy tribute the demolition of his fortresses and the acknowledgment on his coins of a supreme lord The artful flattery of his son Grimoald added the appellation of father but he asserted his dignity with prudence and Beneventum insensibly escaped from the French yoke[110] IV Charlemagne was the first who united GERMANY under the same sceptre The name of Oriental France is preserved in the circle of Franconia and the people of Hesse and Thuringia were recently incorporated with the victors by the conformity of religion and government The Alemanni so formidable to the Romans, were the faithful vassals and confederates of the Franks and their country was inscribed within the modern limits of Alsace Swabia and Switzerland The Bavarians with a similar indulgence of their laws and manners, were less patient of a master the repeated treasons of Tasillo justified the abolition of their hereditary dukes and their power was shared among the counts who judged and guarded that important frontier But the north of Germany from the Rhine and beyond the Elbe was still hostile and Pagan nor was it till after a war of thirty three years that the Saxons bowed under the yoke of Christ and of Charlemagne The idols and their votaries were extirpated the foundation of eight bishoprics of Munster Osnaburgh Paderborn and Minden of Bremen Verden Hildesheim, and Halberstadt define on either side of the Weser the bounds of ancient Saxony these episcopal seats were the first schools and cities of that savage land and the religion and humanity of the children atoned in some degree for the massacre of the parents Beyond the Elbe the Slavi or Sclavonians, of similar manners and various denominations, overspread the modern dominions of Prussia, Poland and Bohemia and some transient marks of obedience have tempted the French historian to extend the empire to the Baltic and the Vistula The conquest or conversion of those countries is of a more recent age but the first union of Bohemia with the Germanic body may be justly ascribed to the arms of Charlemagne V He retaliated on the Avars or Huns of Pannonia the same calamities which they had inflicted on the nations Their rings the wooden fortifications which encircled their districts and villages were broken down by the triple effort of a French army that was poured into their country by land and water through the Carpathian mountains and along the plain of the Danube After a bloody conflict of eight years the loss of some French generals was avenged by the slaughter of the most noble Huns the relics of the nation submitted the royal residence of the chagan was left desolate and unknown, and the treasures, the rapine of two hundred and fifty years enriched the victorious troops, or decorated the churches, of Italy and Gaul [111] After the reduction of Pannonia, the empire of Charlemagne was bounded only by the conflux of the Danube with the Theiss and the Save the provinces of Istria Liburnia, and Dalmatia were an easy though unprofitable accession and it was an effect of his moderation that he left the maritime cities under the real or nominal sovereignty of the Greeks But these distant possessions added more to the reputation than to the power of the Latin emperor nor did he risk any ecclesiastical foundations to reclaim the barbarians from their vagrant life and idolatrous worship Some canals of communication between the rivers the Saône and the Meuse, the Rhine and the Danube were faintly attempted [112] Their execution would have vivified the empire and more cost and labour were often wasted in the structure of a cathedral

If we retrace the outlines of this geographical picture, it will be seen that the empire of the Franks extended between east and west from the Ebro to the Elbe or Vistula between the north and south from the duchy of Beneventum to the river Eyder the perpetual boundary of Germany and Denmark The personal and political importance of Charlemagne was magnified by the distress and division of the rest of Europe The islands of Great Britain and Ireland were disputed by a crowd of princes of Saxon or Scottish origin and after the loss of Spain the Christian and Gothic kingdom of Alphonso the Chaste was confined to the narrow range of the Asturian mountains These petty sovereigns revered the power or virtue of the Carlovingian monarch, implored the honour and support of his alliance and styled him their common parent the sole and supreme emperor of the West [113] He maintained a more equal intercourse with the caliph Harun al Rashid [114] whose dominion stretched from Africa to India and accepted from his ambassadors a tent a water-clock an elephant and the keys of the Holy Sepulchre It is not easy to conceive the private friendship of a Frank and an Arab, who were strangers to each other s person and language and religion but their public correspondence was founded on vanity and their remote situation left no room for a competition of interest Two-thirds of the Western empire of Rome were subject to Charlemagne, and the deficiency was amply supplied by his command of the inaccessible or invincible nations of Germany But in the choice of his enemies we may be reasonably surprised that he so often preferred the poverty of the north to the riches of the south The three and thirty campaigns laboriously consumed in the woods and morasses of Germany would have sufficed to assert the amplitude of his title by the expulsion of the Greeks from Italy and the Saracens from Spain The weakness of the Greeks would have insured an easy victory and the holy crusade against the Saracens would have been prompted by glory and revenge, and loudly justified by religion and policy Perhaps, in his expeditions beyond the Rhine and the Elbe he aspired to save his monarchy from the fate of the Roman empire to disarm the enemies of civilised society and to eradicate the seed of future emigrations But it has been wisely observed that, in a light of precaution all conquest must be ineffectual, unless it could be universal since the increasing circle must be involved in a larger sphere of hostility [115] The subjugation of Germany withdrew the veil which had so long concealed the continent or islands of Scandinavia from the knowledge of Europe and awakened the torpid courage of their barbarous natives The fiercest of the Saxon idolaters escaped from the Christian tyrant to their brethren of the North the Ocean and Mediterranean were covered with their piratical fleets and Charlemagne beheld with a sigh the destructive progress of the Normans who, in less than seventy years precipitated the fall of his race and monarchy

Had the pope and the Romans revived the primitive constitution the titles of emperor and Augustus were conferred on Charlemagne for the term of his life and his successors on each vacancy must have ascended the throne by a formal or tacit election But the association of his son Lewis the Pious asserts the independent right of monarchy and conquest and the emperor seems on this occasion to have foreseen and prevented the latent claims of the clergy The royal youth was commanded to take the crown from the altar and with his own hands to place it on his head as a gift which he held from God, his father and the nation [116] The same ceremony was repeated though with less energy in the subsequent associations of Lothaire and Lewis the Second the Carlovingian sceptre was transmitted from father to son in a lineal descent of four generations and the am bition of the popes was reduced to the empty honour of crowning and anointing these hereditary princes, who were already invested with their power and dominions The pious Lewis survived his brothers and embraced the whole empire of Charlemagne but the nations and the nobles his bishops and his children, quickly discerned that this mighty mass was no longer inspired by the same soul and the foundations were undermined to the centre while the external surface was yet fair and entire After a war or battle which consumed one hundred thousand Franks the empire was divided by treaty between his three sons who had violated every filial and fraternal duty The kingdoms of Germany and France were for ever separated the provinces of Gaul between the Rhone and the Alps the Meuse and the Rhine were assigned, with Italy to the Imperial dignity of Lothaire In the partition of his share Lorraine and Arles two recent and transitory kingdoms were bestowed on the younger children and Lewis the Second his eldest son was content with the realm of Italy the proper and sufficient patrimony of a Roman emperor On his death without any male issue the vacant throne was disputed by his uncles and cousins and the popes most dexterously seized the occasion of judging the claims and merits of the candidates, and of bestowing on the most obsequious, or most liberal, the Imperial office of advocate of the Roman church. The dregs of the Carlovingian race no longer exhibited any symptoms of virtu or power and the ridiculous epithets of the bald th stammerer the fat and the simple distinguished the tame and uniform features of a crowd of kings alike deserving of oblivion. By the failure of the collateral branches the whole inheritance devolved to Charles the Fat the last emperor of his family his insanity authorised the desertion of Germany Italy and France he was deposed in a diet and solicited his daily bread from the rebels by whose contempt his life and liberty had been spared. According to the measure of their force the governors the bishops and the lords usurped the fragments of the falling empire and some preference was shown to the female or illegitimate blood of Charlemagne. Of the greater part the title and possession were alike doubtful and the merit was adequate to the contracted scale of their dominions Those who could appear with an army at the gates of Rome were crowned emperors in the Vatican but their modesty was more frequently satisfied with the appellation of kings of Italy and the whole term of seventy four years may be deemed a vacancy from the abdication of Charles the Fat to the establishment of Otho the First.

Otho[111] was of the noble race of the dukes of Saxony and if he truly descended from Witikind the adversary and proselyte of Charlemagne the posterity of a vanquished people was exalted to reign over their conquerors His father Henry the Fowler was elected by the suffrage of the nation to save and institute the kingdom of Germany Its limits[112] were enlarged on every side by his son the first and greatest of the Othos A portion of Gaul to the west of the Rhine along the banks of the Meuse and the Moselle was assigned to the Germans by whose blood and language it has been tinged since the time of Cæsar and Tacitus. Between the Rhine the Rhone and the Alps the successors of Otho acquired a vain supremacy over the broken kingdoms of Burgundy and Arles. In the North Christianity was propagated by the sword of Otho the conqueror and apostle of the Slavic nations of the Elbe and Oder the marches of Brandenburg and Sleswick were fortified with German colonies and the king of Denmark the dukes of Poland and Bohemia confessed themselves his tributary vassals At the head of a victorious army he passed the Alps, subdued the kingdom of Italy delivered the pope, and for ever fixed the Imperial crown in the name and nation of Germany From that memorabl era two maxims of public jurisprudence were introduced by force and ratified by time I That the prince who was elected in the German diet acquired from that instant the subject kingdoms of Italy and Rome II But that he might not legally assume the titles of emperor and Augustus till he had received the crown from the hands of the Roman pontiff[113]

The imperial dignity of Charlemagne was announced to the East by the alteration of his style and instead of saluting his fathers, the Greek emperors he presumed to adopt the more equal and familiar appellation of brother[114] Perhaps in his connection with Irene he aspired to the name of husband his embassy to Constantinople spoke the language of peace and friendship and might conceal a treaty of marriage with that ambitious princess who had renounced the most sacred duties of a mother The nature the duration the probable consequences of such a union between two distant and dissonant empires it is impossible to conjecture but the unanimous silence of the Latins may teach us to suspect that the report was invented by the enemies of Irene to charge her rented their choice they be towed the Roman benefice li e the bishoprics of Cologne or Bamberg on their chancellors or preceptors and whatever might be the merit of a Frank or Saxon his name sufficiently attests the interposition of foreign power These acts of prerogative were most speciously excused by the vices of a popular election The competitor who had been excluded by the cardinals appealed to the passions or avarice of the multitude the Vatican and the Lateran were stained with blood and the most powerful senators the marquises of Tuscany and the counts of Tusculum held the apostolic see in a long and disgraceful servitude The Roman pontiffs of the ninth and tenth centuries were insulted imprisoned, and murdered by their tyrants and such was their indigence after the loss and usurpation of the ecclesiastical patrimonies that they could neither support the state of a prince nor exercise the charity of a priest[1] The influence of two sister prostitutes Marozia and Theodora was founded on their wealth and beauty their political and amorous intrigues the most strenuous of their lovers were rewarded with the Roman mitre and their reign[19] may have suggested to the darker ages[110] the fable[111] of a female pope[1] The bastard son, the grandson and the great grandson of Marozia a rare genealogy were seated in the chair of St. Peter and it was at the age of nineteen years that the second of these became the head of the Latin church His youth and manhood were of a suitable complexion and the nations of pilgrims could bear testimony to the charges that were urged against him in a Roman synod and in the presence of Otho the Great. As John XII had renounced the dress and decencies of his profession the soldier may not perhaps be dishonoured by the wine which he drank the blood that he spilt the flames that he kindled or the licentious pursuits of gaming and hunting His open simony might be the consequence of distress and his blasphemous invocation of Jupiter and Venus if it be true could not possibly be serious But we read with some surprise that the worthy grandson of Marozia lived in public adultery with the matrons of Rome that the Lateran palace was turned into a school for prostitution and that his rapes of virgins and widows had deterred the female pilgrims from visiting the tomb of St Peter lest in the devout act, they should be violated by his successor The Protestants have dwelt with malicious pleasure on these characters of antichrist but to a philosophic eye the vices of the clergy are far less dangerous than their virtues

After a long series of scandal the apostolic see was reformed and exalted by the austerity and zeal of Gregory VII That ambitious monk devoted his life to the execution of two projects I To fix in the college of cardinals the freedom and independence of election and for ever to abolish the right or usurpation of the emperors and the Roman people II To bestow and resume the Western empire as a fief or benefice[114] of the church, and to extend his temporal dominion over the kings and kingdoms of the earth After a contest of fifty years the first of these designs was accomplished by the firm support of the ecclesiastical order whose liberty was connected with that of their chief But the second attempt though it was crowned with some partial and apparent success has been vigorously resisted by the secular power, and finally extinguished by the improvement of human reason

In the revival of the empire of Rome neither the bishop nor the people could bestow on Charlemagne or Otho the provinces which were lost as they had been won by the chance of arms But the Romans were free to choose a master for themselves and the powers which had been delegated to the patrician were irrevocably granted to the French and Saxon emperors of the West The broken records of the times[115] preserve some remembrance of their palace, their mint their tribunal their edicts, and the sword of justice which as late as the thirteenth century was derived from Cæsar to the præfect of the city[116] Between the arts of the popes and the violence of the people this supremacy was crushed and annihilated Content with the titles of emperor and Augustus the successors of Charlemagne neglected to assert this local jurisdiction In the hour of prosperity their ambition was diverted by more alluring objects and in the decay and division of the empire they were oppressed by the defence of their hereditary provinces Amidst the ruins of Italy the famous Marozia invited one of the usurpers to assume the character of her third husband and Hugh king of Burgundy was introduced by her faction into the mole of Hadrian or castle of St Angelo which commands the principal bridge and entrance of Rome Her son by the first marriage Alberic was compelled to attend at the nuptial banquet but his reluctant and ungraceful service was chastised with a blow by his new father The blow was productive of a revolution Romans exclaimed the youth once you were the masters of the world, and these Burgundians the most

with the guilt of betraying the church and state to the strangers of the West [121] The French ambassadors were the spectators, and had nearly been the victims of the conspiracy of Nicephorus, and the national hatred Constantinople was exasperated by the treason and sacrilege of ancient Rome a proverb That the Franks were good friends and bad neighbours ' was in every one s mouth but it was dangerous to provoke a neighbour who might be tempted to reiterate in the church of St. Sophia the ceremony of his Imperial coronation After a tedious journey of circuit and delay, the ambassa*dors of Nicephorus found him in his camp*, on the banks of the river Sala, and Charlemagne affected to confound their vanity by displaying, in a Franconian village, the pomp or at least the pride of the Byzantine palace [122] The Greeks were successively led through four halls of audience in the first they were ready to fall prostrate before a splendid personage in a chair of state, till he informed them that he was only a servant the constable, or master of the horse of the emperor The same mistake and the same answer were repeated in the apartments of the count palatine the steward and the chamberlain and their impatience was gradually heightened, till the doors of the presence chamber were thrown open and they beheld the genuine monarch on his throne enriched with the foreign luxury which he despised and encircled with the love and reverence of his victorious chiefs A treaty of peace and alliance was concluded between the two empires and the limits of the East and West were defined by the right of present possession But the Greeks[123] soon forgot this humiliating equality or remembered it only to hate the barbarians by whom it was extorted During the short union of virtue and power they respectfully saluted the august Charlemagne with the acclamations of basileus and emperor of the Romans As soon as these qualities were separated in the person of his pious son, the Byzantine letters were inscribed *To the king or as he styles himself the em*peror, of the Franks and Lombards ' When both the power and virtue were extinct they despoiled Lewis the Second of his hereditary title and with the barbarous appellation of rex or rega degraded him among the crowd of Latin princes His reply[124] is expressive of his weakness he proves with some learning that both in sacred and profane history the name of king is synonymous with the Greek word basileus if at Constantinople it were assumed in a more exclusive and imperial sense he claims from his ancestors and from the pope, a just participation of the honours of the Roman purple The same controversy was revived in the reign of the Othos and their ambassador describes in lively colours the insolence of the Byzantine court [125] The Greeks affected to despise the poverty and ignorance of the Franks and Saxons and in their last decline refused to prostitute to the kings of Germany the title of Roman emperors.

These emperors, in the election of the popes, continued to exercise the powers which had been assumed by the Gothic and Grecian princes and the importance of this prerogative increased with the temporal estate and spiritual jurisdiction of the Roman church In the Christian aristocracy the principal members of the clergy still formed a senate to assist the administration and to supply the vacancy of the bishop Rome was divided into twenty-eight parishes and each parish was governed by a cardinal priest or presbyter—a title which, however common and modest in its origin has aspired to emulate the purple of kings Their number was enlarged by the association of the seven deacons of the most considerable hospitals the seven palatine judges of the Lateran, and some dignitaries of the church This ecclesiastical senate was directed by the seven cardinal bishops of the Roman province who were less occupied in the suburb dioceses of Ostia Porto Velitræ Tusculum Præneste, Tibur and the Sabines than by their weekly service in the Lateran and their superior share in the honours and authority of the apostolic see On the death of the pope these bishops recommended a successor to the suffrage of the college of cardinals [126] and their choice was ratified or rejected by the applause or clamour of the Roman people But the election was imperfect nor could the pontiff be legally consecrated till the emperor the advocate of the church had graciously signified his approbation and consent. The royal commissioner examined on the spot the form and freedom of the proceedings, nor was it till after a previous scrutiny into the qualifications of the candidates that he accepted an oath of fidelity and confirmed the donations which had successively enriched the patrimony of St Peter In the frequent schisms the rival claims were submitted to the sentence of the emperor and in a synod of bishops he presumed to judge to condemn and to punish the crimes of a guilty pontiff Otho the First imposed a treaty on the senate and people who engaged to prefer the candidate most acceptable to his majesty [127] his successors anticipated or pre-

of the quarrel But in the eleventh and twelfth centuries the Lombards rekindled the flame of industry and freedom and the generous example was at length imitated by the republics of Tuscany In the Italian cities a municipal government had never been totally abolished and their first privileges were granted by the favour and policy of the emperors who were desirous of erecting a plebeian barrier against the independence of the nobles But their rapid progress the daily extension of their power and pretensions were founded on the numbers and spirit of these rising communities[143] Each city filled the measure of her diocese or district the jurisdiction of the counts and bishops, of the marquises and counts was banished from the land and the proudest nobles were persuaded or compelled to desert their solitary castles and to embrace the more honourable character of freemen and magistrates The legislative authority was inherent in the general assembly but the executive powers were intrusted to three consuls annually chosen from the three orders of captains valvassors[144] and commons, into which the republic was divided Under the protection of equal law the labours of agriculture and commerce were gradually revived but the martial spirit of the Lombards was nourished by the presence of danger and as often as the bell was rung or the standard[145] erected, the gates of the city poured forth a numerous and intrepid band, whose zeal in their own cause was soon guided by the use and discipline of arms At the foot of these popular ramparts the pride of the Cæsars was overthrown and the invincible genius of liberty prevailed over the two Frederics the greatest princes of the middle age the first, superior perhaps in military prowess the second, who undoubtedly excelled in the softer accomplishments of peace and learning

Ambitious of restoring the splendour of the purple Frederic the First invaded the republics of Lombardy with the arts of a statesman, the valour of a soldier and the cruelty of a tyrant. The recent discovery of the Pandects had renewed a science most favourable to despotism and his venal advocates proclaimed the emperor the absolute master of the lives and properties of his subjects His royal prerogatives in a less odious sense were acknowledged in the diet of Roncaglia and the revenue of Italy was fixed at thirty thousand pounds of silver[146] which were multiplied to an indefinite demand by the rapine of the fiscal officers The obstinate cities were reduced by the terror or the force of his arms his captives were delivered to the executioner or shot from his military engines and after the siege and surrender of Milan the buildings of that stately capital were razed to the ground three hundred hostages were sent into Germany and the inhabitants were dispersed in four villages under the yoke of the inflexible conqueror[147] But Milan soon rose from her ashes and the league of Lombardy was cemented by distress their cause was espoused by Venice Pope Alexander the Third and the Greek emperor the fabric of oppression was overturned in a day and in the treaty of Constance Frederic subscribed with some reservations the freedom of four and twenty cities. His grandson contended with their vigour and maturity but Frederic the Second[148] was endowed with some personal and peculiar advantages His birth and education recommended him to the Italians and in the implacable discord of the two factions the Ghibelins were attached to the emperor while the Guelfs displayed the banner of liberty and the church The court of Rome had slumbered when his father Henry the Sixth was permitted to unite with the empire the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily and from these hereditary realms the son derived an ample and ready supply of troops and treasure Yet Frederic the Second was finally oppressed by the arms of the Lombards and the thunders of the Vatican his kingdom was given to a stranger and the last of his family was beheaded at Naples on a public scaffold. During sixty years no emperor appeared in Italy and the name was remembered only by the ignominious sale of the last relics of sovereignty

The barbarian conquerors of the West were pleased to decorate their chief with the title of emperor but it was not their design to invest him with the despotism of Constantine and Justinian. The persons of the Germans were free their conquests were their own, and their national character was animated by a spirit which scorned the servile jurisprudence of the new or the ancient Rome It would have been a vain and dangerous attempt to impose a monarch on the armed freemen who were impatient of a magistrate on the bold who refused to obey on the powerful who aspired to command. The empire of Charlemagne and Otho was distributed among the dukes of the nations or provinces the counts of the smaller districts and the margraves of the marches or frontiers who all united the civil and military authority as it had been delegated to the lieutenants of the first

abject of your slaves They now reign these voracious and brutal savages, and my injury is the commencement of your servitude '[137] The alarum bell rang to arms in every quarter of the city the Burgundians retreated with haste and shame Marozia was imprisoned by her victorious son, and his brother, Pope John XI was reduced to the exercise of his spiritual functions With the title of prince Alberic possessed above twenty years the government of Rome and he is said to have gratified the popular prejudice by restoring the office or at least the title of consuls and tribunes His son and heir Octavian assumed with the pontificate, the name of John XII like his predecessor, he was provoked by the Lombard princes to seek a deliverer for the church and republic and the services of Otho were rewarded with the Imperial dignity But the Saxon was imperious, the Romans were impatient, the festival of the coronation was disturbed by the secret conflict of prerogative and freedom and Otho commanded his sword bearer not to stir from his person lest he should be assaulted and murdered at the foot of the altar[138] Before he repassed the Alps, the emperor chastised the revolt of the people and the ingratitude of John XII The pope was degraded in a synod the præfect was mounted on an ass whipped through the city, and cast into a dungeon, thirteen of the most guilty were hanged others were mutilated or banished and this severe processs was justified by the ancient laws of Theodosius and Justinian The voice of fame has accused the second Otho of a perfidious and bloody act the massacre of the senators whom he had invited to his table under the fair semblance of hospitality and friendship[139] In the minority of his son Otho the Third Rome made a bold attempt to shake off the Saxon yoke and the consul Crescentius was the Brutus of the republic From the condition of a subject and an exile he twice rose to the command of the city oppressed expelled and created the popes and formed a conspiracy for restoring the authority of the Greek emperors In the fortress of St Angelo he maintained an obstinate siege till the unfortunate consul was betrayed by a promise of safety his body was suspended on a gibbet and his head was exposed on the battlements of the castle By a reverse of fortune Otho after separating his troops was besieged three days without food in his palace and a disgraceful escape saved him from the justice or fury of the Romans The senator Ptolemy was the leader of the people and the widow of Crescentius enjoyed the pleasure or the fame of revenging her husband by a poison which she administered to her Imperial lover It was the design of Otho the Third to abandon the ruder countries of the North, to erect his throne in Italy, and to revive the institutions of the Roman monarchy But his successors only once in their lives appeared on the banks of the Tiber to receive their crown in the Vatican[140] Their absence was contemptible their presence odious and formidable They descended from the Alps at the head of their barbarians, who were strangers and enemies to the country and their transient visit was a scene of tumult and bloodshed[141] A faint remembrance of their ancestors still tormented the Romans, and they beheld with pious indignation the succession of Saxons Franks, Swabians, and Bohemians, who usurped the purple and prerogatives of the Cæsars

There is nothing perhaps more adverse to nature and reason than to hold in obedience remote countries and foreign nations in opposition to their inclination and interest A torrent of barbarians may pass over the earth but an extensive empire must be supported by a refined system of policy and oppression in the centre an absolute power, prompt in action and rich in resources a swift and easy communication with the extreme parts fortifications to check the first effort of rebellion a regular administration to protect and punish and a well disciplined army to inspire fear, without provoking discontent and despair Far different was the situation of the German Cæsars who were ambitious to enslave the kingdom of Italy Their patrimonial estates were stretched along the Rhine or scattered in the provinces but this ample domain was alienated by the imprudence or distress of successive princes and their revenue from minute and vexatious prerogative was scarcely sufficient for the maintenance of their household Their troops were formed by the legal or voluntary service of their feudal vassals who passed the Alps with reluctance assumed the licence of rapine and disorder and capriciously deserted before the end of the campaign Whole armies were swept away by the pestilential influence of the climate the survivors brought back the bones of their princes and nobles[142] and the effects of their own intemperance were often imputed to the treachery and malice of the Italians who rejoiced at least in the calamities of the barbarians This irregular tyranny might contend on equal terms with the petty tyrants of Italy nor can the people or the reader be much interested in the event

tions as the third branch of the legislature and in the progress of society they were introduced about the same era into the national assemblies of France England and Germany The Hanseatic League commanded the trade and navigation of the north the confederates of the Rhine secured the peace and intercourse of the inland country the influence of the cities has been adequate to their wealth and policy and their negative still invalidates the acts of the two superior colleges of electors and princes [109]

It is in the fourteenth century that we may view in the strongest light the state and contrast of the Roman empire of Germany which no longer held, except on the borders of the Rhine and Danube a single province of Trajan or Constantine Their unworthy successors were the counts of Hapsburg of Nassau of Luxemburg and of Schwartzenburg the emperor Henry the Seventh procured for his son the crown of Bohemia, and his grandson Charles the Fourth was born among a people strange and barbarous in the estimation of the Germans themselves [110] After the excommunication of Lewis of Bavaria he received the gift or promise of the vacant empire from the Roman pontiffs who in the exile and captivity of Avignon affected the dominion of the earth. The death of his competitors united the electoral college and Charles was unanimously saluted king of the Romans and future emperor a title which in the same age was prostituted to the Cæsars of Germany and Greece The German emperor was no more than the elective and impotent magistrate of an aristocracy of princes who had not left him a village that he might call his own His best prerogative was the right of presiding and proposing in the national senate which was convened at his summons and his native kingdom of Bohemia less opulent than the adjacent city of Nuremberg was the firmest seat of his power and the richest source of his revenue. The army with which he passed the Alps consisted of three hundred horse. In the cathedral of St Ambrose Charles was crowned with the iron crown which tradition ascribed to the Lombard monarchy but he was admitted only with a peaceful train the gates of the city were shut upon him and the king of Italy was held a captive by the arms of the Visconti whom he confirmed in the sovereignty of Milan In the Vatican he was again crowned with the golden crown of the empire but, in obedience to a secret treaty the Roman emperor immediately withdrew without reposing a single night within the walls of Rome The eloquent Petrarch [111] whose fancy revived the visionary glories of the Capitol deplores and upbraids the ignominious flight of the Bohemian and even his contemporaries could observe that the sole exercise of his authority was in the lucrative sale of privileges and titles The gold of Italy secured the election of his son but such was the shameful poverty of the Roman emperor that his person was arrested by a butcher in the streets of Worms and was detained in the public inn as a pledge or hostage for the payment of his expenses

From this humiliating scene let us turn to the apparent majesty of the same Charles in the diets of the empire. The golden bull which fixes the Germanic constitution is promulgated in the style of a sovereign and legislator A hundred princes bowed before his throne and exalted their own dignity by the voluntary honours which they yielded to their chief or minister At the royal banquet the hereditary great officers the seven electors who in rank and title were equal to kings performed their solemn and domestic service of the palace The seals of the triple kingdom were borne in state by the archbishops of Mentz Cologne and Treves the perpetual arch-chancellors of Germany Italy and Arles The great marshal on horseback, exercised his function with a silver measure of oats which he emptied on the ground and immediately dismounted to regulate the order of the guests The great steward the count palatine of the Rhine placed the dishes on the table. The great chamberlain the margrave of Brandenburg presented after the repast the golden ewer and basin to wash. The king of Bohemia, as great cupbearer was represented by the emperor's brother the duke of Luxemburg and Brabant and the procession was closed by the great huntsmen who introduced a boar and a stag with a loud chorus of horns and hounds [112] Nor was the supremacy of the emperor confined to Germany alone the hereditary monarchs of Europe confessed the pre-eminence of his rank and dignity he was the first of the Christian princes the temporal head of the great republic of the West [113] to his person the title of majesty was long appropriated and he disputed with the pope the sublime prerogative of creating kings and assembling councils The oracle of the civil law the learned Bartolus was a pensioner of Charles the Fourth and his school resounded with the doctrine that the Roman emperor was the rightful sovereign of the earth, from the rising to the setting sun The contrary opinion was

Cæsars The Roman governors who for the most part were soldiers of fortune, seduced their mercenary legions, assumed the Imperial purple and either failed or succeeded in their revolt, without wounding the power and unity of government If the dukes margraves and counts of Germany were less audacious in their claims, the consequences of their success were more lasting and pernicious to the state Instead of aiming at the supreme rank they silently laboured to establish and appropriate their provincial independence Their ambition was seconded by the weight of their estates and vassals their mutual example and support the common interest of the subordinate nobility, the change of princes and families the minorities of Otho the Third and Henry the Fourth, the ambition of the popes and the vain pursuit of the fugitive crowns of Italy and Rome All the attributes of regal and territorial jurisdiction were gradually usurped by the commanders of the provinces the right of peace and war, of life and death of coinage and taxation of foreign alliance and domestic economy Whatever had been seized by violence was ratified by favour or distress was granted as the price of a doubtful vote or a voluntary service whatever had been granted to one could not without injury be denied to his successor or equal, and every act of local or temporary possession was insensibly moulded into the constitution of the Germanic kingdom In every province the visible presence of the duke or count was interposed between the throne and the nobles the subjects of the law became the vassals of a private chief and the standard which he received from his sovereign was often raised against him in the field The temporal power of the clergy was cherished and exalted by the superstition or policy of the Carlovingian and Saxon dynasties who blindly depended on their moderation and fidelity and the bishoprics of Germany were made equal in extent and privilege superior in wealth and population to the most ample states of the military order As long as the emperors retained the prerogative of bestowing on every vacancy these ecclesiastic and secular benefices their cause was maintained by the gratitude or ambition of their friends and favourites But in the quarrel of the investitures they were deprived of their influence over the episcopal chapters the freedom of election was restored and the sovereign was reduced, by a solemn mockery to his first prayers the recommendation once in his reign to a single prebend in each church The secular governors instead of being recalled at the will of a superior could be degraded only by the sentence of their peers In the first age of the monarchy the appointment of the son to the duchy or county of his father was solicited as a favour it was gradually obtained as a custom and extorted as a right the lineal succession was often extended to the collateral or female branches the states of the empire (their popular, and at length their legal appellation) were divided and alienated by testament and sale, and all idea of a public trust was lost in that of a private and perpetual inheritance. The emperor could not even be enriched by the casualties of forfeiture and extinction within the term of a year he was obliged to dispose of the vacant fief and in the choice of the candidate it was his duty to consult either the general or the provincial diet.

After the death of Frederic the Second Germany was left a monster with a hundred heads. A crowd of princes and prelates disputed the ruins of the empire the lords of innumerable castles were less prone to obey than to imitate their superiors and according to the measure of their strength their incessant hostilities received the name of conquest or robbery Such anarchy was the inevitable consequence of the laws and manners of Europe and the kingdoms of France and Italy were shivered into fragments by the violence of the same tempest. But the Italian cities and the French vassals were divided and destroyed while the union of the Germans has produced under the name of an empire a great system of a federative republic. In the frequent and at last the perpetual institution of diets a national spirit was kept alive, and the powers of a common legislature are still exercised by the three branches or colleges of the electors the princes and the free and Imperial cities of Germany I Seven of the most powerful feudatories were permitted to assume with a distinguished name and rank the exclusive privilege of choosing the Roman emperor and these electors were the king of Bohemia the duke of Saxony the margrave of Brandenburg the count palatine of the Rhine and the three archbishops of Mentz of Trèves, and of Cologne II The college of princes and prelates purged themselves of a promiscuous multitude they reduced to four representative votes the long series of independent counts, and excluded the nobles or equestrian order sixty thousand of whom as in the Polish diets had appeared on horseback in the field of election. If we annihilate the interval of time and space between Augustus and Charles, strong and striking will be the contrast between the two Cæsars the Bohemian, who concealed his weakness under the mask of ostentation and the Roman, who disguised his strength under the semblance of modesty At the head of his victorious legions, in his reign over the sea and land from the Nile and Euphrates to the Atlantic Ocean, Augustus professed himself the servant of the state and the equal of his fellow citizens The conqueror of Rome and her provinces assumed the popular and legal form of a censor a consul and a tribune His will was the law of mankind but in the declaration of his laws he borrowed the voice of the senate and people, and from their decrees their master accepted and renewed his temporary commission to administer the republic. In his dress, his domestics[155] his titles, in all the offices of social life, Augustus maintained the character of a private Roman, and his most artful flatterers respected the secret of his absolute and perpetual monarchy

Description of Arabia and its Inhabitants Birth, Character, and Doctrine of Mohammed He preaches at Mecca Flies to Medina Propagates his Religion by the Sword Voluntary or reluctant Submission of the Arabs His Death and Successors The Claims and Fortunes of Ali and his Descendants

After pursuing above six hundred years the fleeting Cæsars of Constantinople and Germany I now descend, in the reign of Heraclius on the eastern borders of the Greek monarchy While the state was exhausted by the Persian war and the church was distracted by the Nestorian and Monophysite sects, Mohammed, with the sword in one hand and the Koran in the other erected his throne on the ruins of Christianity and of Rome The genius of the Arabian prophet, the manners of his nation and the spirit of his religion, involve the causes of the decline and fall of the Eastern empire and our eyes are curiously intent on one of the most memorable revolutions which have impressed a new and lasting character on the nations of the globe[1]

In the vacant space between Persia, Syria Egypt, and Æthiopia the Arabian peninsula[2] may be conceived as a triangle of spacious but irregular dimensions From the northern point of Beles,[3] on the Euphrates, a line of fifteen hundred miles is terminated by the Straits of Babelmandeb and the land of frankincense About half this length may be allowed for the middle breadth, from east to west, from Bassora to Suez from the Persian Gulf to the Red Sea[4] The sides of the triangle are gradually enlarged, and the southern basis presents a front of a thousand miles to the Indian Ocean The entire surface of the peninsula exceeds in a fourfold proportion that of Germany or France but the far greater part has been justly stigmatised with the epithets of the stony and the sandy Even the wilds of Tartary are decked, by the hand of nature with lofty trees and luxuriant herbage and the lonesome traveller derives a sort of comfort and society from the presence of vegetable life But in the dreary waste of Arabia a boundless level of sand is intersected by sharp and naked mountains and the face of the desert without shade or shelter is scorched by the direct and intense rays of a tropical sun Instead of refreshing breezes the winds particularly from the south west diffuse a noxious and even deadly vapour the hillocks of sand which they alternately raise and scatter are compared to the billows of the ocean and whole caravans, whole armies have been lost and buried in the whirlwind The common benefits of water are an object of desire and contest and such is the scarcity of wood that some art is requisite to preserve and propagate the element of fire. Arabia is destitute of navigable rivers which fertilise the soil, and convey its produce to the adjacent regions the torrents that fall from the hills are imbibed by the thirsty earth the rare and hardy plants the tamarind or the acacia that strike their roots into the clefts of the rocks, are nourished by the dews of the night a scanty supply of rain is collected in cisterns and aqueducts the wells and springs are the secret trea

The measure of population is regulated by the means of subsistence and the inhabitants of this vast peninsula might be out numbered by the subjects of a fertile and industrious province. Along th shores of the Persian Gulf of the ocean and even of the Red Sea, the Ichthyophagi[8] or fish-eaters continued to wander in quest of their precarious food In this primitive and abject state which ill deserves the name of society the human brute without arts or laws, almost without sense or language is poorly distinguished from the rest of the animal creation. Generations and ages might roll away in silent oblivion and the helpless savage was restrained from multiplying his race by the wants and pursuits which confined his existence to the narrow margin of the sea-coast But in an early period of antiquity the great body of the Arabs had emerged from this scene of misery and as the naked wilderness could not maintain a people of hunters, they rose at once to the more secure and plentiful condition of the pastoral life. The same life is uniformly pursued by the roving tribes of the desert and in the portrait of the modern Bedoweens we may trace the features of their ancestors[10] who in the age of Moses or Mohammed dwelt under similar tents and conducted their horses and camels and sheep to the same springs and the same pastures Our toil is lessened and our wealth is increased by our dominion over the useful animals and the Arabian shepherd had acquired the absolute possession of a faithful friend and a laborious slave[11] Arabia, in the opinion of the naturalist, is the genuine and original country of the horse the climate most propitious, not indeed to the size but to the spirit and swiftness of that generous animal The merit of the Barb the Spanish, and the English breed is derived from a mixture of Arabian blood[12] the Bedoweens preserve, with superstitious care, the honours and the memory of the purest race the males are sold at a high price but the females are seldom alienated and the birth of a noble foal was esteemed among the tribes as a subject of joy and mutual congratulation These horses are educated in the tents among the children of the Arabs with a tender familiarity which trains them in the habits of gentleness and attachment They are accustomed only to walk and to gallop their sensations are not blunted by the incessant abuse of the spur and the whip their powers are reserved for th moments of flight and pursuit but no sooner do they feel the touch of the hand or the stirrup than they dart away with the swiftness of the wind and if their friend be dismounted in the rapid career they instantly stop till he has recovered his seat In the sands of Africa and Arabia the camel is a sacred and precious gift. That strong and patient beast of burden can perform without eating or drinking a journey of several days and a reservoir of fresh water is preserved in a large bag a fifth stomach of the animal whose body is imprinted with the marks of servitude the larger breed is capable of transporting a weight of a thousand pounds and the dromedary of a lighter and more active frame outstrips the fleetest courser in the race Alive or dead almost every part of the camel is serviceable to man her milk is plentiful and nutritious the young and tender flesh has the taste of veal [13] a valuable salt is extracted from the urine the dung supplies the deficiency of fuel and the long hair which falls each year and is renewed, is coarsely manufactured into the garments the furniture, and the tents of the Bedoweens In the rainy seasons they consume the rare and insufficient herbage of the desert during the heats of summer and the scarcity of winter they remove their encampments to the sea coast the hills of Yemen or the neighbourhood of the Euphrates and have often extorted the dangerous licence of visiting the banks of the Nile and the villages of Syria and Palestine The life of a wandering Arab is a life of danger and distress and though sometimes by rapine or exchange he may appropriate the fruits of industry a private citizen in Europe is in the possession of more solid and pleasing luxury than the proudest emir who marches in the field at the head of ten thousand horse

Yet an essential difference may be found between the hordes of Scythia and the Arabian tribes since many of the latter were collected into towns and employed in the labours of trade and agriculture A part of their time and industry was still devoted to the management of their cattle they mingled in peace and war, with their brethren of the desert and the Bedoweens derived from their useful intercourse some supply of their wants, and some rudiments of art and knowledge Among the forty two cities of Arabia [14] enumerated by Abulfeda the most ancient and populous were situate in the happy Yemen the towers of Saana [15] and the marvellous reservoir of Merab [16] were constructed by the kings of the Homerites but their profane lustre was eclipsed by the prophetic glories of MEDINA [17] and MECCA [18] near the Red Sea and at the distance from each other of two hundred and seventy miles The last of these holy places was known to the Greeks under the name of Macoraba and the termination of the word is expressive of its greatness which has not indeed in the most flourishing period exceeded the size and populousness of Marseilles Some latent motive, perhaps of superstition must have impelled the founders in the choice of a most unpromising situation They erected their habitations of mud or stone in a plain about two miles long and one mile broad, at the foot of three barren mountains the soil is a rock the water even of the holy well of Zemzem is bitter or brackish, the pastures are remote from the city and grapes are transported above seventy miles from the gardens of Tayef The fame and spirit of the Koreishites who reigned in Mecca, were conspicuous among the Arabian tribes but their ungrateful soil refused the labours of agriculture and their position was favourable to the enterprises of trade. By the seaport of Gedda, at the distance only of forty miles, they maintained an easy correspondence with Abyssinia and that Christian kingdom afforded the first refuge to the disciples of Mohammed. The treasures of Africa were conveyed over the peninsula to Gerrha or Katif in the province of Bahrein a city built as it is said of rock salt by the Chaldæan exiles [19] and from thence with the native pearls of the Persian Gulf they were floated on rafts to the mouth of the Euphrates. Mecca is placed almost at an equal distance a month's journey between Yemen on the right and Syria on the left hand The former was the winter the latter the summer station of her caravans, and their seasonable arrival relieved the ships of India from the tedious and troublesome navigation of the Red Sea In the markets of Saana and Merab in the harbours of Oman and Aden the camels of the Koreishites were laden with a precious cargo of aromatics a supply of corn and manufactures was purchased in the fairs of Bostra and Damascus the lucrative exchange diffused plenty and riches in the streets of Mecca and the noblest of her sons united the love of arms with the profession of merchandise [20]

The perpetual independence of the Arabs has been the theme of praise among strangers and natives and the arts of controversy transform this singular event into a prophecy and a miracle in favour of the posterity of Ismael [21] Some exceptions that can neither be dissembled nor eluded render this mode of reasoning as indiscreet as it is superfluous the kingdom of Yemen has been successively subdued by the Abyssinians the Persians the sultans of Egypt [22] and the Turks [23] the holy cities of Mecca and Medina have repeatedly bowed under a Scythian tyrant and the Roman province of Arabia [24] embraced the peculiar wilderness in which Ismael and his sons must have pitched their tents in the face of their brethren Yet these exceptions are temporary or local the body of the nation has escaped the yoke of the most powerful monarchies the arms of Sesostris and Cyrus of Pompey and Trajan could never achieve

e conquest of Arabia the present sovereign of e Turks[a] may exercise a shadow of jurisdic on but his pride is reduced to solicit the ndship of a people whom it is dangerous to rovoke and fruitless to at ack. The obvious uses of their freedom are inscribed on the haracter and country of the Arabs Many ges before Mohammed[b] their intrepid valour ad been severely felt by their n ighbours in ffen ive and defen ive war The patient and ctive virtues of a soldier are insensibly nursed n the habits and discipline of a pastoral life. The care of the sheep a d camels is abandoned o the women of the tribe but the martial youth, under the banner of the emir is ever on horseback and in the field to practi e the exer ise of the bow the jave'in and the scymetar The long memory of their independence is the firmest pledge of its perpetuity and succeeding g nerations are animated to prove their descent and to maintain th i nheritance. Their domestic feuds are suspended on the approach of a common enemy and in the las hostilities against the Turks the caravan of Mecca was attacked and pillaged by fourscore thousand of the confederates When they advance to battle the hope of victory is in the front in the rear the assurance of a retreat Their horses and camels who in eight or ten days can perform a march of four or five hundred miles disappear before the conqueror the secret waters of the desert elude his search and his victorious troops are on umed with thirst, hunger and fatigue in the pursuit of an invisible foe who scorns his efforts and safely reposes in the heart of the burning solitude The arms and deserts of the Bedoweens are not only the safeguards of their own freedom but the barri rs al.o of the happy Arabia whose inhabitants remote from war are enervated by the luxury of the soil and cli mate The legions of Augustus melted away in disease and lassit de[27] and it is only by a naval power that the reduction of Yemen has been successfully attempted When Mohammed erected his holy standard[28] that kingdom was a province of the Persian empire yet seven princes of the Homerites still reigned in the mountains and the vicegerent of Chosroes was tempted to forget his distant country and his unfortunate master The hi torians of the age of Justinian represent the state of the independent Arabs who were divid d by interest or affection in the long quarrel of the East the tribe of Gas san was allowed to encamp on the Syrian terri tory th princes of Hi a were permitted to form a city about forty miles to the southward of the ruins of Babylon Their service in the field was speedy and vigorous but their friendship was venal their faith inconstant their enmity ca pricious it v as an easier task to excite than to disarm these roving barbarians, and in the fa miliar intercourse of war they learned to see and to despise the splendid weakness both of Rome and of Persia From Mecca to the Eu phrates the Arabian tribes[29] v ere confounded by the Greeks and Latins under the general appellation of SARACENS,[30] a name v hich every Christian mouth has been taught to pronounce with terror and abhorrence

The slaves of domestic tyranny may vainly exult in their national independence but the Arab is personally free and he enjoys in some degree the benefits of society without forfeiting the prerogatives of nature In every tribe su perstition or gratitude or fortune has exalted a particular family above the heads of their equals The dignities of sheick and emir invari ably descend in this chosen race but the order of succession is loose and precarious and the most worthy or aged of the noble kinsmen are preferred to the simple though important office of composing disputes by their advice and guid ing alour by their example Even a female of sense and spirit has been permitted to command the countrymen of Zenobia.[31] The momentary junction of several tribes produces an army their more lasting union constitutes a nation and the supreme chief the emir of emirs v hose banner is displayed at their head may deserve in the eyes of strangers the honours of the kingly name If the Arabian princes abuse their power they are quickly punished by the desertion of their subjects who had been accustomed to a mild and parental jurisdiction Their spirit is free their steps are unconfin*ed the desert* is open, and the tribes and families are held *to*gether by a mutual and voluntary compact The softer natives of Yemen supported the pomp and majesty of a monarch but if he could not leave his palace without endang*ering his life*[32] the active powers of government must have been devolved on his nobles and magis trates The cities of Mecca and Medina present in the he*art of Asia* the form, or rather the sub stance, of a commonw ealth The grandfather of Mohammed, and his lineal ancestors appear in foreign and domestic tra nsactions as the princes of their country but they reigned like Pericles at Athens or the Medici at Florence by the opinion of their wi dom and integrity their in fluence was divided with their patrimony and the sceptre was transferred from the uncles of the prophet to a younger branch of the tribe of Koreish On solemn occasions they convened the assembly of the people and, since mankind must be either compelled or persuaded to obey the use and reputation of oratory among the ancient Arabs is the clearest evidence of public freedom [33] But their simple freedom was of a very different cast from the nice and artificial machinery of the Greek and Roman republics, in which each member possessed an undivided share of the civil and political rights of the community In the more simple state of the Arabs, the nation is free because each of her sons disdains a base submission to the will of a master His breast is fortified with the austere virtues of courage, patience and sobriety, the love of independence prompts him to exercise the habits of self command and the fear of dishonour guards him from the meaner apprehension of pain of danger, and of death The gravity and *firmness of the mind is conspicuous in his out*ward demeanour his speech is slow, weighty and concise he is seldom provoked to laughter his only gesture is that of stroking his beard the venerable symbol of manhood and the sense of his own importance teaches him to accost his equals without levity and his superiors without awe [34] The liberty of the Saracens survived their conquests the first caliphs indulged the bold and familiar language of their subjects they ascended the pulpit to persuade and edify the congregation nor was it before the seat of empire was removed to the Tigris that the Abbassides adopted the proud and pompous ceremonial of the Persian and Byzantine courts

In the study of nations and men we may observe the causes that render them hostile or friendly to each other that tend to narrow or enlarge to mollify or exasperate the social character The separation of the Arabs from the rest of mankind has accustomed them to confound the ideas of stranger and enemy and the poverty of the land has introduced a maxim of jurisprudence which they believe and practise to the present hour They pretend that in the division of the earth the rich and fertile climates were assigned to the other branches of the human family, and that the posterity of the outlaw Ismael might recover by fraud or force the portion of inheritance of which he had been unjustly deprived According to the remark of Pliny the Arabian tribes are equally addicted to theft and merchandise the caravans that traverse the desert are ransomed or pillaged and their neighbours since the remote times of Job and Sesostris [35] have been the victims of their rapacious spirit If a Bedoween d'scove from afar a solitary traveller, he rides furious against him, crying with a loud voice Un dress thyself, thy aunt (my wife) is without garment' A ready submission entitles him t mercy, resistance will provoke the aggress and his own blood must expiate the blood whic he presumes to shed in legitimate defence. single robber, or a few associates are brande with their genuine name but the exploits of numerous band assume the character of lawf and honourable war The temper of a peopl thus armed against mankind was doubly in flamed by the domestic licence of rapine, mu der, and revenge In the constitution of Europ the right of peace and war is now confined to small and the actual exercise to a much smal er, list of respectable potentates, but each Aral with impunity and renown might point h javelin against the life of his countrymen Th union of the nation consisted only in a vag resemblance of language and manners and each community the jurisdiction of the magi trate was mute and impotent Of the time ignorance which preceded Mohammed seventeen hundred battles[36] are recorded by tradition hostility was embittered with the rancour of civil faction and the recital, in prose or verse of an obsolete feud, was sufficient to rekindle the same passions among the descendants of the hostile tribes In private life every man at least every family was the judge and avenger of its own cause The nice sensibility of honour which weighs the insult rather than the injury sheds its deadly venom on the quarrels of the Arabs the honour of their women and of their beards is most easily wounded and indecent action a contemptuous word can be expiated only by the blood of the offender and such is their patient inveteracy that they expect whole months and years the opportunity of revenge A fine or compensation for murder is familiar to the barbarians of every age but in Arabia the kinsmen of the dead are at liberty to accept the atonement or to exercise with their own hands the law of retaliation The refined malice of the Arabs refuses even the head of the murderer substitutes an innocent to the guilty person and transfers the penalty to the best and most considerable of the race by whom they have been injured If he falls by their hands they are exposed in their turn to the danger of reprisals the interest and principal of the bloody debt are accumulated the individuals of either family lead a life of malice and suspicion and fifty years may sometimes elapse before the account of vengeance be finally settled [21] This sanguinary spirit ignorant of pity or forgiveness has been moderated however by the maxims of honour which require in every private encounter some decent equality of age and strength of numbers and weapons An annual festival of two perhaps of four months was observed by the Arabs before the time of Mohammed during which their swords were religiously sheathed both in foreign and domestic hostility and this partial truce is more strongly expressive of the habits of anarchy and warfare [22]

But the spirit of rapine and revenge was attempered by the milder influence of trade and literature The solitary peninsula is encompassed by the most civilised nations of the ancient world the merchant is the friend of mankind and the annual caravans imported the first seeds of knowledge and politeness into the cities and even the camps of the desert Whatever may be the pedigree of the Arabs their language is derived from the same original stock with the Hebrew the Syriac, and the Chaldæan tongues the independence of the tribes was marked by their peculiar dialects [23] but each, after their own allowed a just preference to the pure and perspicuous idiom of Mecca In Arabia, as well as in Greece the perfection of language outstripped the refinement of manners and her speech could diversify the fourscore names of honey the two hundred of a serpent the five hundred of a lion the thousand of a sword at a time when this copious dictionary was intrusted to the memory of an illiterate people The monuments of the Homerites were inscribed with an obsolete and mysterious character but the Cufic letters the groundwork of the present alphabet were invented on the banks of the Euphrates and the recent invention was taught at Mecca by a stranger who settled in that city after the birth of Mohammed. The arts of grammar of metre and of rhetoric were unknown to the free born eloquence of the Arabians but their penetration was sharp their fancy luxuriant, their wit strong and sententious,[4] and their more elaborate compositions were addressed with energy and effect to the minds of their hearers. The genius and merit of a rising poet was celebrated by the applause of his own and the kindred tribes A solemn banquet was prepared and a chorus of women, striking their tymbals and displaying the pomp of their nuptials sung in the presence of their sons and husbands the felicity of their native tribe—that a champion had now appeared to vindicate their rights—that a herald had raised his voice to immortalise their renown The distant or hostile tribes resorted to an annual fair which was abolished by the fanaticism of the first Moslems—a national assembly that must have contributed to refine and harmonise the barbarians Thirty days were employed in the exchange not only of corn and wine but of eloquence and poetry The prize was disputed by the generous emulation of the bards the victorious performance was deposited in the archives of princes and emirs and we may read in our own language the seven original poems which were inscribed in letters of gold and suspended in the temple of Mecca [25] The Arabian poets were the historians and moralists of the age and if they sympathised with the prejudices, they inspired and crowned the virtues of their countrymen. The indissoluble union of generosity and valour was the darling theme of their song and when they pointed their keenest satire against a despicable race they affirm d in the bitterness of reproach that the men knew not how to give nor the women to deny [26] The same hospitality which was practised by Abraham and celebrated by Homer is still renewed in the camps of the Arabs The ferocious Bedoweens, the terror of the desert embrace with out inquiry or hesitation the stranger who dares to confide in their honour and to enter their tent His treatment is kind and respectful he shares the wealth or the poverty of his host and after a needful repose he is dismissed on his way with thanks with blessings and perhaps with gifts. The heart and hand are more largely expanded by the wants of a brother or a friend but the heroic acts that could deserve the public applause must have surpassed the narrow measure of discretion and experience. A dispute had arisen who among the citizens of Mecca was entitled to the prize of generosity and a successive application was made to the three who were deemed most worthy of the trial. Abdallah the son of Abbas had undertaken a distant journey and his foot was in the stirrup when he heard the voice of a suppliant,

O son of the uncle of the apostle of God, I am a traveller and in distress! He instantly dismounted to present the pilgrim with his camel, her rich caparison and a purse of four thousand pieces of gold accepting only the sword either for its intrinsic value or as the gift of an honoured kinsman The servant of Kais informed the second suppliant that his master was asleep but he immediately added Here is a purse of seven thousand pieces of gold (it is all we have in the house), and here is an order that will entitle you to a camel and a slave ' the master as soon as he awoke praised and enfranchised his faithful steward, with a gentle reproof that by respecting his slumbers he had stinted his bounty The third of these heroes the blind Arabah at the hour of prayer was supporting his steps on the shoulders of two slaves "Alas! he replied my coffers are empty! but these you may sell if you refuse I renounce them" At these words pushing away the youths he groped along the wall with his staff The character of Hatem is the perfect model of Arabian virtue [43] he was brave and liberal an eloquent poet, and a successful robber forty camels were roasted at his hospitable feasts and at the prayer of a suppliant enemy he restored both the captives and the spoil The freedom of his countrymen disdained the laws of justice they proudly indulged the spontaneous impulse of pity and benevolence

The religion of the Arabs [44] as well as of the Indians consisted in the worship of the sun, the moon and the fixed stars a primitive and specious mode of superstition The bright luminaries of the sky display the visible image of a Deity their number and distance convey to a philosophic or even a vulgar, eye the idea of boundless space the character of eternity is marked on these solid globes that seem incapable of corruption or decay the regularity of their motions may be ascribed to a principle of reason or instinct and their real or imaginary influence encourages the vain belief that the earth and its inhabitants are the object of their peculiar care The science of astronomy was cultivated at Babylon but the school of the Arabs was a clear firmament and a naked plain In their nocturnal marches they steered by the guidance of the stars their names and order, and daily station were familiar to the curiosity and devotion of the Bedoween and he was taught by experience to divide in twenty eight parts the zodiac of the moon and to bless the constellations who refreshed with salutary rains the thirst of the desert The reign of the heavenly orbs could not be extended beyond the visible sphere and some metaphysical powers were necessary to sustain the transmigration of souls and the resurrection of bodies a camel was left to perish on the grave that he might serve his master in another life and the invocation of departed spirits implies that they were still endowed with con ciousness and power I am ignorant and I am careless of the blind mythology of the barbarians—of the local deities of the stars the air and the earth of their sex or titles their attributes or subordination Each tribe, each family, each independent warrior created and changed the rites and the object of his fantastic worship but the nation in every age has bowed to the religion as well as to the language of Mecca The genuine antiquity of the CAABA ascends beyond the Christian era in describing the coast of the Red Sea the Greek historian Diodorus [45] has remarked between the Thamudites and the Sabæans a famous temple whose superior sanctity was revered by all the Arabians the linen or silken veil which is annually renewed by the Turkish emperor was first offered by a pious king of the Homerites, who reigned seven hundred years before the time of Mohammed [46] A tent or a cavern might suffice for the worship of the savages, but an edifice of stone and clay has been erected in its place and the art and power of the mo archs of the East have been confined to the simplicity of the original model [47] A spacious portico encloses the quadrangle of the Caaba—a square chapel twenty four cubits long twenty thr broad, and twenty seven high a door and a window admit the light the double roof is supported by three pillars of wood a spout (now of gold) discharges the rain water, and the well Zemzem is protected by a dome from accidental pollution The tribe of Koreish by fraud or force had acquired the custody of the Caaba the sacerdotal office devolved through four lineal descents to the grandfather of Mohammed and the family of the Hashemites from whence he sprung was the most respectable and sacred in the eyes of their country [48] The precincts of Mecca enjoyed the rights of sanctuary and in the last month of each year the city and the *temple were crowded with a long train of pil*grims who presented their vows and offerings in the house of God The same rites which are now accomplished by the faithful Musulman were invented and practised by the superstition of the idolaters At an awful distance they cast away their garments seven times with hasty steps they encircled the Caaba and kissed the black stone seven times they visited and adored the adjacent mountains seven times they threw stones into the valley of Mina and the pilgrimage was achieved as at the present hour by a sacrifice of sheep and camels and the burial of their hair and nails in the consecrated ground Each tribe either found or introduced in the Caaba their domestic worship the temple was adorned or defiled with three hundred and sixty idols of men eagles lions and antelopes

and most conspicuous was the statue of Hebal of red agate holding in his hand seven arrows without heads or feathers the instruments and symbols of profane divination But this statue was a monument of Syrian arts the devotion of the ruder ages was content with a pillar or a tablet and the rocks of the desert were hewn into gods or altars in imitation of the black stone[49] of Mecca, which is deeply tainted with the reproach of an idolatrous origin. From Japan to Peru the use of sacrifice has universally prevailed and the votary has expressed his gratitude or fear by destroying or consuming in honour of the gods the dearest and most precious of their gifts The life of a man[50] is the most precious oblation to deprecate a public calamity the altars of Phoenicia and Egypt of Rome and Carthage have been polluted with human gore the cruel practice was long preserved among the Arabs in the third century a boy was annually sacrificed by the tribe of the Dumatians [51] and a royal captive was piously slaughtered by the prince of the Saracens the ally and soldier of the emperor Justinian [52] A parent who drags his son to the altar exhibits the most painful and sublime effort of fanaticism the deed or the intention was sanctified by the example of saints and heroes and the father of Mohammed himself was devoted by a rash vow and hardly ransomed for the equivalent of a hundred camels. In the time of ignorance the Arabs like the Jews and Egyptians abstained from the taste of swine's flesh [53] they circumcised[54] their children at the age of puberty the same customs without the censure or the precept of the Koran have been silently transmitted to their posterity and proselytes. It has been sagaciously conjectured that the artful legislator indulged the stubborn prejudices of his countrymen It is more simple to believe that he adhered to the habits and opinions of his youth without foreseeing that a practice congenial to the climate of Mecca might become useless or inconvenient on the banks of the Danube or the Volga.

Arabia was free the adjacent kingdoms were shaken by the storms of conquest and tyranny and the persecuted sects fled to the happy land where they might profess what they thought and practise what they professed The religions of the Sabians and Magians of the Jews and Christians were disseminated from the Persian Gulf to the Red Sea. In a remote period of antiquity Sabianism was diffused over Asia by the science of the Chaldæans[55] and the arms of the Assyrians. From the observations of two thousand years the priests and astronomers of Babylon[56] deduced the eternal laws of nature and providence They adored the seven gods or angels who directed the course of the seven planets and shed their irresistible influence on the earth. The attributes of the seven planets with the twelve signs of the zodiac, and the twenty four constellations of the northern and southern hemisphere were represented by images and talismans the seven days of the week were dedicated to their respective deities the Sabians prayed thrice each day and the temple of the moon at Haran was the term of their pilgrimage [57] But the flexible genius of their faith was always ready either to teach or to learn in the tradition of the creation, the deluge and the patriarchs, they held a singular agreement with their Jewish captives they appealed to the secret books of Adam Seth, and Enoch and a slight infusion of the Gospel has transformed the last remnant of the Polytheists into the Christians of St John in the territory of Bassora.[58] The altars of Babylon were overturned by the Magians but the injuries of the Sabians were revenged by the sword of Alexander Persia groaned above five hundred years under a foreign yoke and the purest disciples of Zoroaster escaped from the contagion of idolatry and breathed with their adversaries the freedom of the desert [59] Seven hundred years before the death of Mohammed the Jews were settled in Arabia and a far greater multitude was expelled from the Holy Land in the wars of Titus and Hadrian The industrious exiles aspired to liberty and power they erected synagogues in the cities and castles in the wilderness and their Gentile converts were confounded with the children of Israel, whom they resembled in the outward mark of circumcision. The Christian missionaries were still more active and successful the Catholics asserted their universal reign the sects whom they oppressed successively retired beyond the limits of the Roman empire the Marcionites and Manichæans dispersed their fantastic opinions and apocryphal gospels the churches of Yemen and the princes of Hira and Gassan were instructed in a purer creed by the Jacobite and Nestorian bishops [60] The liberty of choice was presented to the tribes each Arab was free to elect or to compose his private religion and the rude superstition of his house was mingled with the sublime theology of saints and philosophers A fundamental article of faith was inculcated by the consent of the learned strangers the existence of one supreme God who is exalted above the powers of heaven and earth but who has often revealed himself to mankind by the ministry of his angels and prophets, and whose grace or justice has interrupted by seasonable miracles the order of nature The most rational of the Arabs acknowledged his power though they neglected his worship [61] and it was habit rather than conviction that still attached them to the relics of idolatry The Jews and Christians were the people of the Book the Bible was already translated into the Arabic language,[62] and the volume of the Old Testament was accepted by the concord of these implacable enemies In the story of the Hebrew patriarchs the Arabs were pleased to discover the fathers of their nation They applauded the birth and promises of Ismael revered the faith and virtue of Abraham traced his pedigree and their own to the creation of the first man and imbibed with equal credulity the prodigies of the holy text and the dreams and traditions of the Jewish rabbis

The base and plebeian origin of Mohammed is an unskilful calumny of the Christians [63] who exalt instead of degrading the merit of their adversary His descent from Ismael was a national privilege or fable, but if the first steps of the pedigree[64] are dark and doubtful he could produce many generations of pure and genuine nobility he sprung from the tribe of Koreish and the family of Hashem the most illustrious of the Arabs the princes of Mecca and the hereditary guardians of the Caaba The grandfather of Mohammed was Abdol Motalleb the son of Hashem, a wealthy and generous citizen who relieved the distress of famine with the supplies of commerce Mecca which had been fed by the liberality of the father, was saved by the courage of a son The kingdom of Yemen was subject to the Christian princes of Abyssinia their vassal Abrahah was provoked by an insult to avenge the honour of the cross and the holy city was invested by a train of elephants and an army of Africans A treaty was proposed and in the first audience the grandfather of Mohammed demanded the restitution of his cattle And why ' said Abrahah do you not rather implore my clemency in favour of your temple which I have threatened to destroy? Because replied the intrepid chief ' the cattle is my own the Caaba belongs to the gods and they will defend their house from injury and sacrilege ' The want of provisions or the valour of the Koreish compelled the Abyssinians to a disgraceful retreat their discomfiture has been adorned with a miraculous flight of birds who showered down stones on the heads of the infidels and the deliverance was long commemorated by the era of the elephant [65] The glory of Abdol Motalleb was crowned with domestic happiness, his life was prolonged to the age of one hundred and ten years and he became the father of six daughters and thirteen sons. His best beloved Abdallah was the most beautiful and modest of the Arabian youth and in the first night, when he consummated his marriage with Amina of the noble race of the Zahrites, two hundred virgins are said to have expired of jealousy and despair Mohammed the only son of Abdallah and Amina was born at Mecca, four years after the death of Justinian and two months after the defeat of the Abyssinians,[66] whose victory would have introduced into the Caaba the religion of the Christians In his early infancy[67] he was deprived of his father his mother and his grandfather his uncles were strong and numerous and in the division of the inheritance, the orphan s share was reduced to five camels and an Æthiopian maid servant At home and abroad in peace and war Abu Taleb, the most respectable of his uncles was the guide and guardian of his youth in his twenty fifth year he entered into the service of Cadijah a rich and noble widow of Mecca who soon rewarded his fidelity with the gift of her hand and fortune The marriage contract in the simple style of antiquity recites the mutual love of Mohammed and Cadijah describes him as the most accomplished of the tribe of Koreish and stipulates a dowry of twelve ounces of gold and twenty camels which was supplied by the liberality of his uncle [68] By this alliance the son of Abdallah was restored to the station of his ancestors and the judicious matron was content with his domestic virtues till in the fortieth year of his age [69] he assumed the title of a prophet and proclaimed the religion of the Koran

According to the tradition of his companions Mohammed[70] was distinguished by the beauty of his person an outward gift which is seldom despised except by those to whom it has been refused Before he spoke the orator engaged on his side the affections of a public or private audience They applauded his commanding presence his majestic aspect his piercing eye his gracious smile his flowing beard his countenance that painted every sensation of the soul and his gestures that enforced each expression of the tongue In the familiar offices of life he scrupulously adhered to the grave and ceremonious politeness of his country his respectful attention to the rich and powerful was dignified

his condescension and affability to the poor citizens of Mecca the frankness of his manner concealed the artifice of his views and the habits of courtesy were imputed to personal friendship or universal benevolence His memory was capacious and retentive his wit easy and social his imagination sublime his judgment clear rapid and decisive He possessed the courage both of thought and action and although his designs might gradually expand with his success the first idea which he entertained of his divine mission bears the stamp of an original and superior genius The son of Abdallah was educated in the bosom of the noblest race in the use of the purest dialect of Arabia and the fluency of his speech was corrected and enhanced by the practice of discreet and seasonable silence With these powers of eloquence Mohammed was an illiterate barbarian his youth had never been instructed in the arts of reading and writing [71] the common ignorance exempted him from shame or reproach, but he was reduced to a narrow circle of existence and deprived of those faithful mirrors which reflect to our mind the minds of sages and heroes Yet the book of nature and of man was open to his view and some fancy has been indulged in the political and philosophical observations which are ascribed to the Arabian traveller [72] He compares the nations and the religions of the earth discovers the weakness of the Persian and Roman monarchies beholds with pity and indignation the degeneracy of the times and resolves to unite under one God and one king the invincible spirit and primitive virtues of the Arabs Our more accurate inquiry will suggest that instead of visiting the courts the camps, the temples of the East the two journeys of Mohammed into Syria were confined to the fairs of Bostra and Damascus that he was only thirteen years of age when he accompanied the caravan of his uncle and that his duty compelled him to return as soon as he had disposed of the merchandise of Cadijah In these hasty and superficial excursions the eye of genius might discern some objects invisible to his grosser companions some seeds of knowledge might be cast upon a fruitful soil but his ignorance of the Syriac language must have checked his curiosity and I cannot perceive in the life or writings of Mohammed that his prospect was far extended beyond the limits of the Arabian world. From every region of that solitary world the pilgrims of Mecca were annually assembled by the calls of devotion and commerce in the free concourse of multitudes a simple citizen in his native tongue might study the political state and character of the tribes the theory and practice of the Jews and Christians Some useful strangers might be tempted or forced to implore the rights of hospitality and the enemies of Mohammed have named the Jew the Persian and the Syrian monk, whom they accuse of lending their secret aid to the composition of the Koran [73] Conversation enriches the understanding but solitude is the school of genius and the uniformity of a work denotes the hand of a single artist. From his earliest youth Mohammed was addicted to religious contemplation each year during the month of Ramadan he withdrew from the world and from the arms of Cadijah in the cave of Hera three miles from Mecca,[74] he consulted the spirit of fraud or enthusiasm whose abode is not in the heavens but in the mind of the prophet The faith which, under the name of Islam he preached to his family and nation is compounded of an eternal truth and a necessary fiction THAT THERE IS ONLY ONE GOD AND MOHAMMED IS THE APOSTLE OF GOD

It is the boast of the Jewish apologists that, while the learned nations of antiquity were deluded by the fables of polytheism their simple ancestors of Palestine preserved the knowledge and worship of the true God. The moral attributes of Jehovah may not easily be reconciled with the standard of human virtue his metaphysical qualities are darkly expressed but each page of the Pentateuch and the Prophets is an evidence of his power the unity of his name is inscribed on the first table of the law and his sanctuary was never defiled by any visible image of the invisible essence After the ruin of the temple the faith of the Hebrew exiles was purified fixed and enlightened by the spiritual devotion of the synagogue and the authority of Mohammed will not justify his perpetual reproach that the Jews of Mecca or Medina adored Ezra as the son of God [75] But the children of Israel had ceased to be a people and the religions of the world were guilty at least in the eyes of the prophet of giving sons or daughters or companions to the supreme God In the rude idolatry of the Arabs the crime is manifest and audacious the Sabians are poorly excused by the pre-eminence of the first planet or intelligence in their celestial hierarchy and in the Magian system the conflict of the two principles betrays the imperfection of the conqueror The Christians of the seventh century had insensibly relapsed into a semblance of paganism their public and private vows were addressed to the relics and images that disgraced the temples of the East the throne of the Almighty was darkened by a cloud of martyrs, and saints and angels the objects of popular veneration, and the Collyridian heretics, who flourished in the fruitful soil of Arabia invested the Virgin Mary with the name and honours of a goddess [76] The mysteries of the Trinity and Incarnation appear to contradict the principle of the divine unity In their obvious sense they introduce three equal deities, and transform the man Jesus into the substance of the Son of God [77] an orthodox commentary will satisfy only a believing mind intemperate curiosity and zeal had torn the veil of the sanctuary and each of the Oriental sects was eager to confess that all except themselves, deserved the reproach of idolatry and polytheism The creed of Mohammed is free from suspicion or ambiguity and the Koran is a glorious testimony to the unity of God The prophet of Mecca rejected the worship of idols and men of stars and planets on the rational principle that whatever rises must set, that whatever is born must die that whatever is corruptible must decay and perish [78] In the Author of the universe his rational enthusiasm confessed and adored an infinite and eternal being without form or place without issue or similitude present to our most secret thoughts existing by the necessity of his own nature and deriving from himself all moral and intellectual perfection These sublime truths, thus announced in the language of the prophet [79] are firmly held by his disciples and defined with metaphysical precision by the interpreters of the Koran A philosophic theist might subscribe the popular creed of the Mohammedans [80] a creed too sublime perhaps for our present faculties What object remains for the fancy, or even the understanding when we have abstracted from the unknown substance all ideas of time and space of motion and matter of sensation and reflection? The first principle of reason and revelation was confirmed by the voice of Mohammed his proselytes from India to Morocco are distinguished by the name of Unitarians and the danger of idolatry has been prevented by the interdiction of images The doctrine of eternal decrees and absolute predestination is strictly embraced by the Mohammedans and they struggle with the common difficulties how to reconcile the prescience of God with the freedom and responsibility of man, how to explain the permission of evil under the reign of infinite power and infinite goodness

The God of nature has written his existence on all his works, and his law in the heart of man. To restore the knowledge of the one and the practice of the other, has been the real or pretended aim of the prophets of every age the liberality of Mohammed allowed to his predecessors the same credit which he claimed for himself and the chain of inspiration was prolonged from the fall of Adam to the promulgation of the Koran [81] During that period some rays of prophetic light had been imparted to one hundred and twenty four thousand of the elect discriminated by their respective measure of virtue and grace, three hundred and thirteen apostles were sent with a special commission to recall their country from idolatry and vice one hundred and four volumes have been dictated by the Holy Spirit and six legislators of transcendant brightness have announced to mankind the six successive revelations of various rites, but of one immutable religion The authority and station of Adam Noah Abraham, Moses, Christ and Mohammed rise in just gradation above each other but whosoever hates or rejects any one of the prophets is numbered with the infidels The writings of the patriarchs were extant only in the apocryphal copies of the Greeks and Syrians [82] the conduct of Adam had not entitled him to the gratitude or respect of his children, the seven precepts of Noah were observed by an inferior and imperfect class of the proselytes of the synagogue [83] and the memory of Abraham was obscurely revered by the Sabians in his native land of Chaldæa of the myriads of prophets Moses and Christ alone lived and reigned and the remnant of the inspired writings was comprised in the books of the Old and New Testament The miraculous story of Moses is consecrated and embellished in the Koran [84] and the captive Jews enjoy the secret revenge of imposing their own belief on the nations whose recent creeds they deride For the author of Christianity the Mohammedans are taught by the prophet to entertain a high and mysterious reverence [85] Verily, Christ Jesus the son of Mary is the apostle of God and his word which he conveyed unto Mary and a Spirit proceeding from him honourable in this world and in the world to come and one of those who approach near to the presence of God [86] The wonders of the genuine and apocryphal gospels[87] are profusely heaped on his head and the Latin church has not disdained to borrow from the Koran the immaculate conception[88] of his virgin mother Yet Jesus was a mere mortal and at the day of judgment his

stimony will serve to condemn both the Jews ho reject him as a prophet and the Chris ans who adore him as the Son of God The alice of his enemies aspersed his reputation, nd conspired against his life but their inten on only was guilty a phantom or a criminal was substituted on the cross and the innocent aint was translated to the seventh heaven[89] During six hundred years the Gospel was the way of truth and salvation but the Christians insensibly forgot both the laws and the example of their founder and Mohammed was instructed by the Gnostics to accuse the church as well as the synagogue of corrupting the integrity of the sacred text.[90] The piety of Moses and of Christ rejoiced in the assurance of a future Prophet, more illustrious than themselves the evangelic promise of the Paraclete or Holy Ghost was pre figured in the name and accomplished in the person of Mohammed[91] the greatest and the last of the apostles of God

The communication of ideas requires a simil itude of thought and language the discourse of a philosopher would vibrate without effect on the ear of a peasant yet how minute is the distance of their understandings if it be com pared with the contact of an infinite and a finite mind with the word of God expressed by the tongue or the pen of a mortal? The inspiration of the Hebrew prophets of the apostles and evangelists of Christ, might not be incompatible with the exercise of their reason and memory and the diversity of their genius is strongly marked in the style and composition of the books of the Old and New Testament But Mo hammed was content with a character more humble yet more sublime of a simple editor the substance of the Koran[92] according to him self or his disciples is uncreated and eternal subsisting in the essence of the Deity and in scribed with a pen of light on the table of his everlasting decrees A paper copy in a volume of silk and gems was brought down to the low est heaven by the angel Gabriel who under the Jewish economy had indeed been despatched on the most important errands and this trusty messenger successively revealed the chapters and verses to the Arabian prophet Instead of a perpetual and perfect measure of the divine will the fragments of the Koran were produced at the discretion of Mohammed each revela tion is suited to the emergencies of his policy or passion and all contradiction is removed by the saving maxim that any text of Scripture is abro gated or modified by any subsequent passag The word of God and of the apostle was dili gently recorded by his disciples on palm leaves and the shoulder bones of mutton and the pages, without order or connection were cast into a domestic chest in the custody of one of his wives Two years after the death of Moham med the sacred volume was collected and pub lished by his friend and successor Abubeker the work was revised by the caliph Othman in the thirtieth year of the Hegira and the various editions of the Koran assert the same miracu lous privilege of a uniform and incorruptible text In the spirit of enthusiasm or vanity the prophet rests the truth of his mission on the merit of his book audaciously challenges both men and angels to imitate the beauties of a single page and presumes to assert that God alone could dictate this incomparable perform ance[93] This argument is most powerfully ad dressed to a devout Arabian whose mind is at tuned to faith and rapture whose ear is de lighted by the music of sounds and whose igno rance is incapable of comparing the productions of human genius[94] The harmony and copious ness of style will not reach, in a version the European infidel he will peruse with impa tience the endless incoherent rhapsody of fable and precept and declamation which seldom excites a sentiment or an idea, which some times crawls in the dust and is sometimes lost in the clouds. The divine attributes exalt the fancy of the Arabian missionary but his loftiest strains must yield to the sublime simplicity of the book of Job composed in a remote age in the same country and in the same language[95] If the composition of the Koran exceeds the faculties of a man, to what superior intelligence should we ascribe the Iliad of Homer or the Philippics of Demosthenes? In all religions the life of the founder supplies the silence of his written revelation the sayings of Mohammed were so many lessons of truth his actions so many examples of virtue and the public and private memorials were preserved by his wives and companions At the end of two hundred years the Sonna or oral law was fixed and con secrated by the labours of Al Bochari who dis criminated seven thousand two hundred and seventy five genuine traditions from a mass of three hundred thousand reports of a more doubtful or spurious character Each day the pious author prayed in the temple of Mecca and performed his ablutions with the water of Zemzem the pages were successively deposited on the pulpit and the sepulchre of the apostle and the work has been approved by the four orthodox sects of the Sonnites[96]

The God of nature has written his existe on all his works and his law in the heart of ma To restore the knowledge of the one a d th practice of the other has been the real or pre tended aim of the prophets of every age th liberality of Mohammed allowed to his prede cessors the same credit which he claimed fo himself and the chain of inspiration was pro longed from the fall of Adam to the promulga tion of the Koran [81] During that period som rays of prophetic light had been imparted t one hundred and twenty four thousand of th elect discriminated by their respective measu of virtue and grace three hundred and three apostles were sent with a special commission t recall their country from idolatry and vice o hundred and four volumes have been dicta by the Holy Spirit and six legislators of tra scendant brightness have announced to man kind the six successive revelations of vario rites but of one immutable religion. The au thority and station of Adam Noah Abraham Moses Christ, and Mohammed rise in just gr dation above each other but whosoever hat or rejects any one of the prophets is numbere with the infidels The writings of the patriarch were extant only in the apocryphal copies of th Greeks and Syrians [82] the conduct of Adam ha not entitled him to the gratitude or respect his children the seven precepts of Noah we observed by an inferior and imperfect class the proselytes of the synagogue [83] and the mem ory of Abraham was obscurely revered by th Sabians in his native land of Chaldæa of th myriads of prophets Moses and Christ alo lived and reigned and the remnant of the i spired writings was comprised in the books the Old and New Testament The miraculo story of Moses is consecrated and embellish in the Koran [84] and the captive Jews enjoy th secret revenge of imposing their own belief o the nations whose recent creeds they deride F the author of Christianity the Mohammeda are taught by the prophet to entertain a hi and mysterious reverence [85] Verily, Christ J sus the son of Mary is the apostle of God a his word which he conveyed unto Mary a a Spirit proceeding from him honourable this world and in the world to come and o of those who approach near to the presence God [86] The wonders of the genuine and apo ryphal gospels[87] are profusely heaped on h head and the Latin church has not disdain to borrow from the Koran the immaculate co ception[88] of his virgin mother Yet Jesus was mere mortal and at the day of judgment h timony will serve to condemn both the Jews, o reject him as a prophet and the Chris rs who adore him as the Son of God The lice of his enemies aspersed his reputation, d conspired against his life but their inten n only was guilty a phantom or a criminal s substituted on the cross and the innocent nt was translated to the seventh heaven [80] iring six hundred years the Gospel was the y of truth and salvation but the Christians sensibly forgot both the laws and the example their founder and Mohammed was instructed the Gnostics to accuse the church as well as e synagogue of corrupting the integrity of the cred text [80] The piety of Moses and of Christ joiced in the assurance of a future Prophet, ore illustrious than themselves the evangelic romise of the Paraclete or Holy Ghost was pre gured in the name and accomplished in the erson of Mohammed [81] the greatest and the ist of the apostles of God.

The communication of ideas requires a simil tude of thought and language the discourse f a philosopher would vibrate without effect n the ear of a peasant yet how minute is the listance of their understandings if it be com pared with the contact of an infinite and a finite mind, with the word of God expressed by the tongue or the pen of a mortal? The inspiration of the Hebrew prophets of the apostles and evangelists of Christ might not be incompatible with the exercise of their reason and memory and the diversity of their genius is strongly marked in the style and composition of the books of the Old and New Testament But Mohammed was content with a character more humble yet more sublime of a simple editor the substance of the Koran [82] according to him self or his disciples is uncreated and et rnal subsisting in the essence of the Deity and in scribed with a pen of light on the table of his everlasting decrees A paper copy in a volume of silk and gems was brought down to the low est heaven by the angel Gabriel who under the Jewish economy had indeed been despatched on the most important errands and this trusty messenger successively revealed the chapters and verses to th Arabian prophet Instead of a perpetual and perfect measure of the divine will the fragments of the Koran were produced at the discretion of Mohammed each revela tion is suited to the emergencies of his policy or passion and all contradiction is removed by the saving maxim that any text of Scripture is abrogated or modified by any subsequent passag The word of God and of the apostle was dili gently recorded by his disciples on palm leaves and the shoulder bones of mutton and the pages without order or connection were cast into a domestic chest in the custody of one of his wives Two years after the death of Mohammed the sacred volume was collected and published by his friend and successor Abubeker the work was revised by the caliph Othman in the thirtieth year of the Hegira and the various editions of the Koran assert the same miraculous privilege of a uniform and incorruptible text In the spirit of enthusiasm or vanity the prophet rests the truth of his mission on the merit of his book audaciously challenges both men and angels to imitate the beauties of a single page and presumes to assert that God alone could dictate this incomparable perform ance [83] This argument is most powerfully ad dressed to a devout Arabian whose mind is at tuned to faith and rapture whose ear is de lighted by the music of sounds and whose ignorance is incapable of comparing the productions of human genius [84] The harmony and copiousness of style will not reach, in a version, the European infidel he will peruse with impa tience the endless incoherent rhapsody of fable and precept and declamation which seldom excites a sentiment or an idea which some times crawls in the dust, and is sometimes lost in the clouds. The divine attributes exalt the fancy of the Arabian missionary but his loftiest strains must yield to the sublime simplicity of the book of Job composed in a remote age, in the same country and in the same language [85] If the composition of the Koran exceeds the faculties of a man to what superior intelligence should we ascribe the Iliad of Homer or the Philippics of Demosthenes? In all religions the life of the founder supplies the silence of his written revelation the sayings of Mohammed were so many lessons of truth his actions so many examples of virtue and the public and private memorials were preserved by his wives and companions At the end of two hundred years the Sonna or oral law was fixed and con secrated by the labours of Al Bochari who discriminated seven thousand two hundred and seventy five genuine traditions from a mass of three hundred thousand reports of a more doubtful or spurious character Each day the pious author prayed in the temple of Mecca and performed his ablutions with the water of Zemzem the pages were successively deposited on the pulpit and the sepulchre of the apostle and the work has been approved by the four orthodox sects of the Sonnites [86]

The mission of the ancient prophets of Moses and of Jesus had been confirmed by many splendid prodigies and Mohammed was repeatedly urged by the inhabitants of Mecca and Medina to produce a similar evidence of his divine legation to call down from heaven the angel or the volume of his revelation to create a garden in the desert, or to kindle a conflagration in the unbelieving city As often as he is pressed by the demands of the Koreish he involves himself in the obscure boast of vision and prophecy appeals to the internal proofs of his doctrine and shields himself behind the providence of God who refuses those signs and wonders that would depreciate the merit of faith and aggravate the guilt of infidelity But the modest or angry tone of his apologies betrays his weakness and vexation and these passages of scandal established beyond suspicion the integrity of the Koran [97] The votaries of Mohammed are more assured than himself of his miraculous gifts and their confidence and credulity increase as they are farther removed from the time and place of his spiritual exploits They believe or affirm that trees went forth to meet him that he was saluted by stones that water gushed from his fingers that he fed the hungry, cured the sick and raised the dead that a beam groaned to him that a camel complained to him that a shoulder of mutton informed him of its being poisoned and that both animate and inanimate nature were equally subject to the apostle of God [98] His dream of a nocturnal journey is seriously described as a real and corporeal transaction A mysterious animal, the Borak conveyed him from the temple of Mecca to that of Jerusalem with his companion Gabriel he successively ascended the seven heavens, and received and repaid the salutations of the patriarchs the prophets and the angels in their respective mansions Beyond the seventh heaven Mohammed alone was permitted to proceed he passed the veil of unity approached within two bow shots of the throne and felt a cold that pierced him to the heart, when his shoulder was touched by the hand of God After this familiar though important conversation he again descended to Jerusalem remounted the Borak returned to Mecca and performed in the tenth part of a night the journey of many thousand years [99] According to another legend, the apostle confounded in a national assembly the malicious challenge of the Koreish His resistless word split asunder the orb of the moon the obedient planet stooped from her station in the sky accomplished the seven revolutions round the Caaba, saluted Mohammed in the Arabian tongue and, suddenly contracting her dimensions, entered at the collar, and issued forth through the sleeve, of his shirt [100] The vulgar are amused with these marvellous tales but the gravest of the Musulman doctors imitate the modesty of their master, and indulge a latitude of faith or interpretation [101] They might speciously allege, that in preaching the religion it was needless to violate the harmony of nature, that a creed unclouded with mystery may be excused from miracles and that the sword of Mohammed was not less potent than the rod of Moses

The polytheist is oppressed and distracted by the variety of superstition a thousand rites of Egyptian origin were interwoven with the essence of the Mosaic law and the spirit of the Gospel had evaporated in the pageantry of the church The prophet of Mecca was tempted by prejudice or policy, or patriotism to sanctify the rites of the Arabians, and the custom of visiting the holy stone of the Caaba But the precepts of Mohammed himself inculcate a more simple and rational piety prayer fasting and alms are the religious duties of a Musulman, and he is encouraged to hope that prayer will carry him half way to God fasting will bring him to the door of his palace and alms will gain him admittance [102] According to the tradition of the nocturnal journey, the apostle, in his personal conference with the Deity was commanded to impose on his disciples the daily obligation of fifty prayers By the advice of Moses he applied for an alleviation of this intolerable burden the number was gradually reduced to five without any dispensation of business or pleasure or time or place the devotion of the faithful is repeated at daybreak at noon in the afternoon in the evening and at the first watch of the night and in the present decay of religious fervour our travellers are edified by the profound humility and attention of the Turks and Persians Cleanliness is the key of prayer the frequent lustration of the hands the face and the body which was practised of old by the Arabs is solemnly enjoined by the Koran and a permission is formally granted to supply with sand the scarcity of water The words and attitudes of supplication as it is performed either sitting or standing or prostrate on the ground are prescribed by custom or authority but the prayer is poured forth in short and fervent ejaculations the measure of zeal is not exhausted by a tedious liturgy and each Musulman for his own person is invested with the character of a priest Among the theists who reject the use of images it has been found necessary to restrain the wanderings of the fancy by directing the eye and the thought towards a kebla or visible point of the horizon The prophet was at first inclined to gratify the Jews by the choice of Jerusalem but he soon returned to a more natural partiality and five times every day the eyes of the nations at Astracan, at Fez at Delhi are devoutly turned to the holy temple of Mecca Yet every spot for the service of God equally pure the Mohammedans indifferent pray in their chamber or in the street. As a distinction from the Jews and Christians the Friday in each week is set apart for the useful institution of public worship the people is assembled in the mosch and the imam some respectable elder ascends the pulpit, to begin the prayer and pronounce the sermon But the Mohammedan religion is destitute of priesthood or sacrifice and the independent spirit of fanaticism looks down with contempt on the ministers and the slaves of superstition II The voluntary[103] penance of the ascetics the torment and glory of their lives was odious to a prophet who censured in his companions a rash vow of abstaining from flesh and women and sleep and firmly declared that he would suffer no monks in his religion[104] Yet he instituted in each year a fast of thirty days and strenuously recommended the observance as a discipline which purifies the soul and subdues the body as a salutary exercise of obedience to the will of God and his apostle During the month of Ramadan from the rising to the setting of the sun the Musulman abstains from eating and drinking and women and baths and perfumes from all nourishment that can restore his strength from all pleasure that can gratify his senses In the revolution of th lunar year the Ramadan coincides by turns with the winter cold and the summer heat and the patient martyr without assuaging his thirst with a drop of water must expect the close of a tedious and sultry day The interdiction of wine peculiar to some orders of priests or hermits, is converted by Mohammed alone into a positive and general law[105] and a considerable portion of the globe has abjured at his command the use of that salutary though dangerous liquor These painful restraints are doubtless infringed by the libertine and eluded by the hypocrite but the legislator by whom they are enacted cannot surely be accused of alluring his proselytes by th indulgence of their sensual appetites III The charity of the Mohammedans descends to the animal creation and the Koran repeatedly inculcates not as a merit but as a strict and indispensable duty, the relief of the indigent and unfortunate Mohammed perhaps is the only lawgiver who has defined the precise measure of charity the standard may vary with the degree and nature of property as it consists either in money in corn or cattle in fruits or merchandise but the Musulman does not accomplish the law unless he bestows a tenth of his revenue and if his conscience accuses him of fraud or extortion the tenth under the idea of restitution is enlarged to a fifth[106] Benevolence is the foundation of justice since we are forbid to injure those whom we are bound to assist A prophet may reveal the secrets of heaven and of futurity but in his moral precepts he can only repeat the lessons of our own hearts

The two articles of belief and the four practical duties of Islam are guarded by rewards and punishments and the faith of the Musulman is devoutly fixed on the event of the judgment and the last day The prophet has not presumed to determine the moment of that awful catastrophe though he darkly announces the signs, both in heaven and earth, which will precede the universal dissolution when life shall be destroyed and the order of creation shall be confounded in the primitive chaos At the blast of the trumpet new worlds will start into being angels genii and men will arise from the dead and the human soul will again be united to the body The doctrine of the resurrection was first entertained by the Egyptians[107] and their mummies were embalmed their pyramids were constructed to preserve the ancient mansion of the soul during a period of three thousand years But the attempt is partial and unavailing and it is with a more philosophic spirit that Mohammed relies on the omnipotence of the Creator whose word can re animate the breathless clay and collect the innumerable atoms that no longer retain their form or substance[108] The intermediate state of the soul it is hard to decide and those who most firmly believe her immaterial nature are at a loss to understand how she can think or act without the agency of the organs of sense

The re union of the soul and body will be followed by the final judgment of mankind and in his copy of the Magian picture the prophet has too faithfully represented the forms of proceeding and even the slow and successive operations of an earthly tribunal By his intolerant adversaries he is upbraided for extending even to themselves the hope of salvation for asserting the blackest heresy, that every man who believes in God, and accomplishes good works, may expect in the last day a favourable sentence Such rational indifference is ill adapted to the character of a fanatic, nor is it probable that a messenger from heaven should depreciate the value and necessity of his own revelation In the idiom of the Koran [109] the belief of God is inseparable from that of Mohammed the good works are those which he has enjoined and the two qualifications imply the profession of Islam to which all nations and all sects are equally invited The spiritual blindness though excused by ignorance and crowned with virtue, will be scourged with everlasting torments, and the tears which Mohammed shed over the tomb of his mother for whom he was forbidden to pray display a striking contrast of humanity and enthusiasm.[110] The doom of the infidels is common the measure of their guilt and punishment is determined by the degree of evidence which they have rejected by the magnitude of the errors which they have entertained the eternal mansions of the Christians the Jews the Sabians the Magians and the idolaters are sunk below each other in the abyss and the lowest hell is reserved for the faithless hypocrites who have assumed the mask of religion After the greater part of mankind has been condemned for their opinions the true believers only will be judged by their actions The good and evil of each Musulman will be accurately weighed in a real or allegorical balance, and a singular mode of compensation will be allowed for the payment of injuries the aggressor will refund an equivalent of his own good actions for the benefit of the person whom he has wronged and if he should be destitute of any moral property the weight of his sins will be loaded with an adequate share of the demerits of the sufferer According as the shares of guilt or virtue shall preponderate the sentence will be pronounced and all without distinction will pass over the sharp and perilous bridge of the abyss but the innocent treading in the footsteps of Mohammed will gloriously enter the gates of paradise while the guilty will fall into the first and mildest of the seven hells The term of expiation will vary from nine hundred to seven thousand years but the prophet has judiciously promised that all his disciples whatever may be their sins shall be saved by their own faith and his intercession from eternal damnation It is not surprising that superstition should act most powerfully on the fears of her votaries since the human fancy can paint with more energy the misery than the bliss of a future life With the two simple elements of darkness and fire we create a sensation of pain, which may be aggravated to an infinite degree by the idea of endless duration But the same idea operates with an opposite effect on the continuity of pleasure, and too much of our present enjoyments is obtained from the relief, or the comparison of evil It is natural enough that an Arabian prophet should dwell with rapture on the groves, the fountains and the rivers of paradise but instead of inspiring the blessed inhabitants with a liberal taste for harmony and science, conversation and friendship he idly celebrates the pearls and diamonds the robes of silk palaces of marble dishes of gold rich wines artificial dainties, numerous attendants, and the whole train of sensual and costly luxury which becomes insipid to the owner, even in the short period of this mortal life. Seventy two Houris or black-eyed girls, of resplendent beauty blooming youth virgin purity, and exquisite sensibility will be created for the use of the meanest believer a moment of pleasure will be prolonged to a thousand years and his faculties will be increased a hundred fold to render him worthy of his felicity Notwithstanding a vulgar prejudice the gates of heaven will be open to both sexes but Mohammed has not specified the male companions of the female elect, lest he should either alarm the jealousy of their former husbands or disturb their felicity by the suspicion of an everlasting marriage. This image of a carnal paradise has provoked the indignation perhaps the envy, of the monks they declaim against the impure religion of Mohammed and his modest apologists are driven to the poor excuse of figures and allegories But the sounder and more consistent party adhere without shame to the literal interpretation of the Koran useless would be the resurrection of the body unless it were restored to the possession and exercise of its worthiest faculties and the union of sensual and intellectual enjoyment is requisite to complete the happiness of the double animal the perfect man. Yet the joys of the Mohammedan paradise will not be confined to the indulgence of luxury and appetite and the prophet has expressly declared that all meaner happiness will be forgotten and despised by the saints and martyrs, who shall be admitted to the beatitude of the divine vision [111]

himself as a prophet to those who were most conversant with his infirmities as a man Yet Cadijah believed the words and cherished the glory of her husband the obsequious and affectionate Zeid was tempted by the prospect of freedom the illustrious Ali the son of Abu Taleb embraced the sentiments of his cousin with the spirit of a youthful hero and the wealth, the moderation the veracity of Abubeker confirmed the religion of the prophet whom he was destined to succeed. By his persuasion ten of the most respectable citizens of Mecca were introduced to the private lessons of Islam they yielded to the voice of reason and enthusiasm they repeated the fundamental creed, there is but one God and Mohammed is the apostle of God and their faith, even in this life was rewarded with riches and honours with the command of armies and the government of kingdoms Three years were silently employed in the conversion of fourteen proselytes the first fruits of his mission but in the fourth year he assumed the prophetic office and, resolving to impart to his family the light of divine truth he prepared a banquet a lamb as it is said and a bowl of milk for the entertainment of forty guests of the race of Hashem. Friends and kinsmen said Mohammed to the assembly I offer you and I alone can offer the most precious of gifts the treasures of this world and of the world to come God has commanded me to call you to his service Who among you will support my burden? Who among you will be my companion and my vizir? [115] No answer was returned till the silence of astonishment, and doubt and contempt was at length broken by the impatient courage of Ali a youth in the fourteenth year of his age O prophet, I am the man whosoever rises against thee I will dash out his teeth tear out his eyes break his legs rip up his belly O prophet, I will be thy vizir over them. Mohammed accepted his offer with transport and Abu Taleb was ironically exhorted to respect the superior dignity of his son In a more serious tone the father of Ali advised his nephew to relinquish his impracticable design. Spare your remonstrances replied the intrepid fanatic to his uncle and benefactor if they should place the sun on my right hand and the moon on my left they should not divert me from my course He persevered ten years in the exercise of his mission and the religion which has overspread the East and the West advanced with a slow and painful progress within the walls of Mecca Yet Mohammed enjoyed the satisfaction of beholding the increase of his infant congregation of Unitarians who revered him as a prophet and to whom he seasonably dispensed the spiritual nourishment of the Koran. The number of proselytes may be esteemed by the absence of eighty three men and eighteen women who retired to Æthiopia in the seventh year of his mission and his party was fortified by the timely conversion of his uncle Hamza and of the fierce and inflexible Omar, who signalised in the cause of Islam the same zeal which he had exerted for its destruction Nor was the charity of Mohammed confined to the tribe of Koreish or the precincts of Mecca on solemn festivals in the days of pilgrimage he frequented the Caaba accosted the strangers of every tribe and urged both in private converse and public discourse the belief and worship of a sole Deity Conscious of his reason and of his weakness he asserted the liberty of conscience and disclaimed the use of religious violence [116] but he called the Arabs to repentance and conjured them to remember the ancient idolaters of Ad and Thamud, whom the divine justice had swept away from the face of the earth [116]

The people of Mecca were hardened in their unbelief by superstition and envy The elders of the city the uncles of the prophet affected to despise the presumption of an orphan the reformer of his country the pious orations of Mohammed in the Caaba were answered by the clamours of Abu Taleb Citizens and pilgrims, listen not to the tempter hearken not to his impious novelties Stand fast in the worship of Al Lâta and Al Uzzah. Yet the son of Abdallah was ever dear to the aged chief and he protected the fame and person of his nephew against the assaults of the Koreishites who had long been jealous of the pre-eminence of the family of Hashem. Their malice was coloured with the pretence of religion in the age of Job the crime of impiety was punished by the Arabian magistrate [117] and Mohammed was guilty of deserting and denying the national deities But so loose was the policy of Mecca, that the leaders of the Koreish instead of accusing a criminal were compelled to employ the measures of persuasion or violence They repeatedly addressed Abu Taleb in the style of reproach and menace Thy nephew reviles our religion he accuses our wise forefathers of ignorance and folly silence him quickly lest he kindle tumult and discord in the city If he persevere we shall draw our swords against him and his adherents and thou wilt be responsible for the blood of thy fellow-citizens The weight and modera tion of Abu Taleb eluded the violence of religious faction the most helpless or timid of the disciples retired to Æthiopia and the prophet withdrew himself to various places of strength in the town and country As he was still supported by his family the rest of the tribe of Koreish engaged themselves to renounce all intercourse with the children of Hashem—neither to buy nor sell neither to marry nor to give in marriage, but to pursue them with implacable enmity till they should deliver the person of Mohammed to the justice of the gods The decree was suspended in the Caaba before the eyes of the nation the messengers of the Koreish pursued the Musulman exiles in the heart of Africa they besieged the prophet and his most faithful followers intercepted their water and inflamed their mutual animosity by the retaliation of injuries and insults A doubtful truce restored the appearances of concord till the death of Abu Taleb abandoned Mohammed to the power of his enemies, at the moment when he was deprived of his domestic comforts by the loss of his faithful and generous Cadijah Abu Sophian the chief of the branch of Ommiyah succeeded to the principality of the republic of Mecca A zealous votary of the idols, a mortal foe of the line of Hashem he convened an assembly of the Koreishites and their allies to decide the fate of the apostle His imprisonment might provoke the despair of his enthusiasm and the exile of an eloquent and popular fanatic would diffuse the mischief through the provinces of Arabia His death was resolved and they agreed that a sword from each tribe should be buried in his heart to divide the guilt of his blood and baffle the vengeance of the Hashemites An angel or a spy revealed their conspiracy, and flight was the only resource of Mohammed [118] At the dead of night accompanied by his friend Abubeker he silently escaped from his house the assassins watched at the door, but they were deceived by the figure of Ali who reposed on the bed and was covered with the green vestment of the apostle The Koreish respected the piety of the heroic youth but some verses of Ali which are still extant exhibit an interesting picture of his anxiety his tenderness, and his religious confidence Three days Mohammed and his companion were concealed in the cave of Thor, at the distance of a league from Mecca and in the close of each evening they received from the son and daughter of Abubeker a secret supply of intelligence and food The diligence of the Koreish explored every haunt in the neighbourhood of the city they arrived at the entrance of the cavern but the providential deceit of a spider s web and a pigeon s nest is supposed to convince them that the place was solitary and inviolate. We are only two, said the trembling Abubeker 'There is a third replied the prophet, it is God himself ' No sooner was the pursuit abated than the two fugitives issued from the rock and mounted their camels on the road to Medina they were overtaken by the emissaries of the Koreish they redeemed themselves with prayers and promises from their hands In this eventful moment the lance of an Arab might have changed the history of the world The flight of the prophet from Mecca to Medina has fixed the memorable era of the Hegira [119] which at the end of twelve centuries still discriminates the lunar years of the Mohammedan nations [120]

The religion of the Koran might have perished in its cradle had not Medina embraced with faith and reverence the holy outcasts of Mecca Medina or the city, known under the name of Yathreb before it was sanctified by the throne of the prophet, was divided between the tribe of the Charegites and the Awsites whose hereditary feud was rekindled by the slightest provocations two colonies of Jews, who boasted a sacerdotal race were their humble allies and without converting the Arabs, they introduced the taste of science and religion which distinguished Medina as the city of the Book Some of her noblest citizens in a pilgrimage to the Caaba, were converted by the preaching of Mohammed on their return they diffused the belief of God and his prophet and the new alliance was ratified by their deputies in two secret and nocturnal interviews on a hill in the suburbs of Mecca In the first ten Charegites and two Awsites united in faith and love, protested in the name of their wives, their children and their absent brethren that they would for ever profess the creed and observe the precepts of the Koran The second was a political association the first vital spark of the empire of the Saracens [121] Seventy three men and two women of Medina held a solemn conference with Mohammed his kinsmen and his disciples and pledged themselves to each other by a mutual oath of fidelity They promised in the name of the city that if he should be banished they would receive him as a confederate obey him as a leader and defend him to the last extremity like their wives and children But if you are recalled by your country they asked with a flattering anxiety will you not abandon your new allies? All things replied Mohammed with a smile are now common between us your blood is as my blood your ruin as my ruin We are bound to each other by the ties of honour and interest. I am your friend and the enemy of your foes But if we are killed in your service what exclaimed the deputies of Medina, will be our reward? PARADISE replied the prophet. Stretch forth thy hand He stretched it forth and they reiterated the oath of allegiance and fidelity Their treaty was ratified by the people, who unanimously embraced the profession of Islam they rejoiced in the exile of the apostle but they trembled for his safety and impatiently expected his arrival. After a perilous and rapid journey along the sea-coast, he halted at Koba two miles from the city and made his public entry into Medina, sixteen days after his flight from Mecca. Five hundred of the citizens advanced to meet him he was hailed with acclamations of loyalty and devotion Mohammed was mounted on a she-camel an umbrella shaded his head and a turban was unfurled before him to supply the deficiency of a standard His bravest disciples, who had been scattered by the storm assembled round his person and the equal, though various, merit of the Moslems was distinguished by the names of Mohagerians and Ansars the fugitives of Mecca, and the auxiliaries of Medina. To eradicate the seeds of jealousy Mohammed judiciously coupled his principal followers with the rights and obligations of brethren and when Ali found himself without a peer the prophet tenderly declared that he would be the companion and brother of the noble youth. The expedient was crowned with success the holy fraternity was respected in peace and war and the two parties vied with each other in a generous emulation of courage and fidelity Once only the concord was slightly ruffled by an accidental quarrel a patriot of Medina arraigned the insolence of the strangers but the hint of their expulsion was heard with abhorrence and his own son most eagerly offered to lay at the apostle s feet the head of his father

From his establishment at Medina Mohammed assumed the exercise of the regal and sacerdotal office and it was impious to appeal from a judge whose decrees were inspired by the divine wisdom. A small portion of ground the patrimony of two orphans was acquired by gift or purchase [112] on that chosen spot he built a house and a mosch, more venerable in their rude simplicity than the palaces and temples of the Assyrian caliphs His seal of gold or silver was inscribed with the apostolic title when he prayed and preached in the weekly assembly he leaned against the trunk of a palm tree and it was long before he indulged himself in the use of a chair or pulpit of rough timber [113] After a reign of six years fifteen hundred Moslems in arms and in the field renewed their oath of allegiance and their chief repeated the assurance of protection till the death of the last member or the final dissolution of the party It was in the same camp that the deputy of Mecca was astonished by the attention of the faithful to the words and looks of the prophet by the eagerness with which they collected his spittle a hair that dropped on the ground the refuse water of his lustrations as if they participated in some degree of the prophetic virtue I have seen said he the Chosroes of Persia and the Cæsar of Rome, but never did I behold a king among his subjects like Mohammed among his companions The devout fervour of enthusiasm acts with more energy and truth than the cold and formal servility of courts

In the state of nature every man has a right to defend by force of arms his person and his possessions to repel or even to prevent the violence of his enemies and to extend his hostilities to a reasonable measure of satisfaction and retaliation. In the free society of the Arabs the duties of subject and citizen imposed a feeble restraint and Mohammed in the exercise of a peaceful and benevolent mission had been despoiled and banished by the injustice of his countrymen. The choice of an independent people had exalted the fugitive of Mecca to the rank of a sovereign and he was invested with the just prerogative of forming alliances and of waging offensive or defensive war The imperfection of human rights was supplied and armed by the plenitude of divine power the prophet of Medina assumed in his new revelations a fiercer and more sanguinary tone which proves that his former moderation was the effect of weakness [114] the means of persuasion had been tried the season of forbearance was elapsed and he was now commanded to propagate his religion by the sword to destroy the monuments of idolatry and without regarding the sanctity of days or months to pursue the unbelieving nations of the earth The same bloody precepts so repeatedly inculcated in the Koran, are ascribed by the author to the Pentateuch and the Gospel But the mild tenor of the evangelic style may explain an ambiguous text that Jesus did not bring peace on the earth but a sword his patient and humble virtues should not be confounded with the intolerant zeal of princes and bishops, who have disgraced the name of his disciples In the prosecution of religious war, Mohammed might appeal with more propriety to the example of Moses, of the Judges, and the kings of Israel The military laws of the Hebrews are still more rigid than those of the Arabian legislator [125] The Lord of hosts marched in person before the Jews if a city resisted their summons, the males without distinction were put to the sword the seven nations of Canaan were devoted to destruction and neither repentance nor conversion could shield them from the inevitable doom, that no creature within their precincts should be left alive The fair option of friendship, or submission or battle, was proposed to the enemies of Mohammed If they professed the creed of Islam they were admitted to all the temporal and spiritual benefits of his primitive disciples, and marched under the same banner to extend the religion which they had embraced The clemency of the prophet was decided by his interest yet he seldom trampled on a prostrate enemy, and he seems to promise that on the payment of a tribute the least guilty of his unbelieving subjects might be indulged in their worship or at least in their imperfect faith. In the first months of his reign he practised the lessons of holy warfare, and displayed his white banner before the gates of Medina the martial apostle fought in person at nine battles or sieges,[126] and fifty enterprises of war were achieved in ten years by himself or his lieutenants The Arab continued to unite the professions of a merchant and a robber and his petty excursions for the defence or the attack of a caravan insensibly prepared his troops for the conquest of Arabia The distribution of the spoil was regulated by a divine law [127] the whole was faithfully collected in one common mass a fifth of the gold and silver, the prisoners and cattle the movables and immovables was reserved by the prophet for pious and charitable uses the remainder was shared in adequate portions by the soldiers who had obtained the victory or guarded the camp the rewards of the slain devolved to their widows and orphans and the increase of cavalry was encouraged by the allotment of a double share to the horse and to the man From all sides the roving Arabs were allured to the standard of religion and plunder the apostle sanctified the licence of embracing the female captives as their wives or concubines and the enjoyment of wealth and beauty was a feeble type of the joys of paradise prepared for the valiant martyrs of the faith 'The sword' says Mohammed, 'is th key of heaven and of hell a drop of blood shed in the cause of God a night spent in arms is of more avail than two months of fasting and prayer whosoever falls in battle, his sins are forgiven at the day of judgment his wounds shall be resplendent as vermilion and odoriferous as musk and the loss of his limbs shall be supplied by the wings of angels and cherubim." The intrepid souls of the Arabs were fired with enthusiasm the picture of the invisible world was strongly painted on their imagination and the death which they had always despised became an object of hope and desire The Koran inculcates, in the most absolute sense, the tenets of fate and predestination, which would extinguish both industry and virtue if the actions of man were governed by his speculative belief Yet their influence in every age has exalted the courage of the Saracens and Turks The first companions of Mohammed advanced to battle with a fearless confidence there is no danger where there is no chance they were ordained to perish in their beds or they were safe and invulnerable amidst the darts of the enemy [128]

Perhaps the Koreish would have been content with the flight of Mohammed, had they not been provoked and alarmed by the vengeance of an enemy who could intercept their Syrian trade as it passed and repassed through the territory of Medina. Abu Sophian himself with only thirty or forty followers, conducted a wealthy caravan of a thousand camels the fortune or dexterity of his march escaped the vigilance of Mohammed but the chief of the Koreish was informed that the holy robbers were placed in ambu h to await his return He despatched a messenger to his brethren of Mecca and they were roused by the fear of losing their merchandise and their provisions unless they hastened to his relief with the military force of the city The sacred band of Mohammed was formed of three hundred and thirteen Moslems, of whom seventy seven were fugitives and the rest auxiliaries they mounted by turns a train of seventy camels (the camels of Yathreb were formidable in war) but such was the poverty of his first disciples that only two could appear on horseback in the field [129] In the fertile and famous vale of Beder [130] three stations from Medina he was informed by his scouts of the caravan that approached on one side of the Koreish one hundred horse eight hundred and fifty foot who advanced on the other After a short debate he sacrificed the prospect of wealth to the pursuit of glory and revenge, and a slight

ntrenchment was formed to cover his troops and a stream of fresh water that glided through the valley O God he exclaimed as the numbers of the Koreish descended from the hills O God if these are destroyed by whom wilt thou be worshipped on the earth?—Courage my children close your ranks discharge your arrows and the day is your own At these words he placed himself with Abubeker on a throne or pulpit [111] and instantly demanded the succour of Gabriel and three thousand angels His eye was fixed on the field of battle the Musulmans fainted and were pressed In that decisive moment the prophet started from his throne, mounted his horse and cast a handful of sand into the air "Let their faces be covered with confusion Both armies heard the thunder of his voice their fancy beheld the angelic warriors [112] the Koreish trembled and fled seventy of the bravest were slain and seventy captives adorned the first victory of the faithful The dead bodies of the Koreish were despoiled and insulted two of the most obnoxious prisoners were punished with death and the ransom of the others four thousand drachms of silver compensated in some degree the escape of the caravan But it was in vain that the camels of Abu Sophian explored a new road through the desert and along the Euphrates they were overtaken by the diligence of the Musulmans and wealthy must have been the prize if twenty thousand drachms could be set apart for the fifth of the apostle The resentment of the public and private loss stimulated Abu Sophian to collect a body of three thousand men seven hundred of whom were armed with cuirasses and two hundred were mounted on horseback three thousand camels attended his march and his wife Henda, with fifteen matrons of Mecca incessantly sounded their timbrels to animate the troops and to magnify the greatness of Hobal the most popular deity of the Caaba The standard of God and Mohammed was upheld by nine hundred and fifty believers the disproportion of numbers was not more alarming than in the field of Beder and their presumption of victory prevailed against the divine and human sense of the apostle The second battle was fought on Mount Ohud six miles to the north of Medina [113] the Koreish advanced in the form of a crescent and the right wing of cavalry was led by Caled the fiercest and most successful of the Arabian warriors The troops of Mohammed were skilfully posted on the declivity of the hill and their rear was guarded by a detachment of fifty archers The weight of their charge impelled and broke the centre of the idolaters but in the pursuit they lost the advantage of their ground the archers deserted their station the Musulmans were tempted by the spoil, disobeyed their general and disordered their ranks The intrepid Caled wheeling his cavalry on their flank and rear exclaimed with a loud voice that Mohammed was slain He was indeed wounded in the face with a javelin two of his teeth were shattered with a stone yet in the midst of tumult and dismay he reproached the infidels with the murder of a prophet and blessed the friendly hand that stanched his blood and conveyed him to a place of safety Seventy martyrs died for the sins of the people they fell said the apostle in pairs each brother embracing his lifeless companion [114] their bodies were mangled by the inhuman females of Mecca and the wife of Abu Sophian tasted the entrails of Hamza the uncle of Mohammed They might applaud their superstition and satiate their fury but the Musulmans soon rallied in the field and the Koreish wanted strength or courage to undertake the siege of Medina It was attacked the ensuing year by an army of ten thousand enemies and this third expedition is variously named from the nations which marched under the banner of Abu Sophian from the ditch which was drawn before the city and a camp of three thousand Musulmans The prudence of Mohammed declined a general engagement the valour of Ali was signalised in single combat and the war was protracted twenty days till the final separation of the confederates A tempest of wind rain, and hail overturned their tents their private quarrels were fomented by an insidious adversary and the Koreish deserted by their allies no longer hoped to subvert the throne or to check the conquests of their invincible exile [115]

The choice of Jerusalem for the first kebla of prayer discovers the early propensity of Mohammed in favour of the Jews and happy would it have been for their temporal interest had they recognized in the Arabian prophet the hope of Israel and the promised Messiah. Their obstinacy converted his friendship into implacable hatred with which he pursued that unfortunate people to the last moment of his life and in the double character of an apostle and a conqueror his persecution was extended to both worlds [116] The Kainoka dwelt at Medina under the protection of the city he seized the occasion of an accidental tumult and summoned them to embrace his religion or contend with him in battle Alas replied the trembling Jews we

Their desertion enhanced the merit of Abubeker Othman and the faithful companions who devoted their lives and fortunes and Mohammed displayed his banner at the head of ten thousand horse and twenty thousand foot. Painful indeed was the distress of the march lassitude and thirst were aggravated by the scorching and pestilential winds of the desert ten men rode by turns on the same camel and they were reduced to the shameful necessity of drinking the water from the belly of that useful animal. In the mid way ten days journey from Medina and Damascus they reposed near the grove and fountain of Tabuc. Beyond that place Mohammed declined the prosecution of the war he declared himself satisfied with the peaceful intentions he was more probably daunted by the martial array of the emperor of the East But the active and intrepid Caled spread around the terror of his name and the prophet received the submission of the tribes and cities from the Euphrates to Ailah, at the head of the Red Sea. To his Christian subjects Mohammed readily granted the security of their persons the freedom of their trade the property of their goods, and the toleration of their worship [156] The weakness of their Arabian brethren had restrained them from opposing his ambition the disciples of Jesus were endeared to the enemy of the Jews and it was the interest of a conqueror to propose a fair capitulation to the most powerful religion of the earth.

Till the age of sixty three years the strength of Mohammed was equal to the temporal and spiritual fatigues of his mission. His epileptic an absurd calumny of the Greeks would be an object of pity rather than abhorrence [157] but he seriously believed that he was poisoned at Chaibar by the revenge of a Jewish female [158] During four years the health of the prophet declined his infirmities increased but his mortal disease was a fever of fourteen days which deprived him by intervals of the use of reason. As soon as he was conscious of his danger he edified his brethren by the humility of his virtue or penitence. If there be any man said the apostle from the pulpit whom I have unjustly scourged I submit my own back to the lash of retaliation Have I aspersed the reputation of a Musulman? let him proclaim my faults in the face of the congregation Has any one been despoiled of his goods? the little that I possess shall compensate the principal and the interest of the debt. Yes replied a voice from the crowd I am entitled to three drachms of silver Mohammed heard the complaint satisfied the demand and thanked his creditor for accusing him in this world rather than at the day of judgment He beheld with temperate firmness the approach of death enfranchised his slaves (seventeen men as they are named and eleven women) minutely directed the order of his funeral and moderated the lamentations of his weeping friends on whom he bestowed the benediction of peace Till the third day before his death he regularly performed the function of public prayer the choice of Abubeker to supply his place appeared to mark that ancient and faithful friend as his successor in the sacerdotal and regal office but he prudently declined the risk and envy of a more explicit nomination At a moment when his faculties were visibly impaired, he called for pen and ink to write or more properly to dictate a divine book the sum and accomplishment of all his revelations a dispute arose in the chamber whether he should be allowed to supersede the authority of the Koran and the prophet was forced to reprove the indecent vehemence of his disciples If the slightest credit may be afforded to the traditions of his wives and companions he maintained, in the bosom of his family and to the last moments of his life the dignity of an apostle and the faith of an enthusiast described the visits of Gabriel who bid an everlasting farewell to the earth and expressed his lively confidence not only of the mercy but of the favour of the Supreme Being In a familiar discourse he had mentioned his special prerogative that the angel of death was not allowed to take his soul till he had respectfully asked the permission of the prophet. To his Christian subjects Mohammed readily granted the security of their persons the freedom of their trade the property of their goods and the toleration of their worship [149] The weakness of their Arabian brethren had restrained them from opposing his ambition the disciples of Jesus were endeared to the enemy of the Jews and it was the interest of a conqueror to propose a fair capitulation to the most powerful religion of the earth.

Till the age of sixty three years the strength of Mohammed was equal to the temporal and spiritual fa igues of his mission. His epileptic fits, an absurd calumny of the Greeks would be an object of pity rather than abhorrence [150] but he seriously believed that he was poisoned at Chaibar by the revenge of a Jewish female [151] During four years the health of the prophet declined his infirmities increased but his mortal disease was a fever of fourteen days which deprived him by intervals of the use of reason As soon as he was conscious of his danger he edified his brethren by the humility of his virtue or penitence If there be any man said the apostle from the pulpit whom I have unjustly scourged I submit my own back to the lash of retaliation Have I aspersed the reputation of a Musulman? let him proclaim my faults in the face of the congregation Has any one been despoiled of his goods? the little that I possess shall compensate the principal and the interest of the debt Yes replied a voice from the crowd I am entitled to three drachms of silver Mohammed heard the complaint satisfied the demand and thanked his creditor for accusing him in this world rather than at the day of judgment He beheld with temperate firmness the approach of death enfranchised his slaves (seventeen men as they are named and eleven women) minutely directed the order of his funeral and moderated the lamentations of his weeping friends on whom he bestowed the benediction of peace Till the third day before his death he regularly performed the function of public prayer the choice of Abubeker to supply his place appeared to mark that ancient and faithful friend as his successor in the sacerdotal and regal office but he prudently declined the risk and envy of a more explicit nomination At a moment when his faculties were visibly impaired he called for pen and ink to write or more properly to dictate a divine book the sum and accomplishment of all his revelations a dispute arose in the chamber whether he should be allowed to supersede the authority of the Koran and the prophet was forced to reprove the indecent vehemence of his disciples If the slightest credit may be afforded to the traditions of his wives and companions he maintained in the bosom of his family and to the last moments of his life the dignity of an apostle and the faith of an enthusiast described the visits of Gabriel who bid an everlasting farewell to the earth and expressed his lively confid nce not only of the mercy but of the favour of the Supreme Being In a familiar discourse he had mentioned his special prerogative that the angel of death was not allowed to take his soul till he had respectfully asked the permission of the prophet. The request was granted, and Mohammed immediately fell into the agony of his dissolution his head was reclined on the lap of Ayesha, the best beloved of all his wives he fainted with the violence of pain, recovering his spirits, he raised his eyes towards the roof of the house, and with a steady look, though a faltering voice uttered the last broken, though articulate words "O God! pardon my sins Yes I come among my fellow citizens on high" and thus peaceably expired on a carpet spread upon the floor An expedition for the conquest of Syria was stopped by this mournful event the army halted at the gates of Medina, the chiefs were assembled round their dying master The city, more especially the house of the prophet was a scene of clamorous sorrow or silent despair fanaticism alone could suggest a ray of hope and consolation "How can he be dead, our witness our intercessor our mediator with God? By God he is not dead like Moses and Jesus he is wrapt in a holy trance and speedily will he return to his faithful people" The evidence of sense was disregarded, and Omar unsheathing his scimitar, threatened to strike off the heads of the infidels who should dare to affirm that the prophet was no more The tumult was appeased by the weight and moderation of Abubeker Is it Mohammed" said he to Omar and the multitude "or the God of Mohammed whom you worship? The God of Mohammed liveth for ever but the apostle was a mortal like ourselves and, according to his own prediction he has experienced the common fate of mortality He was piously interred by the hands of his nearest kinsman, on the same spot on which he expired [15] Medina has been sanctified by the death and burial of Mohammed, and the innumerable pilgrims of Mecca often turn aside from the way, to bow in voluntary devotion [153] before the simple tomb of the prophet [154]

At the conclusion of the life of Mohammed it may perhaps be expected that I should balance his faults and virtues that I should decide whether the title of enthusiast or impostor more properly belongs to that extraordinary man Had I been intimately conversant with the son of Abdallah, the task would still be difficult and the success uncertain at the distance of twelve centuries I darkly contemplate his shade through a cloud of religious incense and could I truly delineate the portrait of an hour the fleeting resemblance would not equally apply to the solitary of Mount Hera, to the preacher of Mecca and to the conqueror of Arabia The author of a mighty revolution appears to have been endowed with a pious and contemplative disposition so soon as marriage had raised him above the pressure of want, he avoided the paths of ambition and avarice and till the age of forty he lived with innocence, and would have died without a name The unity of God is an idea most congenial to nature and reason and a slight conversation with the Jews and Christians would teach him to despise and detest the idolatry of Mecca It was the duty of a man and a citizen to impart the doctrine of salvation to rescue his country from the dominion of sin and error The energy of a mind incessantly bent on the same object would convert a general obligation into a particular call, the warm suggestions of the understanding or the fancy would be felt as the inspirations of Heaven the labour of thought would expire in rapture and vision and the inward sensation the invisible monitor, would be described with the form and attributes of an angel of God [155] From enthusiasm to imposture the step is perilous and slippery the demon of Socrates[156] affords a memorable instance how a wise man may deceive himself, how a good man may deceive others how the conscience may slumber in a mixed and middle state between self illusion and voluntary fraud Charity may believe that the original motives of Mohammed were those of pure and genuine benevolence but a human missionary is incapable of cherishing the obstinate unbelievers who reject his claims despise his arguments and persecute his life he might forgive his personal adversaries he may lawfully hate the enemies of God the stern passion of pride and revenge were kindled in the bosom of Mohammed and he sighed, like the prophet of Nineveh for the destruction of the rebels whom he had condemned The injustice of Mecca and the choice of Medina transformed the citizen into a prince the humble preacher into the leader of armies but his sword was consecrated by the example of the saints and the same God who afflicts a sinful world with pestilence and earthquakes might inspire for their conversion or chastisement the valour of his servants In the exercise of political government he was compelled to abate of the stern rigour of fanaticism to comply in some measure with the prejudices and passions of his followers and to employ even the vices of mankind as the instruments of their salvation The use of fraud and perfidy of cruelty and injustice were often subservient to the propagation of the faith and Mohammed commanded or approved the assassination of the Jews and idolaters who had escaped from the field of battle By the repetition of such acts the character of Mohammed must have been gradually stained and the influence of such pernicious habits would be poorly compensated by the practice of the personal and social virtues which are necessary to maintain the reputation of a prophet among his sectaries and friends Of his last years ambition was the ruling passion and a politician will suspect that he secretly smiled (the victorious impostor!) at the enthusiasm of his youth, and the credulity of his proselytes.[147] A philosopher will observe that their credulity and his success would tend more strongly to fortify the assurance of his divine mission, that his interest and religion were inseparably connected and that his conscience would be soothed by the persuasion that he alone was absolved by the Deity from the obligation of positive and moral laws If he retained any vestige of his native innocence the sins of Mohammed may be allowed as an evidence of his sincerity In the support of truth the arts of fraud and fiction may be deemed less criminal and he would have started at the foulness of the means, had he not been satisfied of the importance and justice of the end Even in a conqueror or a priest I can surprise a word or action of unaffected humanity and the decree of Mohammed, that, in the sale of captives the mothers should never be separated from their children, may suspend, or moderate the censure of the historian[148]

The good sense of Mohammed[149] despised the pomp of royalty the apostle of God submitted to the menial offices of the family he kindled the fire swept the floor milked the ewes and mended with his own hands his shoes and his woollen garment Disdaining the penance and merit of a hermit, he observed without effort or vanity the abstemious diet of an Arab and a soldier On solemn occasions he feasted his companions with rustic and hospitable plenty but in his domestic life many weeks would elapse without a fire being kindled on the hearth of the prophet. The interdiction of wine was confirmed by his example his hunger was appeased with a sparing allowance of barley bread he delighted in the taste of milk and honey but his ordinary food consisted of dates and water Perfumes and women were the two sensual enjoyments which his nature required, and his religion did not forbid and Mohammed affirmed that the fervour of his devotion was increased by these innocent pleasures The heat of the climate inflames the blood of the Arabs, and their libidinous complexion has been noticed by the writers of antiquity[150] Their incontinence was regulated by the civil and religious laws of the Koran their incestuous alliances were blamed the boundless licence of polygamy was reduced to four legitimate wives or concubines their rights both of bed and of dowry were equitably determined the freedom of divorce was discouraged, adultery was condemned as a capital offence and fornication in either sex was punished with a hundred stripes[151] Such were the calm and rational precepts of the legislator but in his private conduct Mohammed indulged the appetites of a man and abused the claims of a prophet. A special revelation dispensed him from the laws which he had imposed on his nation the female sex without reserve was abandoned to his desires and this singular prerogative excited the envy rather than the scandal the veneration rather than the envy of the devout Musulmans If we remember the seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines of the wise Solomon, we shall applaud the modesty of the Arabian, who espoused no more than seventeen or fifteen wives eleven are enumerated who occupied at Medina their separate apartments round the house of the apostle and enjoyed in their turns the favour of his conjugal society What is singular enough they were all widows excepting only Ayesha the daughter of Abubeker She was doubtless a virgin since Mohammed consummated his nuptials (such is the premature ripeness of the climate) when she was only nine years of age The youth the beauty the spirit of Ayesha gave her a superior ascendant she was beloved and trusted by the prophet and after his death, the daughter of Abubeker was long revered as the mother of the faithful Her behaviour had been ambiguous and indiscreet in a nocturnal march she was accidentally left behind and in the morning Ayesha returned to the camp with a man. The temper of Mohammed was inclined to jealousy but a divine revelation assured him of her innocence he chastised her accusers and published a law of domestic peace that no woman should be condemned unless four male witnesses had seen her in the act of adultery[152] In his adventures with Zeineb the wife of Zeid and with Mary an Egyptian captive the amorous prophet forgot the interest of his reputation At the house of Zeid his freedman and adopted son he beheld in a loose undress the beauty of Zeineb and burst forth into an ejaculation of devotion and desire The servile or grateful freedman understood the hint and yielded without hesitation

to the love of his benefactor But as the filial relation had excited some doubt and scandal, the angel Gabriel descended from heaven to ratify the deed to annul the adoption and gently to reprove the apostle for distrusting the indulgence of his God One of his wives, Hafna the daughter of Omar, surprised him on her own bed in the embraces of his Egyptian captive she promised secrecy and forgiveness he swore that he would renounce the possession of Mary Both parties forgot their engagements and Gabriel again descended with a chapter of the Koran to absolve him from his oath, and to exhort him freely to enjoy his captives and concubines without listening to the clamours of his wives In a solitary retreat of thirty days he laboured alone with Mary to fulfill the commands of the angel When his love and revenge were satiated, he summoned to his presence his eleven wives reproached their disobedience and indiscretion, and threatened them with a sentence of divorce, both in this world and in the next—a dreadful sentence since those who had ascended the bed of a prophet were for ever excluded from the hope of a second marriage Perhaps the incontinence of Mohammed may be palliated by the tradition of his natural or preternatural gifts [163] he united the manly virtue of thirty of the children of Adam and the apostle might rival the thirteenth labour[164] of the Grecian Hercules [165] A more serious and decent excuse may be drawn from his fidelity to Cadijah During the twenty four years of their marriage her youthful husband abstained from the right of polygamy and the pride or tenderness of the venerable matron was never insulted by the society of a rival After her death he placed her in the rank of the four perfect women with the sister of Moses the mother of Jesus, and Fatima, the best beloved of his daughters

Was she not old? said Ayesha with the insolence of a blooming beauty has not God given you a better in her place? No, by God ' said Mohammed with an effusion of honest gratitude there never can be a better! She believed in me when men despised me she relieved my wants when I was poor and persecuted by the world [166]

In the largest indulgence of polygamy the founder of a religion and empire might aspire to multiply the chances of a numerous posterity and a lineal succession The hopes of Mohammed were fatally disappointed The virgin Ayesha, and his ten widows of mature age and approved fertility, were barren in his potent embraces The four sons of Cadijah died in their infancy Mary, his Egyptian concubine was endeared to him by the birth of Ibrahim At the end of fifteen months the prophet wept over his grave but he sustained with firmness the raillery of his enemies, and checked the adulation or credulity of the Moslems by the assurance that an eclipse of the sun was not occasioned by the death of the infant Cadijah had likewise given him four daughters who were married to the most faithful of his disciples the three eldest died before their father but Fatima who possessed his confidence and love became the wife of her cousin Ali and the mother of an illustrious progeny The merit and misfortunes of Ali and his descendants will lead me to anticipate, in this place, the series of the Saracen caliphs a title which describes the commanders of the faithful as the vicars and successors of the apostle of God [167]

The birth the alliance the character of Ali which exalted him above the rest of his countrymen might justify his claim to the vacant throne of Arabia The son of Abu Taleb was in his own right the chief of the family of Hashem and the hereditary prince or guardian of the city and temple of Mecca The light of prophecy was extinct, but the husband of Fatima might expect the inheritance and blessing of her father the Arabs had sometimes been patient of a female reign, and the two grandsons of the prophet had often been fondled in his lap and shown in his pulpit as the hope of his age and the chief of the youth of paradise The first of the true believers might aspire to march before them in this world and in the next, and if some were of a graver and more rigid cast, the zeal and virtue of Ali were never outstripped by any recent proselyte He united the qualifications of a poet, a soldier and a saint his wisdom still breathes in a collection of moral and religious sayings [168] and every antagonist in the combats of the tongue or of the sword was subdued by his eloquence and valour From the first hour of his mission to the last rites of his funeral the apostle was never forsaken by a generous friend whom he delighted to name his brother, his vicegerent and the faithful Aaron of a second Moses The son of Abu Taleb was afterwards reproached for neglecting to secure his interest by a solemn declaration of his right, which would have silenced all competition and sealed his succession by the decrees of Heaven But the unsuspecting hero confided in himself the jealousy of empire and perhaps the fear of opposition might suspend the resolutions of Mohammed, and the bed of sickness was besieged by the art

ful Ayesha the daughter of Abubeker and the enemy of Ali.

The silence and death of the prophet restored the liberty of the people and his companions convened an assembly to deliberate on the choice of his successor The hereditary claim and lofty spirit of Ali were offensive to an aristocracy of elders desirous of bestowing and resuming the sceptre by a free and frequent election the Koreish could never be reconciled to the proud pre-eminence of the line of Hashem the ancient discord of the tribes was re kindled the fugitives of Mecca and the auxiliaries of Medina asserted their respective merits and the rash proposal of choosing two independent caliphs would have crushed in their infancy the religion and empire of the Saracens The tumult was appeased by the disinterested resolution of Omar who suddenly renouncing his own pretensions stretched forth his hand and declared himself the first subject of the mild and venerable Abubeker The urgency of the moment, and the acquiescence of the people might excuse this illegal and precipitate measure but Omar himself confessed from the pulpit that if any Musulman should hereafter presume to anticipate the suffrage of his brethren both the elector and the elected would be worthy of death[169] After the simple inauguration of Abubeker he was obeyed in Medina Mecca and the provinces of Arabia the Hashemites alone declined the oath of fidelity and their chief in his own house maintained above six months a sullen and independent reserve without listening to the threats of Omar who attempted to consume with fire the habitation of the daughter of the apostle The death of Fatima and the decline of his party subdued the indignant spirit of Ali he condescended to salute the commander of the faithful accepted his excuse of the necessity of preventing their common enemies, and wisely rejected his courteous offer of abdicating the government of the Arabians After a reign of two years the aged caliph was summoned by the angel of death In his testament with the tacit approbation of the companions, he bequeathed the sceptre to the firm and intrepid virtue of Omar I have no occasion, said the modest candidate for the place." But the place has occasion for you replied Abubeker who expired with a fervent prayer that the God of Mohammed would ratify his choice and direct the Musulmans in the way of concord and obedience The prayer was not ineffectual since Ali himself in a life of privacy and prayer professed to revere the superior worth and dignity of his rival who comforted him for the loss of empire by the most flattering marks of confidence and esteem In the twelfth year of his reign Omar received a mortal wound from the hand of an assassin he rejected with equal impartiality the names of his son and of Ali refused to load his conscience with the sins of his successor and devolved on six of the most respectable companions the arduous task of electing a commander of the faithful On this occasion Ali was again blamed by his friends[170] for submitting his right to the judgment of men, for recognising their jurisdiction by accepting a place among the six electors He might have obtained their suffrage had he deigned to promise a strict and servile conformity not only to the Koran and tradition but likewise to the determinations of two seniors[171] With these limitations Othman the secretary of Mohammed, accepted the government nor was it till after the third caliph twenty four years after the death of the prophet that Ali was invested by the popular choice with the regal and sacerdotal office The manners of the Arabians retained their primitive simplicity and the son of Abu Taleb despised the pomp and vanity of this world At the hour of prayer he repaired to the mosch of Medina clothed in a thin cotton gown a coarse turban on his head his slippers in one hand and his bow in the other instead of a walking-staff The companions of the prophet and the chiefs of the tribe saluted their new sovereign, and gave him their right hands as a sign of fealty and allegiance

The mischiefs that flow from the contests of ambition are usually confined to the times and countries in which they have been agitated But the religious discord of the friends and enemies of Ali has been renewed in every age of the Hegira and is still maintained in the immortal hatred of the Persians and Turks[172] The former who are branded with the appellation of Shiites or sectaries have enriched the Mohammedan creed with a new article of faith and if Mohammed be the apostle his companion Ali is the vicar of God In their private converse in their public worship they bitterly execrate the three usurpers who intercepted his indefeasible right to the dignity of Imam and Caliph and the name of Omar expresses in their tongue the perfect accomplishment of wickedness and impiety[173] The Sonnites who are supported by the general consent and orthodox tradition of the Musulmans entertain a more impartial or at least a more decent opinion They respect the memory of Abubeker, Omar, Othman, and Ali the holy and legitimate successors of the prophet But they assign the last and most humble place to the husband of Fatima in the persuasion that the order of succession was determined by the degrees of sanctity [114] An historian who balances the four caliphs with a hand unshaken by superstition will calmly pronounce that their manners were alike pure and exemplary that their zeal was fervent and probably sincere and that in the midst of riches and power, their lives were devoted to the practice of moral and religious duties But the public virtues of Abubeker and Omar the prudence of the first, the severity of the second, maintained the peace and prosperity of their reigns The feeble temper and declining age of Othman were incapable of sustaining the weight of conquest and empire He chose, and he was deceived he trusted and he was betrayed the most deserving of the faithful became useless or hostile to his government, and his lavish bounty was productive only of ingratitude and discontent The spirit of discord went forth in the provinces their deputies assembled at Medina, and the Charegites the desperate fanatics who disclaimed the yoke of subordination and reason, were confounded among the free born Arabs who demanded the redress of their wrongs and the punishment of their oppressors From Cufa, from Bassora, from Egypt from the tribes of the desert, they rose in arms encamped about a league from Medina and despatched a haughty mandate to their sovereign requiring him to execute justice or to descend from the throne His repentance began to disarm and disperse the insurgents, but their fury was rekindled by the arts of his enemies and the forgery of a perfidious secretary was contrived to blast his reputation and precipitate his fall The caliph had lost the only guard of his predecessors the esteem and confidence of the Moslems during a siege of six weeks his water and provisions were intercepted and the feeble gates of the palace were protected only by the scruples of the more timorous rebels Forsaken by those who had abused his simplicity the helpless and venerable caliph expected the approach of death the brother of Ayesha marched at the head of the assassins and Othman with the Koran in his lap was pierced with a multitude of wounds A tumultuous anarchy of five days was appeased by the inauguration of Ali his refusal would have provoked a general massacre In this painful situation he supported the becoming pride of the chief of the Hashemites, declared that he had rather serve than reign rebuked the presumption of the strangers, and required the formal if not the voluntary assent of the chiefs of the nation He has never been accused of prompting the assassin of Omar though Persia indiscreetly celebrates the festival of that holy martyr The quarrel between Othman and his subjects was assuaged by the early mediation of Ali and Hassan the eldest of his sons, was insulted and wounded in the defence of the caliph Yet it is doubtful whether the father of Hassan was strenuous and sincere in his opposition to the rebels and it is certain that he enjoyed the benefit of their crime The temptation was indeed of such magnitude as might stagger and corrupt the most obdurate virtue The ambitious candidate no longer aspired to the barren sceptre of Arabia the Saracens had been victorious in the East and West and the wealthy kingdoms of Persia Syria and Egypt were the patrimony of the commander of the faithful

A life of prayer and contemplation had not chilled the martial activity of Ali but in a mature age after a long experience of mankind he still betrayed in his conduct the rashness and indiscretion of youth In the first days of his reign he neglected to secure either by gifts or fetters the doubtful allegiance of Telha and Zobeir two of the most powerful of the Arabian chiefs They escaped from Medina to Mecca and from thence to Bassora erected the standard of revolt and usurped the government of Irak or Assyria which they had vainly solicited as the reward of their services The mask of patriotism is allowed to cover the most glaring inconsistencies and the enemies perhaps the assassins of Othman now demanded vengeance for his blood They were accompanied in their flight by Ayesha the widow of the prophet who cherished to the last hour of her life an implacable hatred against the husband and the posterity of Fatima The most reasonable Moslems were scandalised that the mother of the faithful should expose in a camp her person and character but the superstitious crowd was confident that her presence would sanctify the justice and assure the success of their cause At the head of twenty thousand of his loyal Arabs and nine thousand valiant auxiliaries of Cufa, the caliph encountered and defeated the superior numbers of the rebels under the walls of Bassora Their leaders Telha and Zobeir were slain in the first battle that stained with civil blood the arms of the Moslems After passing through the ranks to animate the troops Ayesha had chosen her post amidst the dangers of the field In the heat of the action seventy men who held the bridle of her camel were successively killed or wounded and the cage, or litter in which she sat was stuck with javelins and darts like the quills of a porcupine The venerable captive sustained with firmness the reproaches of the conqueror and was speedily dismissed to her proper station at the tomb of Mohammed with the respect and tenderness that was still due to the widow of the apostle After this victory which was styled the Day of the Camel Ali marched against a more formidable adversary against Moawiyah, the son of Abu Sophian who had assumed the title of caliph, and whose claim was supported by the forces of Syria and the interest of the house of Ommiyah From the passage of Thapsacus the plain of Siffin[174] extends upon the Western bank of the Euphrates On this spacious and level theatre the two competitors waged a desultory war of one hundred and ten days In the course of ninety actions or skirmishes the loss of Ali was estimated at twenty five, that of Moawiyah at forty five thousand soldiers and the list of the slain was distinguished with the names of five and twenty veterans who had fought at Beder under the standard of Mohammed In this sanguinary contest the lawful caliph displayed a superior character of valour and humanity His troops were strictly enjoined to await the first onset of the enemy to spare their flying brethren and to respect the bodies of the dead and the chastity of the female captives He generously proposed to save the blood of the Moslems by a single combat but his trembling rival declined the challenge as a sentence of inevitable death. The ranks of the Syrians were broken by the charge of a hero who was mounted on a piebald horse and wielded with irresistible force his ponderous and two-edged sword. As often as he smote a rebel he shouted the Allah Acbar God is victorious[175] and in the tumult of a nocturnal battle he was heard to repeat four hundred times that tremendous excla*mation The prince of Damascus* already meditated his flight but the certain victory was snatched from the grasp of Ali by the disobedience and enthusiasm of his troops Their conscience was awed by the solemn appeal to the books of the Koran which Moawiyah exposed on the foremost lances and Ali was compelled to yield to a disgraceful truce and an insidious compromise He retreated with sorrow and indignation to Cufa his party was discouraged the distant provinces of Persia, of Yemen and of Egypt were subdued or seduced by his crafty rival and the stroke of fanaticism which was aimed against the three chiefs of the nation was fatal only to the cousin of Mohammed In the temple of Mecca three Charegites or enthusiasts discoursed of the disorders of the church and state they soon agreed that the deaths of Ali of Moawiyah and of his friend Amrou the viceroy of Egypt would restore the peace and unity of religion Each of the assassins chose his victim poisoned his dagger devoted his life and secretly repaired to the scene of action Their resolution was equally desperate but the first mistook the person of Amrou and stabbed the deputy who occupied his seat the prince of Damascus was dangerously hurt by the second the lawful caliph in the mosch of Cufa received a mortal wound from the hand of the third He expired in the sixty third year of his age and mercifully recommended to his children that they would despatch the murderer by a single stroke The sepulchre of Ali[176] was concealed from the tyrants of the house of Ommiyah[177] but in the fourth age of the Hegira, a tomb a temple a city arose near the ruins of Cufa.[178] Many thousands of the Shiites repose in holy ground at the feet of the vicar of God and the desert is vivified by the numerous and annual visits of the Persians, who esteem their devotion not less meritorious than the pilgrimage of Mecca

The persecutors of Mohammed usurped the inheritance of his children and the champions of idolatry became the supreme heads of his religion and empire The opposition of Abu Sophian had been fierce and obstinate his conversion was tardy and reluctant his new faith was fortified by necessity and interest he served he fought, perhaps he believed and the sins of the time of ignorance were expiated by the recent merits of the family of Ommiyah. Moawiyah, the son of Abu Sophian, and of the cruel Henda, was dignified in his early youth with the office or title of secretary of the prophet the judgment of Omar intrusted him with the government of Syria and he administered that important province above forty years either in a subordinate or supreme rank. Without renouncing the fame of valour and liberality he affected the reputation of humanity and moderation a grateful people was attached to their benefactor and the victorious Moslems were enriched with the spoils of Cyprus and Rhodes The sacred duty of pursuing the assassins of Othman was the engine and pretence of his ambition. The bloody shirt of the martyr was exposed in the mosch of Damascus the emir deplored the fate of his injured kinsman and sixty thousand Syrians were engaged in his service by an oath of fidelity and revenge Amrou, the conqueror of Egypt himself an army, was the first who saluted the new monarch and divulged the dangerous secret that the Arabian caliphs might be created elsewhere than in the city of the prophet [179] The policy of Moawiyah eluded the valour of his rival and, after the death of Ali he negotiated the abdication of his son Hassan whose mind was either above or below the government of the world and who retired without a sigh from the palace of Cufa to a humble cell near the tomb of his grandfather The aspiring wishes of the caliph were finally crowned by the important change of an elective to an hereditary kingdom Some murmurs of freedom or fanaticism attested the reluctance of the Arabs and four citizens of Medina refused the oath of fidelity but the designs of Moawiyah were conducted with vigour and address and his son Yezid a feeble and dissolute youth was proclaimed as the commander of the faithful and the successor of the apostle of God

A familiar story is related of the benevolence of one of the sons of Ali In serving at a table a slave had inadvertently dropped a dish of scalding broth on his master the heedless wretch fell prostrate to deprecate his punishment and repeated a verse of the Koran Paradise is for those who command their anger —' I am not angry ' —' and for those who pardon offences ' —' I pardon your offence ' — and for those who return good for evil — I give you your liberty, and four hundred pieces of silver " With an equal measure of piety, Hosein the younger brother of Hassan inherited a remnant of his father's spirit, and served with honour against the Christians in the siege of Constantinople The primogeniture of the line of Hashem, and the holy character of grandson of the apostle, had centered in his person and he was at liberty to prosecute his claim against Yezid, the tyrant of Damascus, whose vices he despised and whose title he had never deigned to acknowledge A list was secretly transmitted from Cufa to Medina, of one hundred and forty thousand Moslems, who professed their attachment to his cause and who were eager to draw their swords so soon as he should appear on the banks of the Euphrates Against the advice of his wisest friends he resolved to trust his person and family in the hands of a perfidious people He traversed the desert of Arabia with a timorous retinue of women and children but as he approached the confines of Irak he was alarmed by the solitary or hostile face of the country, and suspected either the defection or ruin of his party His fears were just Obeidollah the governor of Cufa, had extinguished the first sparks of an insurrection and Hosein in the plain of Kerbela, was encompassed by a body of five thousand horse, who intercepted his communication with the city and the river He might still have escaped to a fortress in the desert that had defied the power of Cæsar and Chosroes, and confided in the fidelity of the tribe of Tai which would have armed ten thousand warriors in his defence In a conference with the chief of the enemy he proposed the option of three honourable conditions that he should be allowed to return to Medina, or be stationed in a frontier garrison against the Turks or safely conducted to the presence of Yezid But the commands of the caliph or his lieutenant were stern and absolute and Hosein was informed that he must either submit as a captive and a criminal to the commander of the faithful or expect the consequences of his rebellion Do you think " replied he to terrify me with death? And during the short respite of a night, he prepared with calm and solemn resignation to encounter his fate He checked the lamentations of his sister Fatima who deplored the impending ruin of his house Our trust, ' said Hosein, is in God alone All things both in heaven and earth must perish and return to their Creator My brother my father my mother, were better than me and every Musulman has an example in the prophet ' He pressed his friends to consult their safety by a timely flight they unanimously refused to desert or survive their beloved master and their courage was fortified by a fervent prayer and the assurance of paradise On the morning of the fatal day he mounted on horseback with his sword in one hand and the Koran in the other his generous band of martyrs consisted only of thirty two horse and forty foot, but their flanks and rear were secured by the tent ropes and by a deep trench which they had filled with lighted faggots according to the practice of the Arabs The enemy advanced with reluctance and one of their chiefs deserted with thirty followers to claim the partnership of inevitable death In every close onset or single combat the despair of the Fatimites was invincible but the surrounding multitudes galled them from a distance with a cloud of arrows and the horses and men were successively slain a truce was allowed on both sides for the hour of prayer and the battle at length expired by the death of the last of the companions of

Hosein Alone, weary and wounded he seated himself at the door of his tent As he tasted a drop of water he was pierced in the mouth with a dart and his son and nephew two beautiful youths were killed in his arms He lifted his hands to heaven—they were full of blood—and he uttered a funeral prayer for the living and the dead In a transport of despair his sister issued from the tent and adjured the general of the Cufians that he would not suffer Hosein to be murdered before his eyes a tear trickled down his venerable beard and the boldest of his soldiers fell back on every side as the dying hero threw himself among them The remorseless Shamer a name detested by the faithful reproached their cowardice and the grandson of Mohammed was slain with three and thirty strokes of lances and swords After they had trampled on his body they carried his head to the castle of Cufa and the inhuman Obeidollah struck him on the mouth with a cane Alas ' exclaimed an aged Musulman on these lips have I seen the lips of the apostle of God ! In a distant age and climate the tragic scene of the death of Hosein will awaken the sympathy of the coldest reader [110] On the annual festival of his martyrdom in the devout pilgrimage to his sepulchre his Persian votaries abandon their souls to the religious frenzy of sorrow and indignation [111]

When the sisters and children of Ali were brought in chains to the throne of Damascus, the caliph was advised to extirpate the enmity of a popular and hostile race whom he had injured beyond the hope of reconciliation But Yezid preferred the counsels of mercy and the mourning family was honourably dismissed to mingle their tears with their kindred at Medina The glory of martyrdom superseded the right of primogeniture and the twelve IMAMS,[112] or pontiffs, of the Persian creed are Ali Hassan Hosein, and the lineal descendants of Hosein to the ninth generation Without arms or treasures or subjects they successively enjoyed the veneration of the people and provoked the jealousy of the reigning caliphs their tombs at Mecca or Medina on the banks of the Euphrates or in the province of Chorasan are still visited by the devotion of their sect. Their names were often the pretence of sedition and civil war but these royal saints despised the pomp of the world submitted to the will of God and the injustice of man and devoted their innocent lives to the study and practice of religion The twelfth and last of the Imams conspicuous by the title of Mahadi or the Guide surpassed the solitude and sanctity of his predecessors He concealed himself in a cavern near Bagdad the time and place of his death are unknown and his votaries pretend that he still lives and will appear before the day of judgment to overthrow the tyranny of Dejal or the Antichrist [113] In the lapse of two or three centuries the posterity of Abbas the uncle of Mohammed had multiplied to the number of thirty three thousand [114] the race of Ali might be equally prolific the meanest individual was above the first and greatest of princes and the most eminent were supposed to excel the perfection of angels But their adverse fortune and the wide extent of the Musulman empire allowed an ample scope for every bold and artful impostor who claimed affinity with the holy seed the sceptre of the Almohades, in Spain and Afric of the Fatimites in Egypt and Syria [115] of the Sultans of Yemen and of the Sophis of Persia [116] has been consecrated by this vague and ambiguous title Under their reigns it might be dangerous to dispute the legitimacy of their birth and one of the Fatimite caliphs silenced an indiscreet question by drawing his scimitar This said Moez is my pedigree and these, casting a handful of gold to his soldiers— and these are my kindred and my children ' In the various conditions of princes or doctors or nobles or merchants or beggars a swarm of the genuine or fictitious descendants of Mohammed and Ali is honoured with the appellation of sheiks or sherifs or emirs In the Ottoman empire they are distinguished by a green turban receive a stipend from the treasury are judged only by their chief and however debased by fortune or character still assert the proud pre-eminence of their birth. A family of three hundred persons the pure and orthodox branch of the caliph Hassan is preserved without taint or suspicion in the holy cities of Mecca and Medina and still retains after the revolutions of twelve centuries the custody of the temple and the sovereignty of their native land The fame and merit of Mohammed would ennoble a plebeian race and the ancient blood of the Koreish transcends the recent majesty of the kings of the earth.[117]

The talents of Mohammed are entitled to our applause but his success has perhaps too strongly attracted our admiration Are we surprised that a multitude of proselytes should embrace the doctrine and the passions of an eloquent fanatic? In the heresies of the church the same seduction has been tried and repeated from the time of the apostles to that of the re formers Does it seem incredible that a private citizen should grasp the sword and the sceptre, subdue his native country and erect a monarchy by his victorious arms? In the moving picture of the dynasties of the East a hundred fortunate usurpers have arisen from a baser origin surmounted more formidable obstacles, and filled a larger scope of empire and conquest Mohammed was alike instructed to preach and to fight and the union of these opposite qualities while it enhanced his merit, contributed to his success the operation of force and persuasion of enthusiasm and fear, continually acted on each other till every barrier yielded to their irresistible power His voice invited the Arabs to freedom and victory to arms and rapine to the indulgence of their darling passions in this world and the other the restraints which he imposed were requisite to establish the credit of the prophet and to exercise the obedience of the people and the only objection to his success was his rational creed of the unity and perfections of God It is not the propagation, but the permanency of his religion, that deserves our wonder the same pure and perfect impression which he engraved at Mecca and Medina is preserved after the revolutions of twelve centuries, by the Indian the African and the Turkish proselytes of the Koran If the Christian apostles St Peter or St Paul could return to the Vatican they might possibly inquire the name of the Deity who is worshipped with such mysterious rites in that magnificent temple at Oxford or Geneva they would experience less surprise but it might still be incumbent on them to peruse the catechism of the church and to study the orthodox commentators on their own writings and the words of their Master But the Turkish dome of St Sophia with an increase of splendour and size represents the humble tabernacle erected at Medina by the hands of Mohammed The Mohammedans have uniformly withstood the temptation of reducing the object of their faith and devotion to a level with the senses and imagination of man I believe in one God and Mohammed the apostle of God,' is the simple and invariable profession of Islam The intellectual image of the Deity has never been degraded by any visible idol the honours of the prophet have never transgressed the measure of human virtue and his living precepts have restrained the gratitude of his disciples within the bounds of reason and religion The votaries of Ali have indeed, consecrated the memory of their hero, his wife, and his children and some of the Persian doctors pretend that the divine essence was incarnate in the person of the Imams, but their superstition is universally condemned by the Sonnites and their impiety has afforded a seasonable warning against the worship of saints and martyrs The metaphysical questions on the attributes of God and the liberty of man, have been agitated in the schools of the Mohammedans as well as in those of the Christians but among the former they have never engaged the passions of the people or disturbed the tranquillity of the state The cause of this important difference may be found in the separation or union of the regal and sacerdotal characters It was the interest of the caliphs the successors of the prophet and commanders of the faithful, to repress and discourage all religious innovations the order, the discipline the temporal and spiritual ambition of the clergy are unknown to the Moslems and the sages of the law are the guides of their conscience and the oracles of their faith From the Atlantic to the Ganges the Koran is acknowledged as the fundamental code not only of theology but of civil and criminal jurisprudence and the laws which regulate the actions and the property of mankind are guarded by the infallible and immutable sanction of the will of God This religious servitude is attended with some practical disadvantage the illiterate legislator has been often misled by his own prejudices and those of his country and the institutions of the Arabian desert may be ill adapted to the wealth and numbers of Ispahan and Constantinople On these occasions the Cadhi respectfully places on his head the holy volume and substitutes a dexterous interpretation more apposite to the principles of equity and the manners and policy of the times

His beneficial or pernicious influence on the public happiness is the last consideration in the character of Mohammed The most bitter or most bigoted of his Christian or Jewish foes will surely allow that he assumed a false commission to inculcate a salutary doctrine less perfect only than their own He piously supposed as the basis of his religion the truth and sanctity of their prior revelations the virtues and miracles of their founders The idols of Arabia were broken before the throne of God the blood of human victims was expiated by prayer and fasting and alms the laudable or innocent arts of devotion and his rewards and punishments of a future life were painted by the images most congenial to an ignorant and carnal generation Mohammed was, perhaps incapable of dictat

ing a moral and political system for the use of his countrymen but he breathed among the faithful a spirit of charity and friendship recommended the practice of the social virtues and checked by his laws and precepts, the thirst of revenge, and the oppression of widows and orphans The hostile tribes were united in faith and obedience and the valour which had been idly spent in domestic quarrels was vigorously directed against a foreign enemy Had the impulse been less powerful Arabia free at home and formidable abroad might have flourished under a succession of her native monarchs Her sovereignty was lost by the extent and rapidity of conquest. The colonies of the nation were scattered over the East and West, and their blood was mingled with the blood of their converts and captives After the reign of three caliphs the throne was transported from Medina to the valley of Damascus and the banks of the Tigris the holy cities were violated by impious war Arabia was ruled by the rod of a subject perhaps of a stranger and the Bedoweens of the desert awakening from their dream of dominion resumed their old and solitary independence [114]

The Conquest of Persia, Syria, Egypt, Africa, and Spain, by the Arabs or Saracens Empire of the Caliphs, or Successors of Mohammed State of the Christians, etc, under their Government

The revolution of Arabia had not changed the character of the Arabs the death of Mohammed was the signal of independence and the hasty structure of his power and religion tottered to its foundations A small and faithful band of his primitive disciples had listened to his eloquence and shared his distress had fled with the apostle from the persecution of Mecca or had received the fugitive in the walls of Medina The increasing myriads who acknowledged Mohammed as their king and prophet had been compelled by his arms, or allured by his prosperity The polytheists were confounded by the simple idea of a solitary and invisible God the pride of the Christians and Jews disdained the yoke of a mortal and contemporary legislator Their habits of faith and obedience were not sufficiently confirmed and many of the new converts regretted the venerable antiquity of the law of Moses or the rites and mysteries of the Catholic church or the idols the sacrifices the joyous festivals of their Pagan ancestors The jarring interests and hereditary feuds of the Arabian tribes had not yet coalesced in a system of union and subordination and the barbarians were impatient of the mildest and most salutary laws that curbed their passions or violated their customs They submitted with reluctance to the religious precepts of the Koran the abstinence from wine the fast of the Ramadan and the daily repetition of five prayers and the alms and tithes which were collected for the treasury of Medina could be distinguished only by a name from the payment of a perpetual and ignominious tribute The example of Mohammed had excited a spirit of fanaticism or imposture and several of his rivals presumed to imitate the conduct and defy the authority of the living prophet At the head of the fugitives and auxiliaries the first caliph was reduced to the cities of Mecca Medina and Tayef and perhaps the Koreish would have restored the idols of the Caaba if their levity had not been checked by a seasonable reproof Ye men of Mecca will ye be the last to embrace and the first to abandon the religion of Islam? After exhorting the Moslems to confide in the aid of God and his apostle Abubeker resolved by a vigorous attack, to prevent the junction of the rebels The women and children were safely lodged in the cavities of the mountains the warriors marching under eleven banners diffused the terror of their arms and the appearance of a military force revived and confirmed the loyalty of the faithful The *in*constant tribes accepted, with humble repentance, the duties of prayer and fasting and alms and after some examples of success and severity the most daring apostates fell prostrate before the sword of the Lord and of Caled. In the fertile province of Yemanah,[1] between the Red Sea and the Gulf of Persia, in a city not inferior to Medina itself a powerful chief his name was Moseilama had assumed the character of a prophet and the tribe of Hanifa listened to his voice A female prophetess was attracted by his reputation the decencies of words and actions were spurned by these favour ites of heaven [2] and they employed several days in mystic and amorous converse An obscure sentence of his Koran or book is yet extant [3] and in the pride of his mission, Moseilama condescended to offer a partition of the earth The proposal was answered by Mohammed with contempt, but the rapid progress of the impostor awakened the fears of his successor forty thousand Moslems were assembled under the standard of Caled and the existence of their faith was resigned to the event of a decisive battle In the first action they were repulsed with the loss of twelve hundred men but the skill and perseverance of their general prevailed their defeat was avenged by the slaughter of ten thousand infidels and Moseilama himself was pierced by an Æthiopian slave with the same javelin which had mortally wounded the uncle of Mohammed The various rebels of Arabia without a chief or a cause were speedily suppressed by the power and discipline of the rising monarchy and the whole nation again professed and more steadfastly held the religion of the Koran The ambition of the caliphs provided an immediate exercise for the restless spirit of the Saracens their valour was united in the prosecution of a holy war and their enthusiasm was equally confirmed by opposition and victory

From the rapid conquests of the Saracens a presumption will naturally arise, that the first caliphs commanded in person the armies of the faithful, and sought the crown of martyrdom in the foremost ranks of the battle The courage of Abubeker,[4] Omar [5] and Othman[6] had indeed been tried in the persecution and wars of the prophet and the personal assurance of paradise must have taught them to despise the pleasures and dangers of the present world But they ascended the throne in a venerable or mature age and esteemed the domestic cares of religion and justice the most important duties of a sovereign Except the presence of Omar at the siege of Jerusalem their longest expeditions were the frequent pilgrimage from Medina to Mecca and they calmly received the tidings of victory as they prayed or preached before the sepulchre of the prophet The austere and frugal measure of their lives was the effect of virtue or habit, and the pride of their simplicity insulted the vain magnificence of the kings of the earth When Abubeker assumed the office of caliph he enjoined his daughter Ayesha to take a strict account of his private patrimony that it might be evident whether he were enriched or impoverished by the service of the state He thought himself entitled to a stipend of three pieces of gold with the sufficient maintenance of a single camel and a black slave but on the Friday of each week he distributed the residue of his own and the public money first to the most worthy, and then to the most indigent, of the Moslems The remains of his wealth a coarse garment and five pieces of gold were delivered to his successor who lamented with a modest sigh his own inability to equal such an admirable model Yet the abstinence and humility of Omar were not inferior to the virtues of Abubeker his food consisted of barley bread or dates his drink was water he preached in a gown that was torn or tattered in twelve places and a Persian satrap who paid his homage to the conqueror, found him asleep among the beggars on the steps of the mosch of Medina Economy is the source of liberality, and the increase of the revenue enabled Omar to establish a just and perpetual reward for the past and present services of the faithful Careless of his own emolument he assigned to Abbas the uncle of the prophet the first and most ample allowance of twenty five thousand drachms or pieces of silver Five thousand were allotted to each of the aged warriors the relics of the field of Beder, and the last and meanest of the companions of Mohammed was distinguished by the annual reward of three thousand pieces One thousand was the stipend of the veterans who had fought in the first battles against the Greeks and Persians and the decreasing pay as low as fifty pieces of silver was adapted to the respective merit and seniority of the soldiers of Omar Under his reign and that of his predecessor, the conquerors of the East were the trusty servants of God and the people, the mass of the public treasure was consecrated to the expenses of peace and war a prudent mixture of justice and bounty maintained the discipline of the Saracens and they united by a rare felicity, the despatch and execution of despotism with the equal and frugal maxims of a republican government The heroic courage of Ali,[7] the consummate prudence of Moawiyah [8] excited the emulation of their subjects and the talents which had been exercised in the school of civil discord were more usefully applied to propagate the faith and dominion of the prophet In the sloth and vanity of the palace of Damascus the succeeding princes of the house of Ommiyah were alike destitute of the qualifications of statesmen and of saints [9] Yet the spoils of unknown nations were continually laid at the foot of their throne and the uniform ascent of the

Arabian greatness must be ascribed to the spirit of the nation rather than the abilities of their chiefs. A large deduction must be allowed for the weakness of their enemies The birth of Mohammed was fortunately placed in the most degenerate and disorderly period of the Persians, the Romans, and the barbarians of Europe the empires of Trajan or even of Constantine or Charlemagne would have repelled the assault of the naked Saracens and the torrent of fanaticism might have been obscurely lost in the sands of Arabia.

In the victorious days of the Roman republic it had been the aim of the senate to confine their councils and legions to a single war and completely to suppress a first enemy before they provoked the hostilities of a second These timid maxims of policy were disdained by the magnanimity or enthusiasm of the Arabian caliphs With the same vigour and success they invaded the successors of Augustus and those of Artaxerxes and the rival monarchies at the same instant becam the prey of an enemy whom they had been so long accustomed to despise In the ten years of the administration of Omar the Saracens reduced to his obedience thirty six thousand cities or castles destroyed four thousand churches or temples of the unbelievers and edified fourteen hundred moschs for the exercise of the religion of Mohammed One hundred years after his flight from Mecca the arms and the reign of his successors extended from India to the Atlantic Ocean, over the various and distant provinces which may be comprised under the names of I Persia II Syria III Egypt IV Africa and V Spain. Under this general division I shall proceed to unfold these memorable transactions despatching with brevity the remote and less interesting conquests of the East and reserving a fuller narrative for those domestic countries which had been included within the pale of the Roman empire Yet I must excuse my own defects by a just complaint of the blindness and insufficiency of my guides The Greeks so loquacious in controversy have not been anxious to celebrate the triumphs of their enemies [10] Aft r a century of ignorance the first annals of the Musulmans were collected in a great measure from the voice of tradition [11] Among the numerous productions of Arabic and Persian literature [12] our interpreters have selected the imperfect sketches of a more recent age [13] The art and genius of history have ever been unknown to the Asiatics [14] they are ignorant of the laws of criticism and our monkish chronicles of the same period may be compared to their most popular works which are never vivified by the spirit of philosophy and freedom The Oriental library of a Frenchman [15] would instruct the most learned mufti of the East and perhaps the Arabs might not find in a single historian so clear and comprehensive a narrative of their own exploits as that which will be deduced in the ensuing sheets

I In the first year of the first caliph, his lieutenant Chaled the Sword of God and the scourge of the infidels advanced to the banks of the Euphrates and reduced the cities of Anbar and Hira Westward of the ruins of Babylon a tribe of sedentary Arabs had fixed themselves on the verge of the desert and Hira was the seat of a race of kings who had embraced the Christian religion and *reigned above six hun*dred years under the shadow of the throne of Persia.[16] The last of the Mondars was defeated and slain by Chaled his son was sent a captive to Medina his nobles bowed *before the suc*cessor of the prophet the people was tempted by the example and success of their countrymen and the caliph accepted as the first fruits of foreign conquest an annual tribute of seventy thousand pieces of gold The conquerors and even their historians were astonished by the dawn of their future greatness In the same year says Elmacin Chaled fought many signal battles an immense multitude of the infidels was slaughtered and spoils infinite and innumerable were acquired by the victorious Moslems [17] But the invincible Chaled was soon transferred to the Syrian war the invasion of the Persian frontier was conducted by less active or less prudent commanders the Saracens were repulsed with loss in the passage of the Euphrates and though they chastised the insolent pursuit of the Magians their remaining forces still hovered in the desert of Babylon

Economy is the source of liberality and the increase of the revenue enabled Omar to establish a just and perpetual reward for the past and present services of the faithful. thousand regular troops was swelled in truth or in opinion to one hundred and twenty thousand subjects, or allies of the Great King The Moslems whose numbers were reinforced from twelve to thirty thousand had pitched their camp in the plains of Cadesia [20] and their line, though it consisted of fewer men, could produce more soldiers than the unwieldy host of the infidels I shall here observe what I must often repeat, that the charge of the Arabs was not, like that of the Greeks and Romans, the effort of a firm and compact infantry their military force was chiefly formed of cavalry and archers, and the engagement which was often interrupted and often renewed by single combats and flying skirmishes might be protracted without any decisive event to the continuance of several days The periods of the battle of Cadesia were distinguished by their peculiar appellations The first, from the well timed appearance of six thousand of the Syrian brethren was denominated the day of succour The day of concussion might express the disorder of one, or perhaps of both of the contending armies The third a nocturnal tumult, received the whimsical name of the night of barking, from the discordant clamours, which were compared to the inarticulate sounds of the fiercest animals The morning of the succeeding day determined the fate of Persia, and a seasonable whirlwind drove a cloud of dust against the faces of the unbelievers The clangour of arms was re-echoed to the tent of Rustam who far unlike the ancient hero of his name was gently reclining in a cool and tranquil shade amidst the baggage of his camp and the train of mules that were laden with gold and silver On the sound of danger he started from his couch but his flight was overtaken by a valiant Arab who caught him by the foot, struck off his head, hoisted it on a lance and instantly returning to the field of battle, carried slaughter and dismay among the thickest ranks of the Persians. The Saracens confess a loss of seven thousand five hundred men and the battle of Cadesia is justly described by the epithets of obstinate and atrocious [21] The standard of the monarchy was overthrown and captured in the field—a leathern apron of a blacksmith who in ancient times had arisen the deliverer of Persia but this badge of heroic poverty was disguised and almost concealed by a profusion of precious gems [22] After this victory the wealthy province of Irak or Assyria submitted to the caliph and his conquests were firmly established by the speedy foundation of Bassora [23] a place which ever commands the trade and navigation of the Persians At the distance of fourscore miles from the Gulf the Euphrates and Tigris unite in a broad and direct current, which is aptly styled the river of the Arabs In the midway, between the junction and the mouth of these famous streams the new settlement was planted on the western bank the first colony was composed of eight hundred Moslems, but the influence of the situation soon reared a flourishing and populous capital The air, though excessively hot, is pure and healthy, the meadows are filled with palm trees and cattle and one of the adjacent valleys has been celebrated among the four paradises or gardens of Asia Under the first caliphs the jurisdiction of this Arabian colony extended over the southern provinces of Persia the city has been sanctified by the tombs of the companions and martyrs and the vessels of Europe still frequent the port of Bassora as a convenient station and passage of the Indian trade

After the defeat of Cadesia, a country intersected by rivers and canals might have opposed an insuperable barrier to the victorious cavalry, and the walls of Ctesiphon or Madayn which had resisted the battering rams of the Romans, would not have yielded to the darts of the Saracens But the flying Persians were overcome by the belief that the last day of their religion and empire was at hand the strongest posts were abandoned by treachery or cowardice, and the king with a part of his family and treasures escaped to Holwan, at the foot of the Median hills In the third month after the battle Said, the lieutenant of Omar passed the Tigris without opposition the capital was taken by assault and the disorderly resistance of the people gave a keener edge to the sabres of the Moslems who shouted with religious transport, This is the white palace of Chosroes, this is the promise of the apostle of God! The naked robbers of the desert were suddenly enriched beyond the measure of their hope or knowledge Each chamber revealed a new treasure secreted with art, or ostentatiously displayed the gold and silver, the various wardrobes and precious furniture surpassed (says Abulfeda) the estimate of fancy or numbers and another historian defines the untold and almost infinite mass by the fabulous computation of three thousands of thousands of thousands of pieces of gold [24] Some minute though curious facts represent the contrast of riches and ignorance From the remote islands of the Indian Ocean a large provision of camphire[25] had been imported which is em ployed with a mixture of wax to illuminate the palaces of the East. Strangers to the name and properties of that odoriferous gum the Saracens, mistaking it for salt mingled the camphire in their bread and were astonished at the bitterness of the taste One of the apartments of the palace was decorated with a carpet of silk sixty cubits in length, and as many in breadth a paradise or garden was depictured on the ground the flowers fruits, and shrubs were imitated by the figures of the gold embroidery and the colours of the precious stones and the ample square was encircled by a variegated and verdant border The Arabian general persuaded his soldiers to relinquish their claim in the reasonable hope that the eyes of the caliph would be delighted with the splendid workmanship of nature and industry Regardless of the merit of art and the pomp of royalty the rigid Omar divided the prize among his brethren of Medina the picture was destroyed but such was the intrinsic value of the materials that the share of Ali alone was sold for twenty thousand drams A mule that carried away the tiara and cuirass, the belt and bracelets of Chosroes was overtaken by the pursuers the gorgeous trophy was presented to the commander of the faithful and the gravest of the companions condescended to smile when they beheld the white beard hairy arms and uncouth figure of the veteran who was invested with the spoils of the Great King[16] The sack of Ctesiphon was followed by its desertion and gradual decay The Saracens disliked the air and situation of the place, and Omar was advised by his general to remove the seat of government to the Western side of the Euphrates. In every age the foundation and ruin of the Assyrian cities has been easy and rapid the country is destitute of stone and timber and the most solid structures[17] are composed of bricks baked in the sun, and joined by a cement of a native bitumen. The name of Cufa[18] describes an habitation of reeds and earth but the importance of the new capital was supported by the numbers, wealth, and spirit of a colony of veterans and their licentiousness was indulged by the wisest caliphs, who were apprehensive of provoking the revolt of a hundred thousand swords Ye men of Cufa" said Ali who solicited their aid you have been always conspicuous by your valour You conquered the Persian king and scattered his forces till you had taken possession of his inheritance. This mighty conquest was achieved by the battles of Jalula and Nehavend After the loss of the former Yezdegerd fled from Holwan and concealed his shame and despair in the mountains of Farsistan from whence Cyrus had descended with his equal and valiant companions. The courage of the nation survived that of the monarch among the hills to the south of Ecbatana or Hamadan one hundred and fifty thousand Persians made a third and final stand for their religion and country and the decisive battle of Nehavend was styled by the Arabs the victory of victories If it be true that the flying general of the Persians was stopped and overtaken in a crowd of mules and camels laden with honey the incident however slight or singular will denote the luxurious impediments of an Oriental army[19]

The geography of Persia is darkly delineated by the Greeks and Latins but the most illustrious of her cities appear to be more ancient than the invasion of the Arabs By the reduction of Hamadan and Ispahan of Caswin, Tauris and Rei they gradually approached the shores of the Caspian Sea and the orators of Mecca might applaud the success and spirit of the faithful who had already lost sight of the northern bear and had almost transcended the bounds of the habitable world.[20] Again turning towards the West and the Roman empire they repassed the Tigris over the bridge of Mosul and in the captive provinces of Armenia and Mesopotamia, embraced their victorious brethren of the Syrian army From the palace of Madayn their Eastern progress was not less rapid or extensive. They advanced along the Tigris and the Gulf penetrated through the passes of the mountains into the valley of Estachar or Persepolis, and profaned the last sanctuary of the Magian empire The grandson of Chosroes was nearly surprised among the falling columns and mutilated figures—a sad emblem of the past and present fortune of Persia[21] he fled with accelerated haste over the desert of Kirman implored the aid of the warlike Segestans and sought a humble refuge on the verge of the Turkish and Chinese power But a victorious army is insensible of fatigue the Arabs divided their forces in the pursuit of a timorous enemy and the caliph Othman promised the government of Chorasan to the first general who should enter that large and populous country the kingdom of the ancient Bactrians The condition was accepted the prize was deserved the standard of Mohammed was planted on the walls of Herat Merou and Balch and the successful leader neither halted nor reposed till his foaming cavalry had tasted the waters of the Oxus In the public anarchy

thousand regular troops was swelled in truth or in opinion to one hundred and twenty thousand subjects, or allies of the Great King The Moslems, whose numbers were reinforced from twelve to thirty thousand had pitched their camp in the plains of Cadesia [20] and their line, though it consisted of fewer men, could produce more soldiers, than the unwieldy host of the infidels I shall here observe what I must often repeat, that the charge of the Arabs was not, like that of the Greeks and Romans, the effort of a firm and compact infantry their military force was chiefly formed of cavalry and archers and the engagement, which was often interrupted and often renewed by single combats and flying skirmishes might be protracted without any decisive event to the continuance of several days The periods of the battle of Cadesia were distinguished by their peculiar appellations The first from the well timed appearance of six thousand of the Syrian brethren, was denominated the day of succour The day of concussion might express the disorder of one, or perhaps of both of the contending armies The third a nocturnal tumult, received the whimsical name of the night of barking from the discordant clamours, which were compared to the inarticulate sounds of the fiercest animals The morning of the succeeding day determined the fate of Persia, and a seasonable whirlwind drove a cloud of dust against the faces of the unbelievers The clangour of arms was re-echoed to the tent of Rustam who, far unlike the ancient hero of his name was gently reclining in a cool and tranquil shade, amidst the baggage of his camp, and the train of mules that were laden with gold and silver On the sound of danger he started from his couch but his flight was over taken by a valiant Arab who caught him by the foot struck off his head, hoisted it on a lance, and, instantly returning to the field of battle, carried slaughter and dismay among the thickest ranks of the Persians The Saracens confess a loss of seven thousand five hundred men and the battle of Cadesia is justly described by the epithets of obstinate and atrocious [21] The standard of the monarchy was overthrown and captured in the field—a leathern apron of a blacksmith who in ancient times had arisen the deliverer of Persia but this badge of heroic poverty was disguised and almost concealed by a profusion of precious gems [22] After this victory the wealthy province of Irak or Assyria, submitted to the caliph and his conquests were firmly established by the speedy foundation of Bassora [23] a place which ever commands the trade and navigation of the Persians At the distance of fourscore miles from the Gulf the Euphrates and Tigris unite in a broad and direct current, which is aptly styled the river of the Arabs In the midway between the junction and the mouth of these famous streams the new settlement was planted on the western bank the first colony was composed of eight hundred Moslems but the influence of the situation soon reared a flourishing and populous capital The air, though excessively hot, is pure and healthy, the meadows are filled with palm trees and cattle and one of the adjacent valleys has been celebrated among the four paradises or gardens of Asia Under the first caliphs the jurisdiction of this Arabian colony extended over the southern provinces of Persia the city has been sanctified by the tombs of the companions and martyrs, and the vessels of Europe still frequent the port of Bassora, as a convenient station and passage of the Indian trade

After the defeat of Cadesia, a country intersected by rivers and canals might have opposed an insuperable barrier to the victorious cavalry and the walls of Ctesiphon or Madayn which had resisted the battering rams of the Romans, would not have yielded to the darts of the Saracens But the flying Persians were overcome by the belief that the last day of their religion and empire was at hand the strongest posts were abandoned by treachery or cowardice, and the king, with a part of his family and treasures escaped to Holwan, at the foot of the Median hills In the third month after the battle, Said the lieutenant of Omar, passed the Tigris without opposition, the capital was taken by assault, and the disorderly resistance of the people gave a keener edge to the sabres of the Moslems, who shouted with religious transport, ' This is the white palace of Chosroes, this is the promise of the apostle of God! The naked robbers of the desert were suddenly enriched beyond the measure of their hope or knowledge Each chamber revealed a new treasure secreted with art or ostentatiously displayed the gold and silver the various wardrobes and precious furniture, surpassed (says Abulfeda) the estimate of fancy or numbers and another historian defines the untold and almost infinite mass by the fabulous computation of three thousands of thousands of thousands of pieces of gold [24] Some minute though curious facts represent the contrast of riches and ignorance From the remote islands of the Indian Ocean a large provision of camphire[25] had been imported which is em

While one of his colleagues displayed the first Mohammedan banner on the banks of the Indus, the spacious regions between the Oxus the Jaxartes, and the Caspian Sea were reduced by the arms of Catibah to the obedience of the prophet and of the caliph.[42] A tribute of two millions of pieces of gold was imposed on the infidels their idols were burnt or broken the Musulman chief pronounced a sermon in the new mosch of Carizme after several battles the Turkish hordes were driven back to the desert, and the emperors of China solicited the friendship of the victorious Arabs. To their industry the prosperity of the province the Sogdiana of the ancients may in a great measure be ascribed but the advantages of the soil and climate had been understood and cultivated since the reign of the Macedonian kings Before the invasion of the Saracens Carizme Bochara and Samarcand were rich and populous under the yoke of the shepherds of the north. These cities were surrounded with a double wall and the exterior fortification of a larger circumference enclosed the fields and gardens of the adjacent district The mutual wants of India and Europe were supplied by the diligence of the Sogdian merchants and the inestimable art of transforming linen into paper has been diffused from the manufacture of Samarcand over the Western world.[43]

II No sooner had Abubeker restored the unity of faith and government than he despatched a circular letter to the Arabian tribes In the name of the most merciful God to the rest of the true believers Health and happiness and the mercy and blessing of God be upon you I praise the most high God and I pray for his prophet Mohammed. This is to acquaint you that I intend to send the true believers into Syria[44] to take it out of the hands of the infidels And I would have you know that the fighting for religion is an act of obedience to God. His messengers returned with the tidings of pious and martial ardour which they had kindled in every province and the camp of Medina was successively filled with the intrepid bands of the Saracens, who panted for action, complained of the heat of the season and the scarcity of provisions, and accused with impatient murmurs the delays of the caliph. As soon as their numbers were complete, Abubeker ascended the hill, reviewed the men the horses and the arms and poured forth a fervent prayer for the success of their undertaking In person and on foot he accompanied the first day's march and when the blushing leaders attempted to dismount the caliph removed their scruples by a declaration that those who rode and those who walked in the service of religion were equally meritorious. His instructions[45] to the chiefs of the Syrian army were inspired by the warlike fanaticism which advances to seize and affects to despise the objects of earthly ambition Remember ' said the successor of the prophet ' that you are always in the presence of God on the verge of death in the assurance of judgment and the hope of paradise Avoid injustice and oppression consult with your brethren and study to preserve the love and confidence of your troops When you fight the battles of the Lord acquit yourselves like men without turning your backs but let not your victory be stained with the blood of women or children Destroy no palm trees nor burn any fields of corn Cut down no fruit trees nor do any mischief to cattle only such as you kill to eat When you make any covenant or article stand to it and be as good as your word As you go on you will find some religious persons who live retired in monasteries and propose to themselves to serve God that way let them alone and neither kill them nor destroy their monasteries[46] and you will find another sort of people that belong to the synagogue of Satan who have shaven crowns[47] be sure you cleave their skulls and give them no quarter till they either turn Mohammedans or pay tribute All profane or frivolous conversation all dangerous recollection of ancient quarrels was severely prohibited among the Arabs in the tumult of a camp the exercises of religion were assiduously practised and the intervals of action were employed in prayer meditation and the study of the Koran The abuse or even the use of wine was chastised by fourscore strokes on the soles of the feet, and in the fervour of their primitive zeal many secret sinners revealed their fault and solicited their punishment After some hesitation the command of the Syrian army was delegated to Abu Obeidah one of the fugitives of Mecca, and companions of Mohammed whose zeal and devotion were assuaged without being abated by the singular mildness and benevolence of his temper But in all the emergencies of war the soldiers demanded the superior genius of Chaled and whoever might be the choice of the prince the Sword of God was both in fact and fame the foremost leader of the Saracens He obeyed without reluctance he was consulted without jealousy and such was the spirit of the man or rather of the times that Chaled professed his readiness to serve under the independent governors of the cities and castles obtained their separate capitulations the terms were granted or imposed by the esteem the prudence or the compassion of the victors and a simple profession of faith established the distinction between a brother and a slave After a noble defence Harmozan the prince or satrap of Ahwaz and Susa was compelled to surrender his person and his state to the discretion of the caliph and their interview exhibits a portrait of the Arabian manners In the presence and by the command of Omar the gay barbarian was despoiled of his silken robes embroidered with gold and of his tiara bedecked with rubies and emeralds Are you now sensible said the conqueror to his naked captive, are you now sensible of the judgment of God and of the different rewards of infidelity and obedience? Alas!' replied Harmozan 'I feel them too deeply In the days of our common ignorance we fought with the weapons of the flesh and my nation was superior God was then neuter since he has espoused your quarrel you have subverted our kingdom and religion ' Oppressed by this painful dialogue the Persian complained of intolerable thirst but discovered some apprehension lest he should be killed whilst he was drinking a cup of water ' Be of good courage " said the caliph your life is safe till you have drunk this water ' the crafty satrap accepted the assurance and instantly dashed the vase against the ground Omar would have avenged the deceit but his companions represented the sanctity of an oath and the speedy conversion of Harmozan entitled him not only to a free pardon but even to a stipend of two thousand pieces of gold The administration of Persia was regulated by an actual survey of the people the cattle and the fruits of the earth [3] and this monument which attests the vigilance of the caliphs might have instructed the philosophers of every age [33]

The flight of Yezdegerd had carried him beyond the Oxus and as far as the Jaxartes two rivers[34] of ancient and modern renown, which descend from the mountains of India towards the Caspian Sea He was hospitably entertained by Tarkhan prince of Fargana [35] a fertile province on the Jaxartes the king of Samarcand with the Turkish tribes of Sogdiana and Scythia were moved by the lamentations and promises of the fallen monarch and he solicited by a suppliant embassy the more solid and powerful friendship of the emperor of China [36] The virtuous Taitsong [37] the first of the dynasty of the Tang, may be justly compared with the Antonines of Rome his people enjoyed the blessings of prosperity and peace, and his dominion was acknowledged by forty four hordes of the barbarians of Tartary His last garrisons of Cashgar and Khoten maintained a frequent intercourse with their neighbours of the Jaxartes and Oxus a recent colony of Persians had introduced into China the astronomy of the Magi and Taitsong might be alarmed by the rapid progress and dangerous vicinity of the Arabs The influence, and perhaps the supplies of China revived the hopes of Yezdegerd and the zeal of the worshippers of fire, and he returned with an army of Turks to conquer the inheritance of his fathers. The fortunate Moslems without unsheathing their swords were the spectators of his ruin and death The grandson of Chosroes was betrayed by his servant insulted by the seditious inhabitants of Merou, and oppressed defeated, and pursued by his barbarian allies He reached the banks of a river and offered his rings and bracelets for an instant passage in a miller s boat Ignorant or insensible of royal distress the rustic replied that four drams of silver were the daily profit of his mill and that he would not suspend his work unless the loss were repaid In this moment of hesitation and delay the last of the Sassanian kings was overtaken and slaughtered by the Turkish cavalry, in the nineteenth year of his unhappy reign [38] His son Firuz a humble client of the Chinese emperor, accepted the station of captain of his guards and the Magian worship was long preserved by a colony of loyal exiles in the province of Bucharia His grandson inherited the regal name but after a faint and fruitless enterprise he returned to China and ended his days in the palace of Sigan The male line of the Sassanides was extinct but the female captives the daughters of Persia were given to the conquerors in servitude or marriage and the race of the caliphs and imams was ennobled by the blood of their royal mothers [39]

After the fall of the Persian kingdom the river Oxus divided the territories of the Saracens and of the Turks This narrow boundary was soon overleaped by the spirit of the Arabs the governors of Chorasan extended their successive inroads and one of their triumphs was adorned with the buskin of a Turkish queen which she dropped in her precipitate flight beyond the hills of Bochara [40] But the final conquest of Transoxiana [41] as well as of Spain was reserved for the glorious reign of the inactive Walid and the name of Catibah the camel driver declares the origin and merit of his successful lieutenant walls, returned with the promise of speedy and powerful succour and their tumultuous joy conveyed the intelligence to the camp of the Arabs After some debate it was resolved by the generals to raise or rather to suspend the siege of Damascus till they had given battle to the forces of the emperor In the retreat Chaled would have chosen the more perilous station of the rear-guard he modestly yielded to the wishes of Abu Obeidah. But in the hour of danger he flew to the rescue of his companion, who was rudely pressed by a sally of six thou sand horse and ten thousand foot, and few amon the Christians could relate at Damascus the circumstances of their defeat The impor tance of the contest required the junction of the Saracens who were dispersed on the frontiers of Syria and Palestine and I shall tran cribe one of the circular mandates which was addressed to Amrou, the future conqueror of Egypt In the name of the most merciful God from Cha led to Amrou health and happiness Know that thy brethren the Moslems design to march to Aiznadin where there is an army of seventy thousand Greeks, who purpose to come against us, that they may extinguish the light of God with their mou hs but God preserveth his light in spite of the i fidels [56] As soon therefore as this letter of mine shall be delivered to thy hands come with those that are with thee to Aiznadin where thou shalt find us if it please the most high God The summons was cheerfully obeyed and the forty five thousand Moslems who met on the same day on the same spot, ascribed to the blessing of Providence the effects of their activity and zeal

About four years after the triumphs of the Persian war the repose of Heraclius and the em pire was again disturbed by a new enemy the power of whose religion was more strongly felt than it was cl a ly understood by the Christians of the East. In his palace of Constantinople or Ant och he was awakened by the invasion of Syria, th loss of Bosra and the danger of Da mascus An army of seventy thousand veterans or new levies was assembled at Hems or Emesa, under the command of his general Werdan [57] and these troops, consisting chiefly of cavalry might be indifferently styled either Syrians or Greeks, or Romans Syrians from the place of their birth or warfare Greeks from the religion and language of their sovereign and Romans from the proud appellation which was still pro faned by the successors of Constantine On the plain of Aiznadin as Werdan rode on a white mule decorated with gold chains and sur rounded with ensigns and standards he was surprised by the near approach of a fierce and naked warrior who had undertaken to view the state of the enemy The adventurous valour of Derar was inspired and has perhaps been adorned by the enthusiasm of his age and country The hatred of the Christians the love of spoil and the contempt of danger were the ruling pas ions of the audacious Saracen and the prospect of instant death could never shake his religious confidence or ruffle the calmness of his resolution, or even suspend the frank and martial pleasantry of his humour In the most hopeless enterprises he was bold and prudent, and fortunate after innumerable hazards after being thrice a prisoner in the hands of the in fidels he still survived to relate the achieve m nts and to enjoy the rewards of the Syrian conquest On this occasion his single lance maintained a flying fight against thirty Ro mans who were detached by Werdan and after killing or unhorsing seventeen of their number Derar returned in safety to his ap plauding brethren. When his rashness was mildly censured by the general he excused himself with the simplicity of a soldier Nay ' said Derar I did not begin first but they came out to take me and I was afraid that God should see me turn my back and indeed I fought in good earnest, and without doubt God assisted me against them and had I not been appre hensive of disobeying your orders I should not have come away as I did and I perceive al ready that they will fall into our hands In the presence of both armies a venerable Greek ad vanced from the ranks with a liberal offer of peace and the departure of the Saracens would have been purchased by a gift to each soldier of a turban a robe and a piece of gold ten robes and a hundred pieces to their leader one hun dred robes and a thousand pieces to the caliph. A smile of indignation expressed the refusal of Chaled. Ye Christian dogs you know your option the Koran the tribute or the sword. We are a people whose delight is in war rather than in peace and we despise your pitiful alms since we shall be speedily masters of your wealth your families and your persons Notwith standing this apparent disdain he was deeply conscious of the public danger those who had been in Persia and had seen the armies of Chosroes confessed that they never beheld a more formidable array From the superiority of the enemy the artful Saracen derived a fresh incentive of courage You see before you said he the united force of the Romans you the banner of the faith, though it were in the hands of a child or an enemy Glory and riches and dominion were indeed promised to the victorious Musulman but he was carefully instructed that if the goods of this life were his only incitement, they likewise would be his only reward

One of the fifteen provinces of Syria, the cultivated lands to the eastward of the Jordan had been decorated by Roman vanity with the name of Arabia [48] and the first arms of the Saracens were justified by the semblance of a national right The country was enriched by the various benefits of trade by the vigilance of the emperors it was covered with a line of forts and the populous cities of Gerasa Philadelphia and Bosra[49] were secure at least from a surprise, by the solid structure of their walls The last of these cities was the eighteenth station from Medina the road was familiar to the caravans of Hejaz and Irak who annually visited this plenteous market of the province and the desert the perpetual jealousy of the Arabs had trained the inhabitants to arms and twelve thousand horse could sally from the gates of Bosra an appellation which signifies in the Syriac language a strong tower of defence Encouraged by their first success against the open towns and flying parties of the borders a detachment of four thousand Moslems presumed to summon and attack the fortress of Bosra They were oppressed by the numbers of the Syrians they were saved by the presence of Chaled with fifteen hundred horse he blamed the enterprise restored the battle and rescued his friend the venerable Serjabil who had vainly invoked the unity of God and the promises of the apostle After a short repose the Moslems performed their ablutions with sand instead of water [50] and the morning prayer was recited by Chaled before they mounted on horseback Confident in their strength the people of Bosra threw open their gates drew their forces into the plain and swore to die in the defence of their religion But a religion of peace was incapable of withstanding the fanatic cry of Fight fight! Paradise paradise! that re echoed in the ranks of the Saracens, and the uproar of the town the ringing of bells [51] and the exclamations of the priests and monks increased the dismay and disorder of the Christians With the loss of two hundred and thirty men the Arabs remained masters of the field and the ramparts of Bosra in expectation of human or divine aid were crowded with holy crosses and consecrated banners The governor Romanus had recommended an early submission despised by the people and degraded from his office he still retained the desire and opportunity of revenge In a nocturnal interview he informed the enemy of a subterraneous passage from his house under the wall of the city the son of the caliph with a hundred volunteers were committed to the faith of this new ally and their successful intrepidity gave an easy entrance to their companions After Chaled had imposed the terms of servitude and tribute, the apostate or convert avowed in the assembly of the people his meritorious treason "I renounce your society" said Romanus both in this world and the world to come And I deny him that was crucified and whosoever worships him And I choose God for my Lord, Islam for my faith Mecca for my temple the Moslems for my brethren and Mohammed for my prophet who was sent to lead us into the right way and to exalt the true religion in spite of those who join partners with God"

The conquest of Bosra four days journey from Damascus [52] encouraged the Arabs to besiege the ancient capital of Syria [53] At some distance from the walls they encamped among the groves and fountains of that delicious territory [54] and the usual option of the Mohammedan faith of tribute or of war was proposed to the resolute citizens who had been lately strengthened by a reinforcement of five thousand Greeks In the decline as in the infancy of the military art a hostile defiance was frequently offered and accepted by the generals themselves [55] many a lance was shivered in the plain of Damascus and the personal prowess of Chaled was signalised in the first sally of the besieged After an obstinate combat he had overthrown and made prisoner one of the Christian leaders a stout and worthy antagonist He instantly mounted a fresh horse the gift of the governor of Palmyra and pushed forwards to the front of the battle Repose yourself for a moment" said his friend Derar and permit me to supply your place you are fatigued with fighting with this dog" O Derar replied the indefatigable Saracen, we shall rest in the world to come He that labours to-day shall rest to-morrow' With the same unabated ardour Chaled answered encountered and vanquished a second champion and the heads of his two captives, who refused to abandon their religion were indignantly hurled into the midst of the city The event of some general and partial actions reduced the Damascenes to a closer defence but a messenger, whom they dropped from the

and the pursuit of the Saracens was checked by the military engines of the rampart.

After a siege of seventy days [40] the patience and perhaps the provisions of the Damascenes were exhausted and the bravest of their chiefs submitted to the hard dictates of necessity In the occurrences of peace and war they had been taught to dread the fierceness of Chaled and to revere the mild virtues of Abu Obeidah. At the hour of midnight one hundred chosen deputies of the clergy and people were introduced to the tent of that venerable commander He received and dismissed them with courtesy They returned with a written agreement, on the faith of a companion of Mohammed that all hostilities should cease that the voluntary emigrants might depart in safety with as much as they could carry away of their effects and that the tributary subjects of the caliph should enjoy their lands and houses with the use and possession of seven churches On these terms, the most respectable hostages and the gate nearest to his camp were delivered into his hands his soldiers imitated the moderation of their chief and he enjoyed the submissive gratitude of a people whom he had rescued from destruction But the success of the treaty had relaxed their vigilance and in the same moment the opposite quarter of the city was betrayed and taken by assault. A party of a hundred Arabs had opened the eastern gate to a more inexorable foe. No quarter cried the rapacious and sanguinary Chaled no quarter to the enemies of the Lord " his trumpets sounded and a torrent of Christian blood was poured down the streets of Damascus When he reached the church of St Mary he was astonished and provoked by the peaceful aspect of his companions their swords were in the scabbard and they were surrounded by a multitude of priests and monks Abu Obeidah saluted the general God said he has delivered the city into my hands by way of surrender and has saved the believers the trouble of fighting And am I not, replied the indignant Chaled, am I not the lieutenant of the commander of the faithful? Have I not taken the city by storm? The unbelievers shall perish by the sword Fall on. The hungry and cruel Arabs would have obeyed the welcome command and Damascus was lost if the benevolence of Abu Obeidah had not been supported by a decent and dignified firmness Throwing himself between the trembling citizens and the most eager of the barbarians he adjured them by the holy name of God to respect his promise to suspend their fury and to wait the determination of their chiefs The chiefs retired into the church of St. Mary and after a vehement debate Chaled submitted in some measure to the reason and authority of his colleague who urged the sanctity of a covenant the advantage as well as the honour which the Moslems would derive from the punctual performance of their word, and the obstinate resistance which they must encounter from the distrust and despair of the rest of the Syrian cities It was agreed that the sword should be sheathed that the part of Damascus which had surrendered to Abu Obeidah should be immediately entitled to the benefit of his capitulation and that the final decision should be referred to the justice and wisdom of the caliph [41] A large majority of the people accepted the terms of toleration and tribute and Damascus is still peopled by twenty thousand Christians. But the valiant Thomas and the free born patriots who had fought under his banner embraced the alternative of poverty and exile In the adjacent meadow a numerous encampment was formed of priests and laymen of soldiers and citizens of women and children they collected with haste and terror their most precious movables and abandoned with loud lamentations or silent anguish, their native homes and the pleasant banks of the Pharpar The inflexible soul of Chaled was not touched by the spectacle of their distress he disputed with the Damascenes the property of a magazine of corn endeavoured to exclude the garrison from the benefit of the treaty consented with reluctance that each of the fugitives should arm himself with a sword or a lance or a bow and sternly declared that after a respite of three days they might be pursued and treated as the enemies of the Moslems

The passion of a Syrian youth completed the ruin of the exiles of Damascus A nobleman of the city of the name of Jonas [4] was betrothed to a wealthy maiden but her parents delayed the consummation of his nuptials and their daughter was persuaded to escape with the man whom she had chosen They corrupted the nightly watchmen of the gate Keisan the lover who led the way was encompassed by a squadron of Arabs but his exclamation in the Greek tongue the bird is taken admonished his mistress to hasten her return In the presence of Chaled and of death the unfortunate Jonas professed his belief in one God and his apostle Mohammed and continued, till the season of his martyrdom to discharge the duties of a brave and sincere Musulman When the city was taken he flew to the monastery where Eu

cannot hope to escape but you may conquer Syria in a single day The event depends on your discipline and patience Reserve yourselves till the evening It was in the evening that the Prophet was accustomed to vanquish" During two successive engagements his temperate firmness sustained the darts of the enemy and the murmurs of his troops At length, when the spirits and quivers of the adverse line were almost exhausted, Chaled gave the signal of onset and victory The remains of the Imperial army fled to Antioch, or Cæsarea or Damascus and the death of four hundred and seventy Moslems was compensated by the opinion that they had sent to hell above fifty thousand of the infidels The spoil was inestimable many banners and crosses of gold and silver precious stones silver and gold chains and innumerable suits of the richest armour and apparel The general distribution was postponed till Damascus should be taken but the seasonable supply of arms became the instrument of new victories The glorious intelligence was transmitted to the throne of the caliph, and the Arabian tribes, the coldest or most hostile to the prophet's mission, were eager and importunate to share the harvest of Syria

The sad tidings were carried to Damascus by the speed of grief and terror and the inhabitants beheld from their walls the return of the heroes of Aiznadin Amrou led the van at the head of nine thousand horse the bands of the Saracens succeeded each other in formidable review and the rear was closed by Chaled in person, with the standard of the black eagle To the activity of Derar he intrusted the commission of patrolling round the city with two thousand horse, of scouring the plain and of intercepting all succour or intelligence The rest of the Arabian chiefs were fixed in their respective stations before the seven gates of Damascus and the siege was renewed with fresh vigour and confidence The art the labour the military engines of the Greeks and Romans are seldom to be found in the simple though successful, operations of the Saracens it was sufficient for them to invest a city with arms rather than with trenches to repel the sallies of the besieged to attempt a stratagem or an assault, or to expect the progress of famine and discontent Damascus would have acquiesced in the trial of Aiznadin, as a final and peremptory sentence between the emperor and the caliph her courage was rekindled by the example and authority of Thomas a noble Greek, illustrious in a private condition by the alliance of Heraclius [58] The tumult and illumination of the night proclaimed the design of the morning sally and the Christian hero, who affected to despise the enthusiasm of the Arabs, employed the resource of a similar superstition At the principal gate, in the sight of both armies, a lofty crucifix was erected the bishop with his clergy accompanied the march and laid the volume of the New Testament before the image of Jesus and the contending parties were scandalised or edified by a prayer that the Son of God would defend his servants and vindicate his truth The battle raged with incessant fury, and the dexterity of Thomas [59] an incomparable archer, was fatal to the boldest Saracens till their death was revenged by a female heroine The wife of Aban who had followed him to the holy war, embraced her expiring husband Happy said she, happy art thou my dear thou art gone to thy Lord who first joined us together and then parted us asunder I will revenge thy death and endeavour to the utmost of my power to come to the place where thou art, because I love thee Henceforth shall no man ever touch me more for I have dedicated myself to the service of God' Without a groan without a tear she washed the corpse of her husband and buried him with the usual rites Then grasping the manly weapons, which in her native land she was accustomed to wield the intrepid widow of Aban sought the place where his murderer fought in the thickest of the battle Her first arrow pierced the hand of his standard bearer, her second wounded Thomas in the eye and the fainting Christians no longer beheld their ensign or their leader Yet the generous champion of Damascus refused to withdraw to his palace his wound was dressed on the rampart, the fight was continued till the evening and the Syrians rested on their arms In the silence of the night the signal was given by a stroke on the great bell the gates were thrown open and each gate discharged an impetuous column on the sleeping camp of the Saracens Chaled was the first in arms at the head of four hundred horse he flew to the post of danger and the tears trickled down his iron cheeks as he uttered a fervent ejaculation O God who never sleepest look upon thy servants and do not deliver them into the hands of their enemies' The valour and victory of Thomas were arrested by the presence of the Sword of God with the knowledge of the peril the Moslems recovered their ranks and charged the assailants in the flank and rear After the loss of thousands the Christian general retreated with a sigh of despair

and the pursuit of the Saracens was checked by the military engines of the rampart.

A party of a hundred Arabs had opened the eastern gate to a more inexorable foe No quarter cried the rapacious and sanguinary Chaled no quarter to the enemies of the Lord his trumpets sounded and a torrent of Christian blood was poured down the streets of Damascus When he reached the church of St. Mary he was astonished and provoked by the peaceful aspect of his companions their swords were in the scabbard and they were surrounded by a mu titude of priests and monks Abu Obeidah saluted the gen ral God said h has delivered the city into my hands by way of surrender and has saved the believers the trouble of fighting And am I not, replied the indignant Chaled, am I not the lieutenant of the commander of the faithful? Have I not taken the city by storm? The unbelievers shall perish by the sword Fall on The hungry and cruel Arabs would have obeyed the welcome command and Damascus was lost if the benevolence of Abu Obeidah had not been supported by a decent and dignified firmness Throwing himself between the trembling citizens and the most eager of the barbarians he adjured them by the holy name of God to respect his promise to suspend their fury and to wait the determination of their chiefs The chiefs retired into the church of St Mary and after a vehement debate Chaled submitted in some measure to the reason and authority of his colleague who urged the sanctity of a covenant the advantage as well as the honour which the Moslems would derive from the punctual performance of their word and the obstinate resistance which they must encounter from the distrust and despair of the rest of the Syrian cities It was agreed that the sword should be sheathed that the part of Damascus which had surrendered to Abu Obeidah should be immediately entitled to the benefit of his capitulation and that the final decision should be referred to the justice and wisdom of the caliph[81] A large majority of the people accepted the terms of toleration and tribute and Damascus is still peopled by twenty thousand Christians But the valiant Thomas and the free born patriots who had fought under his banner embraced the alternative of poverty and exile In the adjacent meadow a numerous encampment was formed of priests and laymen of soldiers and citizens of women and children they collected with haste and terror their most precious movables and abandoned with loud lamentations or silent anguish their native homes and the pleasant banks of the Pharpar The inflexible soul of Chaled was not touched by the spectacle of their distress he dispu ed with the Damascenes the property of a magazine of corn endeavoured to exclude the garrison from the benefit of the treaty consented, with reluctance that each of the fugitives should arm himself with a sword or a lance or a bow and sternly declared that after a respite of three days they might be pursued and treated as the enemies of the Moslems.

The passion of a Syrian youth completed the ruin of the exiles of Damascus A nobleman of the city of the name of Jonas[82] was betrothed to a wealthy maiden but her parents delayed the consummation of his nuptials and their daughter was persuaded to escape with the man whom she had chosen They corrupted the nightly watchmen of the gate Keisan the lover who led the way was encompassed by a squadron of Arabs but his exclamation in the Greek tongue the bird is taken admonished his mistress to hasten her return In the presence of Chaled and of death the unfortunate Jonas professed his belief in one God and his apostle Mohammed and continued till the season of his martyrdom to discharge the duties of a brave and sincere Musulman When the city was taken he flew to the monastery where Eu

docia had taken refuge, but the lover was forgotten, the apostate was scorned, she preferred her religion to her country and the justice of Chaled though deaf to mercy refused to detain by force a male or female inhabitant of Damascus Four days was the general confined to the city by the obligation of the treaty and the urgent cares of his new conquest His appetite for blood and rapine would have been extinguished by the hopeless computation of time and distance but he listened to the importunities of Jonas who assured him that the weary fugitives might yet be overtaken At the head of four thousand horse, in the disguise of Christian Arabs Chaled undertook the pursuit. They halted only for the moments of prayer, and their guide had a perfect knowledge of the country For a long way the footsteps of the Damascenes were plain and conspicuous they vanished on a sudden but the Saracens were comforted by the assurance that the caravan had turned aside into the mountains, and must speedily fall into their hands In traversing the ridges of the Libanus they endured intolerable hardships and the sinking spirits of the veteran fanatics were supported and cheered by the unconquerable ardour of a lover From a peasant of the country they were informed that the emperor had sent orders to the colony of exiles to pursue without delay the road of the sea coast and of Constantinople apprehensive, perhaps that the soldiers and people of Antioch might be discouraged by the sight and the story of their sufferings The Saracens were conducted through the territories of Gabala[63] and Laodicea at a cautious distance from the walls of the cities the rain was incessant the night was dark a single mountain separated them from the Roman army and Chaled, ever anxious for the safety of his brethren, whispered an ominous dream in the ear of his companion With the dawn of day the prospect again cleared and they saw before them in a pleasant valley the tents of Damascus After a short interval of repose and prayer Chaled divided his cavalry into four squadrons committing the first to his faithful Derar, and reserving the last for himself They successively rushed on the promiscuous multitude insufficiently provided with arms and already vanquished by sorrow and fatigue Except a captive, who was pardoned and dismissed the Arabs enjoyed the satisfaction of believing that not a Christian of either sex escaped the edge of their scimitars The gold and silver of Damascus was scattered over the camp and a royal wardrobe of three hundred load of silk might clothe an army of naked barbarians In the tumult of the battle Jonas sought and found the object of his pursuit but her resentment was inflamed by the last act of his perfidy and as Eudocia struggled in his hateful embraces, she struck a dagger to her heart. Another female the widow of Thomas and the real or supposed daughter of Heraclius was spared and released without a ransom, but the generosity of Chaled was the effect of his contempt and the haughty Saracen insulted by a message of defiance the throne of the Cæsars. Chaled had penetrated above a hundred and fifty miles into the heart of the Roman province he returned to Damascus with the same secrecy and speed On the accession of Omar the Sword of God was removed from the command but the caliph who blamed the rashness was compelled to applaud the vigour and conduct of the enterprise

Another expedition of the conquerors of Damascus will equally display their avidity and their contempt for the riches of the present world They were informed that the produce and manufactures of the country were annually collected in the fair of Abyla[64] about thirty miles from the city that the cell of a devout hermit was visited at the same time by a multitude of pilgrims and that the festival of trade and superstition would be ennobled by the nuptials of the daughter of the governor of Tripoli Abdallah the son of Jaafar a glorious and holy martyr undertook with a banner of five hundred horse the pious and profitable commission of despoiling the infidels As he approached the fair of Abyla he was astonished by the report of the mighty concourse of Jews and Christians, Greeks and Armenians of natives of Syria and of strangers of Egypt to the number of ten thousand, besides a guard of five thousand horse that attended the person of the bride The Saracens paused For my own part said Abdallah I dare not go back our foes are many our danger is great but our reward is splendid and secure either in this life or in the life to come Let every man according to his inclination advance or retire ' Not a Musulman deserted his standard Lead the way said Abdallah to his Christian guide, 'and you shall see what the companions of the prophet can perform They charged in five squadrons but after the first advantage of the surprise they were encompassed and almost overwhelmed by the multitude of their enemies and their valiant band is fancifully compared to a white spot in the skin of a black camel[65] About the hour of sunset when their weapons dropped from their hands when they panted on the verge of eternity they discovered an approaching cloud of dust they heard the welcome sound of the tecbir,[44] and they soon perceived the standard of Chaled who flew to their relief with the utmost speed of his cavalry The Christians were broken by his attack and slaughtered in their flight as far as the river of Tripoli They left behind them the various riches of the fair the merchandises that were exposed for sale the money that was brought for purchase the gay decorations of the nuptials, and the governor's daughter with forty of her female attendants. The fruits provisions, and furniture the money plate and jewels were diligently laden on the backs of horses asses and mules and the holy robbers returned in triumph to Damascus The hermit, after a short and angry controversy with Chaled declined the crown of martyrdom, and was left alive in the solitary scene of blood and devastation.

Syria[45] one of the countries that have been improved by the most early cultivation is not unworthy of the preference[46] The heat of the climate is tempered by the vicinity of the sea and mountains by the plenty of wood and water and the produce of a fertile soil affords the subsistence and encourages the propagation of men and animals. From the age of David to that of Heraclius, the country was overspread with ancient and flourishing cities the inhabitants were numerous and wealthy and after the slow ravage of despotism and superstition after the recent calamities of the Persian war Syria could still attract and reward the rapacious tribes of the desert A plain of ten days journey from Damascus to Aleppo and Antioch is watered on the western side by the winding course of the Orontes. The hills of Libanus and Anti Libanus are planted from north to south, between the Orontes and the Mediterranean and the epithet of hollow (Coelesyria) was applied to a long and fruitful valley which is confined in the same direction by the two ridges of snowy mountains[47] Among the cities which are enumerated by Greek and Oriental names in the geography and conquest of Syria we may distinguish Emesa or Hems, Heliopolis or Baalbec, the former as the metropolis of the plain the latter as the capital of the valley Under the last of the Cæsars they were strong and populous the turrets glittered from afar an ample space was covered with public and private buildings and the citizens were illustrious by their spirit, or at least by their pride by their riches or at least by their luxury In the days of paganism both Emesa and Heliopolis were addicted to the worship of Baal or the sun but the decline of their superstition and splendour has been marked by a singular variety of fortune Not a vestige remains of the temple of Emesa which was equalled in poetic style to the summits of Mount Libanus,[48] while the ruins of Baalbec, invisible to the writers of antiquity excite the curiosity and wonder of the European traveller[49] The measure of the temple is two hundred feet in length and one hundred in breadth the front is adorned with a double portico of eight columns fourteen may be counted on either side and each column forty five feet in height is composed of three massy blocks of stone or marble The proportions and ornaments of the Corinthian order express the architecture of the Greeks but as Baalbec has never been the seat of a monarch we are at a loss to conceive how the expense of these magnificent structures could be supplied by private or municipal liberality[50] From the conquest of Damascus the Saracens proceeded to Heliopolis and Emesa but I shall decline the repetition of the sallies and combats which have been already shown on a larger scale. In the prosecution of the war their policy was not less effectual than their sword. By short and separate truces they dissolved the union of the enemy accustomed the Syrians to compare their friendship with their enmity familiarised the idea of their language religion and manners and exhausted by clandestine purchase, the magazines and arsenals of the cities which they returned to besiege They aggravated the ransom of the more wealthy or the more obstinate and Chalcis alone was taxed at five thousand ounces of gold five thousand ounces of silver two thousand robes of silk, and as many figs and olives as would load five thousand asses But the terms of truce or capitulation were faithfully observed and the lieutenant of the caliph who had promised not to enter the walls of the captive Baalbec remained tranquil and immovable in his tent till the jarring factions solicited the interposition of a foreign master The conquest of the plain and valley of Syria was achieved in less than two years Yet the commander of the faithful reproved the slowness of their progress and the Saracens bewailing their fault with tears of rage and repentance called aloud on their chiefs to lead them forth to fight the battles of the Lord In a recent action under the walls of Emesa an Arabian youth, the cousin of Chaled was heard aloud to exclaim 'Methinks I see the black eyed girls looking upon me one of whom should she appear in this world, all mankind would die for love of her And I see in the hand of one of them a handkerchief of green silk and a cap of precious stones and she beckons me and calls out Come hither quickly, for I love thee ' With these words charging the Christians he made havoc wherever he went, till, observed at length by the governor of Hems, he was struck through with a javelin

It was incumbent on the Saracens to exert the full powers of their valour and enthusiasm against the forces of the emperor who was taught by repeated losses that the rovers of the desert had undertaken and would speedily achieve a regular and permanent conquest From the provinces of Europe and Asia four score thousand soldiers were transported by sea and land to Antioch and Cæsarea the light troops of the army consisted of sixty thousand Christian Arabs of the tribe of Gassan Under the banner of Jabalah the last of their princes they marched in the van and it was a maxim of the Greeks that for the purpose of cutting diamond, a diamond was the most effectual Heraclius withheld his person from the dangers of the field, but his presumption, or perhaps his despondency, suggested a peremptory order that the fate of the province and the war should be decided by a single battle The Syrians were attached to the standard of Rome and of the cross but the noble the citizen the peasant were exasperated by the injustice and cruelty of a licentious host who oppressed them as subjects and despised them as strangers and aliens [73] A report of these mighty preparations was conveyed to the Saracens in their camp of Emesa, and the chiefs though resolved to fight assembled a council the faith of Abu Obeidah would have expected on the same spot the glory of martyrdom the wisdom of Chaled advised an honourable retreat to the skirts of Palestine and Arabia where they might await the succours of their friends and the attack of the unbelievers A speedy messenger soon returned from the throne of Medina with the blessings of Omar and Ali the prayers of the widows of the prophet and a reinforcement of eight thousand Moslems In their way they overturned a detachment of Greeks and when they joined at Yermuk the camp of their brethren they found the pleasing intelligence that Chaled had already defeated and scattered the Christian Arabs of the tribe of Gassan In the neighbourhood of Bosra, the springs of Mount Hermon descend in a torrent to the plain of Decapolis or ten cities and the Hieromax, a name which has been corrupted to Yermuk is lost after a short course in the lake of Tiberias [74] The banks of this obscure stream were illustrated by a long and bloody encounter On this momentous occasion the public voice and the modesty of Abu Obeidah restored the command to the most deserving of the Moslems Chaled assumed his station in the front, his colleague was posted in the rear, that the disorder of the fugitives might be checked by his venerable aspect and the sight of the yellow banner which Mohammed had displayed before the walls of Chaibar The last line was occupied by the sister of Derar, with the Arabian women who had enlisted in this holy war, who were accustomed to wield the bow and the lance, and who in a moment of captivity had defended against the uncircumcised ravishers, their chastity and religion [75] The exhortation of the generals was brief and forcible 'Paradise is before you the devil and hell fire in your rear Yet such was the weight of the Roman cavalry that the right wing of the Arabs was broken and separated from the main body Thrice did they retreat in disorder and thrice were they driven back to the charge by the reproaches and blows of the women In the intervals of action Abu Obeidah visited the tents of his brethren prolonged their repose by repeating at once the prayers of two different hours bound up their wounds with his own hands and administered the comfortable reflection that the infidels partook of their sufferings without partaking of their reward Four thousand and thirty of the Moslems were buried in the field of battle and the skill of the Armenian archers enabled seven hundred to boast that they had lost an eye in that meritorious service The veterans of the Syrian war acknowledged that it was the hardest and most doubtful of the days which they had seen But it was likewise the most decisive many thousands of the Greeks and Syrians fell by the swords of the Arabs many were slaughtered after the defeat in the woods and mountains many by mistaking the ford were drowned in the waters of the Yermuk and however the loss may be magnified [76] the Christian writers confess and bewail the bloody punishment of their sins [77] Manuel the Roman general was either killed at Damascus or took refuge in the monastery of Mount Sinai An exile in the Byzantine court Jabalah lamented the manners of Arabia and his unlucky preference of the Christian

cause.[78] He had once inclined to the profession of Islam but in the pilgrimage of Mecca Jabalah was provoked to strike one of his brethren and fled with amazement from the stern and equal justice of the caliph The victorious Saracens enjoyed at Damascus a month of pleasure and repose the spoil was divided by the discretion of Abu Obeidah an equal share was allotted to a soldier and to his horse and a double portion was reserved for the noble coursers of the Arabian breed

After the battle of Yermuk the Roman army no longer appeared in the field and the Saracens might securely choose among the fortified towns of Syria the first object of their attack. They consulted the caliph whether they should march to Cæsarea or Jerusalem and the advice of Ali determined the immediate siege of the latter To a profane eye Jerusalem was the first or second capital of Palestine but after Mecca and Medina it was revered and visited by the devout Moslems as the temple of the Holy Land which had been sanctified by the revelation of Moses of Jesus and of Mohammed himself The son of Abu Sophian was sent with five thousand Arabs to try the first experiment of surprise or treaty but on the eleventh day the town was invested by the whole force of Abu Obeidah. He addressed the customary summons to the chief commanders and people of Ælia[79]

Health and happiness to every one that follows the right way! We require of you to testify that there is but one God and that Mohammed is his apostle If you refuse this consent to pay tribute and be under us forthwith Otherwise I shall bring men against you who love death better than you do the drinking of wine or eating hog's flesh Nor will I ever stir from you if it please God till I have destroyed those that fight for you and made slaves of your children.

But the city was defended on every side by deep valleys and steep ascents since the invasion of Syria the walls and towers had been anxiously restored the bravest of the fugitives of Yermuk had stopped in the nearest place of refuge and in the defence of the sepulchre of Christ the natives and strangers might feel some sparks of the enthusiasm which so fiercely glowed in the bosoms of the Saracens The siege of Jerusalem lasted four months not a day was lost without some action of sally or assault the military engines incessantly played from the ramparts and the inclemency of the winter was still more painful and destructive to the Arabs The Christians yielded at length to the perseverance of the besiegers. The patriarch Sophronius appeared on the walls and by the voice of an interpreter demanded a conference After a vain attempt to dissuade the lieutenant of the caliph from his impious enterprise he proposed in the name of the people a fair capitulation with this extraordinary clause that the articles of security should be ratified by the authority and presence of Omar himself The question was debated in the council of Medina the sanctity of the place and the advice of Ali persuaded the caliph to gratify the wishes of his soldiers and enemies and the simplicity of his journey is more illustrious than the royal pageants of vanity and oppression The conqueror of Persia and Syria was mounted on a red camel which carried besides his person a bag of corn a bag of dates a wooden dish and a leathern bottle of water Wherever he halted the company without distinction was invited to partake of his homely fare and the repast was consecrated by the prayer and exhortation of the commander of the faithful[80] But in this expedition or pilgrimage his power was exercised in the administration of justice he reformed the licentious polygamy of the Arabs relieved the tributaries from extortion and cruelty and chastised the luxury of the Saracens by despoiling them of their rich silks, and dragging them on their faces in the dirt When he came within sight of Jerusalem the caliph cried with a loud voice

God is victorious O Lord give us an easy conquest! and pitching his tent of coarse hair calmly seated himself on the ground After signing the capitulation he entered the city without fear or precaution and courteously discoursed with the patriarch concerning its religious antiquities[81] Sophronius bowed before his new master and secretly muttered, in the words of Daniel The abomination of desolation is in the holy place[82] At the hour of prayer they stood together in the church of the Resurrection but the caliph refused to perform his devotions and contented himself with praying on the steps of the church of Constantine To the patriarch he disclosed his prudent and honourable motive Had I yielded said Omar to your request, the Moslems of a future age would have infringed the treaty under colour of imitating my example By his command the ground of the temple of Solomon was prepared for the foundation of a mosch[83] and during a residence of ten days he regulated the present and future state of his Syrian conquests Medina might be jealous lest the caliph should be detained by the sanctity of Jerusalem or the beauty of Damascus her apprehensions were

To achieve what yet remained of the Syrian war the caliph had formed two separate armies, a chosen detachment under Amrou and Yezid was left in the camp of Palestine while the larger division under the standard of Abu Obeidah and Chaled, marched away to the north against Antioch and Aleppo The latter of these the Berœa of the Greeks was not yet illustrious as the capital of a province or a kingdom and the inhabitants by anticipating their submission and pleading their poverty, obtained a moderate composition for their lives and religion But the castle of Aleppo [85] distinct from the city stood erect on a lofty artificial mound the sides were sharpened to a precipice, and faced with freestone and the breadth of the ditch might be filled with water from the neighbouring springs After the loss of three thousand men the garrison was still equal to the defence and Youkinna, their valiant and hereditary chief had murdered his brother a holy monk for daring to pronounce the name of peace In a siege of four or five months the hardest of the Syrian war great numbers of the Saracens were killed and wounded their removal to the distance of a mile could not seduce the vigilance of Youkinna, nor could the Christians be terrified by the execution of three hundred captives whom they beheaded before the castle wall The silence and at length the complaints of Abu Obeidah informed the caliph that their hope and patience were consumed at the foot of this impregnable fortress I am variously affected ' replied Omar, by the difference of your success but I charge you by no means to raise the siege of the castle Your retreat would diminish the reputation of our arms and encourage the infidels to fall upon you on all sides Remain before Aleppo till God shall determine the event and forage with your horse round the adjacent country The exhortation of the commander of the faithful was fortified by a supply of volunteers from all the tribes of Arabia who arrived in the camp on horses or camels Among these was Dames of a servile birth but of gigantic size and intrepid resolution The forty seventh day of his service he proposed with only thirty men to make an attempt on the castle The experience and testimony of Chaled recommended his offer and Abu Obeidah admonished his brethren not to despise the baser origin of Dames since he himself could he relinquish the public care would cheerfully serve under the banner of the slave His design was covered by the appearance of a retreat and the camp of the Saracens was pitched about a league from Aleppo The thirty adventurers lay in ambush at the foot of the hill and Dames at length succeeded in his inquiries, though he was provoked by the ignorance of his Greek captives ' God curse these dogs " said the illiterate Arab what a strange barbarous language they speak ! At the darkest hour of the night he scaled the most accessible height which he had diligently surveyed a place where the stones were less entire or the slope less perpendicular, or the guard less vigilant Seven of the stoutest Saracens mounted on each other's shoulders and the weight of the column was sustained on the broad and sinewy back of the gigantic slave The foremost in this painful ascent could grasp and climb the lowest part of the battlements they silently stabbed and cast down the sentinels and the thirty brethren repeating a pious ejaculation O apostle of God help and deliver us ! were successively drawn up by the long folds of their turbans With bold and cautious footsteps Dames explored the palace of the governor, who celebrated in riotous merriment, the festival of his deliverance From thence returning to his companions he assaulted on the inside the entrance of the castle They overpowered the guard unbolted the gate let down the drawbridge and defended the narrow pass till the arrival of Chaled with the dawn of day relieved their danger and assured their conquest. Youkinna a formidable foe became an active and useful proselyte and the general of the Saracens expressed his regard for the most humble merit by detaining the army at Aleppo till Dames was cured of his honourable wounds. The capital of Syria was still covered by the castle of Aazaz and the iron bridge of the Orontes After the loss of those important posts, and the defeat of the last of the Roman armies the luxury of Antioch [86] trembled and obeyed Her safety was ransomed with three hundred thousand pieces of gold but the throne of the successors of Alexander the seat of the Roman government in the East which had been decorated by Cæsar with the titles of free and holy, and inviolate was degraded under the yoke of the caliphs to the secondary rank of a provincial town [87]

In the life of Heraclius the glories of the Persian war are clouded on either hand by the disgrace and weakness of his more early and his later days When the successors of Mohammed unsheathed the sword of war and religion he was astonished at the boundless prospect of toil and danger his nature was indolent nor could the infirm and frigid age of the emperor be kindled to a second effort. The sense of shame and the importunities of the Syrians prevented his hasty departure from the scene of action but the hero was no more and the loss of Damascus and Jerusalem, the bloody fields of Aiznadin and Yermuk may be imputed in some degree to the absence or misconduct of the sovereign. Instead of defending the sepulchre of Christ he involved the church and state in a metaphysical controversy for the unity of his will and while Heraclius crowned the offspring of his second nuptials he was tamely stripped of the most valuable part of their inheritance In the cathedral of Antioch in the presence of the bishops, at the foot of the crucifix he bewailed the sins of the prince and people but his confession instructed the world that it was vain and perhaps impious to resist the judgment of God. The Saracens were invincible in fact since they were invincible in opinion and the desertion of Youkinna his false repentance and repeated perfidy might justify the suspicion of the emperor that he was encompassed by traitors and apostates who conspired to betray his person and their country to the enemies of Christ. In the hour of adversity his superstition was agitated by the omens and dreams of a falling crown and after bidding an eternal farewell to Syria he secretly embarked with a few attendants and absolved the faith of his subjects[88] Constantine his eldest son had been stationed with forty thousand men at Cæsarea the civil metropolis of the three provinces of Palestine. But his private interest recalled him to the Byzantine court and after the flight of his father he felt himself an unequal champion to the united force of the caliph His vanguard was boldly attacked by three hundred Arabs and a thousand black slaves who in the depth of winter had climbed the snowy mountains of Libanus and who were speedily followed by the victorious squadrons of Chaled himself From the north and south the troops of Antioch and Jerusalem advanced along the sea shore till their banners were joined under the walls of the Phœnician cities Tripoli and Tyre were betrayed and a fleet of fifty transports which entered without distrust the captive harbours, brought a seasonable supply of arms and provisions to the camp of the Saracens Their labours were terminated by the unexpected surrender of Cæsarea the Roman prince had embarked in the night[89] and the defenceless citizens solicited their pardon with an offering of two hundred thousand pieces of gold The remainder of the province Ramlah Ptolemais or Acre Sichem or Neapolis, Gaza, Ascalon Berytus, Sidon Gabala Laodicea Apamea Hierapolis, no longer presumed to dispute the will of the conqueror and Syria bowed under the sceptre of the caliphs seven hundred years after Pompey had despoiled the last of the Macedonian kings[90]

The sieges and battles of six campaigns had consumed many thousands of the Moslems. They died with the reputation and the cheerfulness of martyrs and the simplicity of their faith may be expressed in the words of an Arabian youth when he embraced for the last time his sister and mother It is not, said he, the delicacies of Syria, or the fading delights of this world that have prompted me to devote my life in the cause of religion But I seek the favour of God and his apostles and I have heard from one of the companions of the prophet, that the spirits of the martyrs will be lodged in the crops of green birds who shall taste the fruits and drink of the rivers of paradise Farewell we shall meet again among the groves and fountains which God has provided for his elect. The faithful captives might exercise a passive and more arduous resolution and a cousin of Mohammed is celebrated for refusing after an absunence of three days, the wine and pork, the only nourishment that was allowed by the malice of the infidels The frailty of some weaker brethren exasperated the implacable spirit of fanaticism and the father of Amer deplored in pathetic strains, the apostasy and damnation of a son who had renounced the promises of God and the intercession of the prophet to occupy with the priests and deacons the lowest mansions of hell The more fortunate Arabs who survived the war and persevered in the faith were restrained by their abstemious leader from the abuse of prosperity After a refreshment of three days Abu Obeidah withdrew his troops from the pernicious contagion of the luxury of Antioch, and assured the caliph that their religion and virtue could only be preserved by the hard discipline of poverty and labour But the virtue of Omar however rigorous to himself was kind and liberal to his brethren After a just tribute of praise and thanksgiving he dropped a tear of compassion and sitting down on the ground wrote an answer in which he mildly censured the severity of his lieutenant God said the successor of the prophet, has not forbidden the use of the good things of this world to faithful men and such as have per formed good works Therefore you ought to have given them leave to rest themselves and partake freely of those good things which the country affordeth If any of the Saracens have no family in Arabia they may marry in Syria, and whosoever of them wants any female slaves he may purchase as many as he hath occasion for' The conquerors prepared to use or to abuse this gracious permission but the year of their triumph was marked by a mortality of men and cattle, and twenty five thousand Sara cens were snatched away from the possession of Syria The death of Abu Obeidah might be lamented by the Christians but his brethren recollected that he was one of the ten elect whom the prophet had named as the heirs of paradise[91] Chaled survived his brethren about three years, and the tomb of the Sword of God is shown in the neighbourhood of Emesa His valour which founded in Arabia and Syria the empire of the caliphs was fortified by the opin ion of a special providence and as long as he wore a cap which had been blessed by Moham med he deemed himself invulnerable amidst the darts of the infidels

The place of the first conquerors was supplied by a new generation of their children and coun trymen Syria became the seat and support of the house of Ommiyah and the revenue the soldiers the ships of that powerful kingdom were consecrated to enlarge on every side the empire of the caliphs But the Saracens despise a superfluity of fame and their historians scarcely condescend to mention the subordinate con quests which are lost in the splendour and ra pidity of their victorious career To the north of Syria they passed Mount Taurus and reduced to their obedience the province of Cilicia, with its capital Tarsus the ancient monument of the Assyrian kings Beyond a second ridge of the same mountains they spread the flame of war, rather than the light of religion as far as the shores of the Euxine and the neighbourhood of Constantinople To the east they advanced to the banks and sources of the Euphrates and Tigris[92] the long-disputed barrier of Rome and Persia was for ever confounded, the walls of Edessa and Amida of Dara and Nisibis which had resisted the arms and engines of Sapor or Nushirvan were levelled in the dust, and the holy city of Abgarus might vainly produce the epistle or the image of Christ to an unbelieving conqueror To the west the Syrian kingdom is bounded by the sea and the ruin of Aradus a small island or peninsula on the coast was post poned during ten years But the hills of Libanus abounded in timber, the trade of Phœnicia was populous in mariners and a fleet of seventeen hundred barks was equipped and manned by the natives of the desert. The Imperial navy of the Romans fled before them from the Pamphylian rocks to the Hellespont but the spirit of the emperor a grandson of Heraclius had been subdued before the combat by a dream and a pun[93] The Saracens rode masters of the sea and the islands of Cyprus Rhodes and the Cyclades were successively exposed to their ra pacious visits Three hundred years before the Christian era the memorable though fruitless siege of Rhodes[94] by Demetrius had furnished that maritime republic with the materials and the subject of a trophy A gigantic statue of Apollo, or the sun seventy cubits in height was erected at the entrance of the harbour, a mon ument of the freedom and the arts of Greece After standing fifty six years the colossus of Rhodes was overthrown by an earthquake, but the massy trunk and huge fragments lay scat tered eight centuries on the ground and are often described as one of the wonders of the ancient world They were collected by the dili gence of the Saracens and sold to a Jewish merchant of Edessa who is said to have laden nine hundred camels with the weight of the brass metal an enormous weight though we should include the hundred colossal figures[95] and the three thousand statues which adorned the prosperity of the city of the sun

III The conquest of Egypt may be explained by the character of the victorious Saracen one of the first of his nation, in an age when the meanest of the brethren was exalted above his nature by the spirit of enthusiasm The birth of Amrou was at once base and illustrious his mother a notorious prostitute was unable to decide among the five of the Koreish but the proof of resemblance adjudged the child to Aasi the oldest of her lovers[96] The youth of Amrou was impelled by the passions and prejudices of his kindred his poetic genius was exercised in satirical verses against the person and doctrine of Mohammed his dexterity was employed by the reigning faction to pursue the religious exiles who had taken refuge in the court of the Æthiopian king[97] Yet he returned from this embassy a secret proselyte his reason or his in terest determined him to renounce the worship of idols he escaped from Mecca with his friend Chaled and the prophet of Medina enjoyed at the same moment the satisfaction of embracing the two firmest champions of his cause The im patience of Amrou to lead the armies of the faithful was checked by the reproof of Omar who advised him not to seek power and dominion, since he who is a subject to-day may be a prince to-morrow Yet his merit was not overlooked by the two first successors of Mohammed they were indebted to his arms for the conquest of Palestine and in all the battles and sieges of Syria he united with the temper of a chief the valour of an adventurous soldier In a visit to Medina the caliph expressed a wish to survey the sword which had cut down so many Christian warriors the son of Aasi unsheathed a short and ordinary scimitar and as he perceived the surprise of Omar Alas said the modest Saracen the sword itself without the arm of its master is neither sharper nor more weighty than the sword of Pharezdak the poet. After the conquest of Egypt he was recalled by the jealousy of the caliph Othman but in the subsequent troubles the ambition of a soldier a statesman and an orator emerged from a private station. His powerful support, both in council and in the field, established the throne of the Ommiades the administration and revenue of Egypt were restored by the gratitude of Moawiyah to a faithful friend who had raised himself above the rank of a subject and Amrou ended his days in the palace and city which he had founded on the banks of the Nile His dying speech to his children is celebrated by the Arabians as a model of eloquence and wisdom he deplored the errors of his youth but if the penitent was still infected by the vanity of a poet, he might exaggerate the venom and mischief of his impious compositions [99]

From his camp in Palestine Amrou had surprised or anticipated the caliph's leave for the invasion of Egypt.[100] The magnanimous Omar trusted in his God and his sword which had shaken the thrones of Chosroes and Cæsar but when he compared the slender force of the Moslems with the greatness of the enterprise, he condemned his own rashness and listened to his timid companions The pride and the greatness of Pharaoh were familiar to the readers of the Koran and a tenfold repetition of prodigies had been scarcely sufficient to effect, not the victory but the flight of six hundred thousand of the children of Israel the cities of Egypt were many and populous their architecture was strong and solid the Nile with its numerous branches was alone an insuperable barrier and the granary of the Imperial city would be obstinately defended by the Roman powers In this perplexity the commander of the faithful resigned himself to the decision of chance or in his opinion of Providence At the head of only four thousand Arabs the intrepid Amrou had marched away from his station of Gaza when he was overtaken by the messenger of Omar If you are still in Syria said the ambiguous mandate retreat without delay but if at the receipt of this epistle you have already reached the frontiers of Egypt, advance with confidence and depend on the succour of God and of your brethren The experience perhaps the secret intelligence of Amrou had taught him to suspect the mutability of courts and he continued his march till his tents were unquestionably pitched on Egyptian ground He there assembled his officers broke the seal perused the epistle gravely inquired the name and situation of the place and declared his ready obedience to the commands of the caliph After a siege of thirty days he took possession of Farmah or Pelusium and that key of Egypt as it has been justly named unlocked the entrance of the country as far as the ruins of Heliopolis and the neighbourhood of the modern Cairo

On the western side of the Nile at a small distance to the east of the Pyramids, at a small distance to the south of the Delta Memphis one hundred and fifty furlongs in circumference displayed the magnificence of ancient kings. Under the reign of the Ptolemies and Cæsars, the seat of government was removed to the sea coast the ancient capital was eclipsed by the arts and opulence of Alexandria the palaces, and at length the temples were reduced to a desolate and ruinous condition yet in the age of Augustus and even in that of Constantine Memphis was still numbered among the greatest and most populous of the provincial cities [101] The banks of the Nile in this place of the breadth of three thousand feet were united by two bridges of sixty and of thirty boats connected in the middle stream by the small island of Rouda which was covered with gardens and habitations [102] The eastern extremity of the bridge was terminated by the town of Babylon and the camp of a Roman legion which protected the passage of the river and the second capital of Egypt This important fortress which might fairly be described as a part of Memphis or Misrah was invested by the arms of the lieutenant of Omar a reinforcement of four thousand Saracens soon arrived in his camp and the military engines which battered the walls may be imputed to the art and labour of his Syrian allies Yet the siege was protracted to seven months and the rash invaders were en compassed and threatened by the inundation of the Nile [103] Their last assault was bold and successful they passed the ditch which had been fortified with iron spikes applied their scaling ladders entered the fortress with the shout of 'God is victorious! and drove the remnant of the Greeks to their boats and the isle of Rouda The spot was afterwards recommended to the conqueror by the easy communication with the gulf and the peninsula of Arabia the remains of Memphis were deserted the tents of the Arabs were converted into permanent habitations and the first mosch was blessed by the presence of fourscore companions of Mohammed [104] A new city arose in their camp on the eastward bank of the Nile and the contiguous quarters of Babylon and Fostat are confounded in their present decay by the appellation of Old Misrah or Cairo of which they form an extensive suburb But the name of Cairo the town of victory, more strictly belongs to the modern capital which was founded in the tenth century by the Fatimite caliphs [105] It has gradually receded from the river but the continuity of buildings may be traced by an attentive eye from the monuments of Sesostris to those of Saladin [106]

Yet the Arabs after a glorious and profitable enterprise, must have retreated to the desert, had they not found a powerful alliance in the heart of the country The rapid conquest of Alexander was assisted by the superstition and revolt of the natives they abhorred their Persian oppressors, the disciples of the Magi who had burnt the temples of Egypt, and feasted with sacrilegious appetite on the flesh of the god Apis [107] After a period of ten centuries the same revolution was renewed by a similar cause and in the support of an incomprehensible creed the zeal of the Coptic Christians was equally ardent I have already explained the origin and progress of the Monophysite controversy and the persecution of the emperors which converted a sect into a nation and alienated Egypt from their religion and government The Saracens were received as the deliverers of the Jacobite church and a secret and effectual treaty was opened during the siege of Memphis between a victorious army and a people of slaves A rich and noble Egyptian of the name of Mokawkas had dissembled his faith to obtain the administration of his province in the disorders of the Persian war he aspired to independence the embassy of Mohammed ranked him among princes but he declined with rich gifts and ambiguous compliments the proposal of a new religion [108] The abuse of his trust exposed him to the resentment of Heraclius his submission was delayed by arrogance and fear and his conscience was prompted by interest to throw himself on the favour of the nation and the support of the Saracens In his first conference with Amrou he heard without indignation the usual option of the Koran, the tribute or the sword 'The Greeks" replied Mokawkas 'are determined to abide the determination of the sword, but with the Greeks I desire no communion, either in this world or in the next, and I abjure for ever the Byzantine tyrant, his synod of Chalcedon, and his Melchite slaves For myself and my brethren we are resolved to live and die in the profession of the gospel and unity of Christ. It is impossible for us to embrace the revelations of your prophet but we are desirous of peace, and cheerfully submit to pay tribute and obedience to his temporal successors' The tribute was ascertained at two pieces of gold for the head of every Christian but old men monks, women and children of both sexes under sixteen years of age were exempted from this personal assessment the Copts above and below Memphis swore allegiance to the caliph and promised an hospitable entertainment of three days to every Musulman who should travel through their country By this charter of security the ecclesiastical and civil tyranny of the Melchites was destroyed [109] the anathemas of St Cyril were thundered from every pulpit, and the sacred edifices with the patrimony of the church were restored to the national communion of the Jacobites who enjoyed without moderation the moment of triumph and revenge At the pressing summons of Amrou their patriarch Benjamin emerged from his desert and, after the first interview the courteous Arab affected to declare that he had never conversed with a Christian priest of more innocent manners and a more venerable aspect [110] In the march from Memphis to Alexandria the lieutenant of Omar intrusted his safety to the zeal and gratitude of the Egyptians the roads and bridges were diligently repaired and in every step of his progress he could depend on a constant supply of provisions and intelligence The Greeks of Egypt whose numbers could scarcely equal a tenth of the natives were overwhelmed by the universal defection they had ever been hated they were no longer feared the magistrate fled from his tribunal the bishop from his altar and the distant garrisons were surprised or starved by the surrounding multitudes Had not the Nile afforded a safe and ready conveyance to the sea, not an individual could have escaped who by birth or language or office or religion was connected with their odious name

By the retreat of the Greeks from the provinces of Upper Egypt a considerable force was collected in the island of Delta the natural and artificial channels of the Nile afforded a succession of strong and defensible posts and the road to Alexandria was laboriously cleared by the victory of the Saracens in two-and twenty days of general or partial combat. In their annals of conquest the siege of Alexandria[111] is perhaps the most arduous and important enterprise. The first trading city in the world was abundantly replenished with the means of subsistence and defence Her numerous inhabitants fought for the dearest of human rights religion and property and the enmity of the natives seemed to exclude them from the common benefit of peace and toleration The sea was continually open and if Heraclius had been awake to the public distress fresh armies of Romans and barbarians might have been poured into the harbour to save the second capital of the empire. A circumference of ten miles would have scattered the forces of the Greeks, and favoured the stratagems of an active enemy but the two sides of an oblong square were covered by the sea and the lake Maræotis, and each of the narrow ends exposed a front of no more than ten furlongs The efforts of the Arabs were not inadequate to the difficulty of the attempt and value of the prize From the throne of Medina the eyes of Omar were fixed on the camp and city his voice excited to arms the Arabian tribes and the veterans of Syria and the merit of a holy war was recommended by the peculiar fame and fertility of Egypt. Anxious for the ruin or expulsion of their tyrants the faithful natives devoted their labours to the service of Amrou some sparks of martial spirit were perhaps rekindled by the example of their allies and the sanguine hopes of Mokawkas had fixed his sepulchre in the church of St. John of Alexandria. Eutychius the patriarch observes that the Saracens fought with the courage of lions they repulsed the frequent and almost daily sallies of the besieged and soon assaulted in their turn the walls and towers of the city In every attack the sword the banner of Amrou glittered in the van of the Moslems On a memorable day he was betrayed by his imprudent valour his followers who had entered the citadel were driven back and the general with a friend and a slave remained a prisoner in the hands of the Christians When Amrou was conducted before the præfect, he remembered his dignity and forgot his situation a lofty demeanour and resolute language revealed the lieutenant of the caliph and the battle axe of a soldier was already raised to strike off the head of the audacious captive His life was saved by the readiness of his slave who instantly gave his master a blow on the face and commanded him with an angry tone to be silent in the presence of his superiors. The credulous Greek was deceived he listened to the offer of a treaty and his prisoners were dismissed in the hope of a more respectable embassy till the joyful acclamations of the camp announced the return of their general and insulted the folly of the infidels At length after a siege of fourteen months[112] and the loss of three and twenty thousand men the Saracens prevailed the Greeks embarked their dispirited and diminished numbers and the standard of Mohammed was planted on the walls of the capital of Egypt I have taken said Amrou to the caliph the great city of the West. It is impossible for me to enumerate the variety of its riches and beauty and I shall content myself with observing that it contains four thousand palaces four thousand baths, four hundred theatres or places of amusement, twelve thousand shops for the sale of vegetable food and forty thousand tributary Jews. The town has been subdued by force of arms without treaty or capitulation and the Moslems are impatient to seize the fruits of their victory[113] *The com*mander of the faithful rejected with firmness the idea of pillage and directed his lieutenant to reserve the wealth and revenue of Alexandria for the public service and the propagation of the faith the inhabitants were numbered a tribute was imposed the zeal and resentment of the Jacobites were curbed and the Melchites who submitted to the Arabian yoke were indulged in the obscure but tranquil exercise of their worship The intelligence of this disgraceful and calamitous event afflicted the declining health of the emperor and Heraclius died of a dropsy about seven weeks after the loss of Alexandria.[114] Under the minority of his grandson the clamours of the people deprived of their daily sustenance compelled the Byzantine court to undertake the recovery of the capital of Egypt. In the space of four years the harbour and fortifications of Alexandria were twice occupied by a fleet and army of Romans They were twice expelled by the valour of Amrou who was recalled by the domestic peril from the distant wars of Tripoli and Nubia But the facility of the attempt, the repetition of the insult, and the obstinacy of the resistance, provoked him to swear that if a third time he drove the infidels into the sea he would render Alexandria as accessible on all sides as the house of a prostitute Faithful to his promise, he dismantled several parts of the walls and towers, but the people was spared in the chastisement of the city, and the mosch of Mercy was erected on the spot where the victorious general had stopped the fury of his troops

I should deceive the expectation of the reader if I passed in silence the fate of the Alexandrian library as it is described by the learned Abulpharagius The spirit of Amrou was more curious and liberal than that of his brethren and in his leisure hours the Arabian chief was pleased with the conversation of John the last disciple of Ammonius and who derived the surname of Philoponus from his laborious studies of grammar and philosophy [115] Emboldened by this familiar intercourse Philoponus presumed to solicit a gift inestimable in his opinion contemptible in that of the barbarians—the royal library, which alone, among the spoils of Alexandria, had not been appropriated by the visit and the seal of the conqueror Amrou was inclined to gratify the wish of the grammarian but his rigid integrity refused to alienate the minutest object without the consent of the caliph and the well known answer of Omar was inspired by the ignorance of a fanatic "If these writings of the Greeks agree with the book of God they are useless and need not be preserved if they disagree they are pernicious and ought to be destroyed The sentence was executed with blind obedience the volumes of paper or parchment were distributed to the four thousand baths of the city and such was their incredible multitude that six months were barely sufficient for the consumption of this precious fuel Since the Dynasties of Abulpharagius[116] have been given to the world in a Latin version the tale has been repeatedly transcribed and every scholar with pious indignation has deplored the irreparable shipwreck of the learning the arts and the genius of antiquity For my own part I am strongly tempted to deny both the fact and the consequences The fact is indeed marvellous Read and wonder! says the historian himself and the solitary report of a stranger who wrote at the end of six hundred years on the confines of Media is overbalanced by the silence of two annalists of a more early date both Christians both natives of Egypt and the most ancient of whom the patriarch Eutychius has amply described the conquest of Alexandria [117] The rigid sentence of Omar is repugnant to the sound and orthodox precept of the Mohammedan casuists they expressly declare that the religious books of the Jews and Christians which are acquired by the right of war should never be committed to the flames and that the works of profane science, historians or poets, physicians or philosophers may be lawfully applied to the use of the faithful [118] A more destructive zeal may perhaps be attributed to the first successors of Mohammed yet in this instance the conflagration would have speedily expired in the deficiency of materials. I shall not recapitulate the disasters of the Alexandrian library, the involuntary flame that was kindled by Cæsar in his own defence [119] or the mischievous bigotry of the Christians who studied to destroy the monuments of idolatry [120] But if we gradually descend from the age of the Antonines to that of Theodosius we shall learn from a chain of contemporary witnesses that the royal palace and the temple of Serapis no longer contained the four, or the seven, hundred thousand volumes which had been assembled by the curiosity and magnificence of the Ptolemies [121] Perhaps the church and seat of the patriarchs might be enriched with a repository of books but if the ponderous mass of Arian and Monophysite controversy were indeed consumed in the public baths [122] a philosopher may allow, with a smile that it was ultimately devoted to the benefit of mankind I sincerely regret the more valuable libraries which have been involved in the ruin of the Roman empire but when I seriously compute the lapse of ages the waste of ignorance, and the calamities of war our treasures rather than our losses are the object of my surprise Many curious and interesting facts are buried in oblivion the three great historians of Rome have been transmitted to our hands in a mutilated state and we are deprived of many pleasing compositions of the lyric iambic and dramatic poetry of the Greeks Yet we should gratefully remember that the mischances of time and accident have spared the classic works to which the suffrage of antiquity[123] had adjudged the first place of genius and glory the teachers of ancient knowledge who are still extant had perused and compared the writings of their predecessors [124] nor can it fairly be presumed that any important truth any useful discovery in art or nature has been snatched away from the curiosity of modern ages

the interest of the people of the law who were defended by God and of the people of the alliance who were protected by man. In the recent tumult of conquest and deliverance the tongue of the Copts and the sword of the Arabs were most adverse to the tranquillity of the province To the former Amrou declared that faction and falsehood would be doubly chastised—by the punishment of the accusers, whom he should detest as his personal enemies and by the promotion of their innocent brethren whom their envy had laboured to injure and supplant. He excited the latter by the motives of religion and honour to sustain the dignity of their character to endear themselves by a modest and temperate conduct to God and the caliph to spare and protect a people who had trusted to their faith and to content themselves with the legitimate and splendid rewards of their victory In the management of the revenue he disapproved the simple but oppressive mode of a capitation and preferred with reason a proportion of taxes deducted on every branch from the clear profits of agriculture and commerce A third part of the tribute was appropriated to the annual repairs of the dykes and canals so essential to the public welfare Under his administration the fertility of Egypt supplied the dearth of Arabia and a string of camels laden with corn and provisions, covered almost without an interval the long road from Memphis to Medina [121] But the genius of Amrou soon renewed the maritime communication which had been attempted or achieved by the Pharaohs the Ptolemies or the Cæsars and a canal at least eighty miles in length was opened from the Nile to the Red Sea This inland navigation which would have joined the Mediterranean and the Indian Ocean, was soon discontinued as useless and dangerous the throne was removed from Medina to Damascus, and the Grecian fleets might have explored a passage to the holy cities of Arabia.[122]

Of his new conquest the caliph Omar had an imperfect knowledge from the voice of fame and the legends of the Koran He requested that his lieutenant would place before his eyes the realm of Pharaoh and the Amalekites and the answer of Amrou exhibits a lively and not unfaithful picture of that singular country [123] O commander of the faithful, Egypt is a compound of black earth and green plants between a pulverised mountain and a red sand The distance from Syene to the sea is a month s journey for a horseman. Along the valley descends a river on which the blessing of the Most High reposes both in the evening and morning and which rises and falls with the revolutions of the sun and moon When the annual dispensation of Providence unlocks the springs and fountains that nourish the earth the Nile rolls his swelling and sounding waters through the realm of Egypt the fields are overspread by the salutary flood and the villages communicate with each other in their painted barks The retreat of the inundation deposits a fertilising mud for the reception of the various seeds the crowds of husbandmen who blacken the land may be compared to a swarm of industrious ants and their native indolence is quickened by the lash of the taskmaster and the promise of the flowers and fruits of a plentiful increase. Their hope is seldom deceived but the riches which they extract from the wheat, the barley and the rice, the legumes the fruit trees and the cattle are unequally shared between those who labour and those who possess According to the vicissitudes of the seasons the face of the country is adorned with a silver wave a verdant emerald and the deep yellow of a golden harvest. [124] Yet this beneficial order is sometimes interrupted and the long delay and sudden swell of the river in the first year of the conquest might afford some colour to an edifying fable It is said that the annual sacrifice of a virgin[125] had been interdicted by the piety of Omar and that the Nile lay sullen and inactive in his shallow bed till the mandate of the caliph was cast into the obedient stream which rose in a single night to the height of sixteen cubits The admiration of the Arabs for their new conquest encouraged the licence of their romantic spirit. We may read in the gravest authors that Egypt was crowded with twenty thousand cities or villages [126] that exclusive of the Greeks and Arabs the Copts alone were found on the assessment six millions of tributary subjects [127] or twenty millions of either sex and of every age that three hundred millions of gold or silver were annually paid to the treasury of the caliph [128] Our reason must be startled by these extravagant assertions and they will become more palpable if we assume the compass and measure the extent of habitable ground a valley from the tropic to Memphis seldom broader than twelve miles and the triangle of the Delta, a flat surface of two thousand one hundred square leagues compose a twelfth part of the magnitude of France [129] A more accurate research will justify a more reasonable estimate The three hundred millions created by the error of a scribe are reduced to the decent revenue of four millions three hundred thousand pieces of gold of which nine hundred thousand were consumed by the pay of the soldiers [135] Two authentic lists of the present and of the twelfth century, are circumscribed within the respectable number of two thousand seven hundred villages and towns [136] After a long residence at Cairo a French consul has ventured to assign about four millions of Mohammedans Christians, and Jews for the ample, though not incredible, scope of the population of Egypt [137]

IV The conquest of Africa from the Nile to the Atlantic Ocean [138] was first attempted by the arms of the caliph Othman The pious design was approved by the companions of Mohammed and the chiefs of the tribes, and twenty thousand Arabs marched from Medina with the gifts and the blessing of the commander of the faithful They were joined in the camp of Memphis by twenty thousand of their countrymen and the conduct of the war was intrusted to Abdallah [139] the son of Said and the foster brother of the caliph who had lately supplanted the conqueror and lieutenant of Egypt Yet the favour of the prince, and the merit of his favourite, could not obliterate the guilt of his apostacy The early conversion of Abdallah and his skilful pen, had recommended him to the important office of transcribing the sheets of the Koran he betrayed his trust, corrupted the text derided the errors which he had made and fled to Mecca to escape the justice and expose the ignorance, of the apostle After the conquest of Mecca he fell prostrate at the feet of Mohammed his tears and the entreaties of Othman, extorted a reluctant pardon but the prophet declared that he had so long hesitated to allow time for some zealous disciple to avenge his injury in the blood of the apostate With apparent fidelity and effective merit he served the religion which it was no longer his interest to desert his birth and talents gave him an honourable rank among the Koreish and in a nation of cavalry Abdallah was renowned as the boldest and most dexterous horseman of Arabia At the head of forty thousand Moslems he advanced from Egypt into the unknown countries of the West The sands of Barca might be impervious to a Roman legion but the Arabs were attended by their faithful camels and the natives of the desert beheld without terror the familiar aspect of the soil and climate After a painful march they pitched their tents before the walls of Tripoli,[140] a maritime city in which the name, the wealth and the inhabitants of the province had gradually centred and which now maintains the third rank among the states of Barbary A reinforcement of Greeks was surprised and cut in pieces on the sea shore, but the fortifications of Tripoli resisted the first assaults, and the Saracens were tempted by the approach of the præfect Gregory[141] to relinquish the labours of the siege for the perils and the hopes of a decisive action If his standard was followed by one hundred and twenty thousand men, the regular bands of the empire must have been lost in the naked and disorderly crowd of Africans and Moors, who formed the strength or rather the numbers, of his host. He rejected with indignation the option of the Koran or the tribute and during several days the two armies were fiercely engaged from the dawn of light to the hour of noon when their fatigue and the excessive heat compelled them to seek shelter and refreshment in their respective camps The daughter of Gregory a maid of incomparable beauty and spirit is said to have fought by his side from her earliest youth she was trained to mount on horseback to draw the bow, and to wield the scimitar and the richness of her arms and apparel were conspicuous in the foremost ranks of the battle Her hand with a hundred thousand pieces of gold was offered for the head of the Arabian general and the youths of Africa were excited by the prospect of the glorious prize At the pressing solicitation of his brethren Abdallah withdrew his person from the field but the Saracens were discouraged by the retreat of their leader, and the repetition of these equal or unsuccessful conflicts

A noble Arabian who afterwards became the adversary of Ali and the father of a caliph, had signalised his valour in Egypt and Zobeir[142] was the first who planted the scaling ladder against the walls of Babylon In the African war he was detached from the standard of Abdallah On the news of the battle Zobeir with twelve companions cut his way through the camp of the Greeks and pressed forwards without tasting either food or repose to partake of the dangers of his brethren He cast his eyes round the field 'Where said he is our general? In his tent Is the tent a station for the general of the Moslems? Abdallah represented with a blush the importance of his own life and the temptation that was held forth by the Roman præfect 'Retort' said Zobeir on the infidels their ungenerous attempt Proclaim through the ranks that the head of Gregory shall be repaid with his captive daughter and the equal sum of one hundred thousand pieces of gold'

to the courage and discretion of Zobeir the lieutenant of the caliph intrusted the execution of his own stratagem which inclined the long disputed balance in favour of the Saracens. Supplying by activity and artifice the deficiency of numbers a part of their forces lay concealed in their tents, while the remainder prolonged an irregular skirmish with the enemy till the sun was high in the heavens On both sides they retired with fainting steps their horses were unbridled, their armour was laid aside and the hostile nations prepared or seemed to prepare, for the refreshment of the evening and the encounter of the ensuing day On a sudden the charge was sounded the Arabian camp poured forth a swarm of fresh and intrepid warriors and the long line of the Greeks and Africans was surprised assaulted overturned by new squadrons of the faithful who to the eye of fanaticism, might appear as a band of angels descending from the sky The præfect himself was slain by the hand of Zobeir his daughter who sought revenge and death was surrounded and made prisoner and the fugitives involved in their disaster the town of Sufetula to which they escaped from the sabres and lances of the Arabs. Sufetula was built one hundred and fifty miles to the south of Carthage a gentle declivity is watered by a running stream and shaded by a grove of juniper trees and in the ruins of a triumphal arch, a portico and three temples of the Corinthian order curiosity may yet admire the magnificence of the Romans [143] After the fall of this opulent city the provincials and barbarians implored on all sides the mercy of the conqueror His vanity or his zeal might be flattered by offers of tribute or professions of faith but his losses his fatigues, and the progress of an epidemical disease prevented a solid establishment and the Saracens after a campaign of fifteen months, retreated to the confines of Egypt, with the captives and the wealth of their African expedition The caliph's fifth was granted to a favourite on the nominal payment of five hundred thousand pieces of gold [144] but the state was doubly injured by this fallacious transaction if each foot-soldier had shared one thousand and each horseman three thousand pieces, in the real division of the plunder The author of the death of Gregory was expected to have claimed the most precious reward of the victory from his silence it might be presumed that he had fallen in the battle till the tears and exclamations of the præfect's daughter at the sight of Zobeir revealed the valour and modesty of that gallant soldier The unfortunate virgin was offered and almost rejected as a slave by her father's murderer who coolly declared that his sword was consecrated to the service of religion and that he laboured for a recompense far above the charms of mortal beauty or the riches of this transitory life A reward congenial to his temper was the honourable commission of announcing to the caliph Othman the success of his arms The companions the chiefs and the people were assembled in the mosch of Medina to hear the interesting narrative of Zobeir and as the orator forgot nothing except the merit of his own counsels and actions the name of Abdallah was joined by the Arabians with the heroic names of Chaled and Amrou [145]

The Western conquests of the Saracens were suspended near twenty years, till their dissensions were composed by the establishment of the house of Ommiyah and the caliph Moawiyah was invited by the cries of the Africans themselves The successors of Heraclius had been informed of the tribute which they had been compelled to stipulate with the Arabs but instead of being moved to pity and relieve their distress they imposed as an equivalent or a fine, a second tribute of a similar amount. The ears of the Byzantine ministers were shut against the complaints of their poverty and ruin their despair was reduced to prefer the dominion of a single master and the extortions of the patriarch of Carthage who was invested with civil and military power provoked the sectaries, and even the Catholics, of the Roman province to abjure the religion as well as the authority of their tyrants. The first lieutenant of Moawiyah acquired a just renown subdued an important city defeated an army of thirty thousand Greeks swept away fourscore thousand captives and enriched with their spoils the bold adventurers of Syria and Egypt.[146] But the title of conqueror of Africa is more justly due to his successor Akbah He marched from Damascus at the head of ten thousand of the bravest Arabs and the genuine force of the Moslems was enlarged by the doubtful aid and conversion of many thousand barbarians It would be difficult, nor is it necessary to trace the accurate line of the progress of Akbah. The interior regions have been peopled by the Orientals with fictitious armies and imaginary citadels In the warlike province of Zab or Numidia fourscore thousand of the natives might assemble in arms but the number of three hundred and sixty towns is incompatible with the ignorance or decay of husbandry [147] and a circumference of three leagues will not be justified by the ruins of Erbe or Lambesa the ancient metropolis of that inland country As we approach the sea coast the well known cities of Bugia[148] and Tangier[149] define the more certain limits of the Saracen victories A remnant of trade still adheres to the commodious harbour of Bugia which in a more prosperous age is said to have contained about twenty thousand houses and the plenty of iron which is dug from the adjacent mountains might have supplied a braver people with the instruments of defence The remote position and venerable antiquity of Tingi or Tangier have been decorated by the Greek and Arabian fables but the figurative expressions of the latter, that the walls were constructed of brass and that the roofs were covered with gold and silver, may be interpreted as the emblems of strength and opulence The province of Mauritania Tingitana,[150] which assumed the name of the capital, had been imperfectly discovered and settled by the Romans the five colonies were confined to a narrow pale and the more southern parts were seldom explored except by the agents of luxury who searched the forests for ivory and the citron wood[151] and the shores of the ocean for the purple shell fish The fearless Akbah plunged into the heart of the country traversed the wilderness in which his successors erected the splendid capitals of Fez and Morocco[152] and at length penetrated to the verge of the Atlantic and the great desert The river Sus descends from the western sides of Mount Atlas fertilises like the Nile the adjacent soil and falls into the sea at a moderate distance from the Canary, or Fortunate islands Its banks were inhabited by the last of the Moors a race of savages without laws or discipline or religion they were astonished by the strange and irresistible terrors of the Oriental arms and as they possessed neither gold nor silver, the richest spoil was the beauty of the female captives some of whom were afterwards sold for a thousand pieces of gold The career though not the zeal, of Akbah was checked by the prospect of a boundless ocean He spurred his horse into the waves and raising his eyes to heaven exclaimed with the tone of a fanatic Great God! if my course were not stopped by this sea I would still go on to the unknown kingdoms of the West preaching the unity of thy holy name and putting to the sword the rebellious nations who worship any other gods than thee[153] Yet this Mohammedan Alexander who sighed for new worlds was unable to preserve his recent conquests By the universal defection of the Greeks and Africans he was recalled from the shores of the Atlantic and the surrounding multitudes left him only the resource of an honourable death The last scene was dignified by an example of national virtue An ambitious chief who had disputed the command and failed in the attempt was led about as a prisoner in the camp of the Arabian general The insurgents had trusted to his discontent and revenge, he disdained their offers and revealed their designs In the hour of danger the grateful Akbah unlocked his fetters and advised him to retire, he chose to die under the banner of his rival Embracing as friends and martyrs they unsheathed their scimitars broke their scabbards and maintained an obstinate combat till they fell by each other s side on the last of their slaughtered countrymen The third general or governor of Africa, Zuheir avenged and encountered the fate of his predecessor He vanquished the natives in many battles he was overthrown by a powerful army which Constantinople had sent to the relief of Carthage

It had been the frequent practice of the Moorish tribes to join the invaders to share the plunder to profess the faith and to revolt to their savage state of independence and idolatry *on the first retreat or misfortune of the Mos*lems The prudence of Akbah had proposed to found an Arabian colony in the heart of Africa a citadel that might curb the levity of the barbarians a place of refuge to secure against the accidents of war the wealth and the families of the Saracens With this view, and under the modest title of the station of a caravan he planted this colony in the fiftieth year of the Hegira In its present decay Cairoan[154] still holds the second rank in the kingdom of Tunis, from which it is distant about fifty miles to the south[155] its inland situation twelve miles westward of the sea has protected the city from the Greek and Sicilian fleets When the wild beasts and serpents were extirpated when the forest or rather wilderness was cleared the vestiges of a Roman town were discovered in a sandy plain the vegetable food of Cairoan is brought from afar and the scarcity of springs constrains the inhabitants to collect in cisterns and reservoirs a precarious supply of rain water Thes obstacles were subdued by the industry of Akbah he traced a circumference of three thousand and six hundred paces which he encompassed with a brick wall in the space of five years the governor s palace was surrounded with a sufficient number of private habitations, a spacious mosch was supported by five hundred columns of granite porphyry and Numidian

marble and Cairoan became the seat of learning as well as of empire. But these were the glories of a later age the new colony was shaken by the successive defeats of Akbah and Zuheir and the western expeditions were again interrupted by the civil discord of the Arabian monarchy The son of the valiant Zobeir maintained a war of twelve years, a siege of seven months, against the house of Ommiyah Abdallah was said to unite the fierceness of the lion with the subtilty of the fox but if he inherited the courage he was devoid of the generosity of his father [136]

The return of domestic peace allowed the caliph Abdalmalek to resume the conquest of Africa the standard was delivered to Hassan, governor of Egypt, and the revenue of that kingdom with an army of forty thousand men, was consecrated to the important service In the vicissitudes of war the interior provinces had been alternately won and lost by the Saracens. But the sea-coast still remained in the hands of the Greeks the predecessors of Hassan had respected the name and fortifications of Carthage and the number of its defenders was recruited by the fugitives of Cabes and Tripoli. The arms of Hassan were bolder and more fortunate he reduced and pillaged the metropolis of Africa and the mention of scaling ladders may justify the suspicion that he anticipated by a sudden assault the more tedious operations of a regular siege. But the joy of the conquerors was soon disturbed by the appearance of the Christian succours. The praefect and patrician John, a general of experience and renown embarked at Constantinople the forces of the Eastern empire [137] they were joined by the ships and soldiers of Sicily and a powerful reinforcement of Goths[138] was obtained from the fears and religion of the Spanish monarch. The weight of the confederate navy broke the chain that guarded the entrance of the harbour the Arabs retired to Cairoan, or Tripoli the Christians landed the citizens hailed the ensign of the cross, and the winter was idly wasted in the dream of victory or deliverance But Africa was irrecoverably lost the zeal and resentment of the commander of the faithful[139] prepared in the ensuing spring a more numerous armament by sea and land and the patrician in his turn was compelled to evacuate the post and fortifications of Carthage. A second battle was fought in the neighbourhood of Utica the Greeks and Goths were again defeated and their timely embarkation saved them from the sword of Hassan, who had invested the slight and insufficient rampart of their camp What ever yet remained of Carthage was delivered to the flames, and the colony of Dido[140] and Caesar lay desolate above two hundred years till a part, perhaps a twentieth of the old circumference was repeopled by the first of the Fatimite caliphs In the beginning of the sixteenth century the second capital of the West was represented by a mosch, a college without students, twenty five or thirty shops and the huts of five hundred peasants, who in their abject poverty, displayed the arrogance of the Punic senators. Even that paltry village was swept away by the Spaniards whom Charles the Fifth had stationed in the fortress of the Goletta The ruins of Carthage have perished and the place might be unknown if some broken arches of an aqueduct did not guide the footsteps of the inquisitive traveller [141]

The Greeks were expelled but the Arabians were not yet masters of the country In the interior provinces the Moors or Berbers [142] so feeble under the first Caesars, so formidable to the Byzantine princes maintained a disorderly resistance to the religion and power of the successors of Mohammed. Under the standard of their queen Cahina the independent tribes acquired some degree of union and discipline and as the Moors respected in their females the character of a prophetess they attacked the invaders with an enthusiasm similar to their own. The veteran bands of Hassan were inadequate to the defence of Africa the conquests of an age were lost in a single day and the Arabian chief overwhelmed by the torrent retired to the confines of Egypt, and expected five years, the promised succours of the caliph. After the retreat of the Saracens, the victorious prophetess assembled the Moorish chiefs, and recommended a measure of strange and savage policy Our cities, said she, and the gold and silver which they contain, perpetually attract the arms of the Arabs. These vile metals are not the objects of our ambition we content ourselves with the simple productions of the earth Let us destroy these cities let us bury in their ruins those pernicious treasures and when the avarice of our foes shall be destitute of temptation perhaps they will cease to disturb the tranquillity of a warlike people. The proposal was accepted with unanimous applause. From Tangier to Tripoli the buildings or at least the fortifications, were demolished the fruit trees were cut down the means of subsistence were extirpated, a fertile and populous garden was changed into a desert and the historians of a more recent

of Erbe or Lambesa, the ancient metropolis of that inland country As we approach the sea coast the well known cities of Bugia[148] and Tangier[149] define the more certain limits of the Saracen victories A remnant of trade still adheres to the commodious harbour of Bugia, which in a more prosperous age is said to have contained about twenty thousand houses and the plenty of iron which is dug from the adjacent mountains might have supplied a braver people with the instruments of defence The remote position and venerable antiquity of Tingi or Tangier have been decorated by the Greek and Arabian fables but the figurative expressions of the latter that the walls were constructed of brass and that the roofs were covered with gold and silver, may be interpreted as the emblems of strength and opulence The province of Mauritania Tingitana [150] which assumed the name of the capital had been imperfectly discovered and settled by the Romans, the five colonies were confined to a narrow pale and the more southern parts were seldom explored except by the agents of luxury who searched the forests for ivory and the citron wood [151] and the shores of the ocean for the purple shell fish The fearless Akbah plunged into the heart of the country traversed the wilderness in which his successors erected the splendid capitals of Fez and Morocco [152] and at length penetrated to the verge of the Atlantic and the great desert The river Sus descends from the western sides of Mount Atlas fertilises like the Nile the adjacent soil and falls into the sea at a moderate distance from the Canary, or Fortunate, islands Its banks were inhabited by the last of the Moors a race of savages without laws or discipline or religion they were astonished by the strange and irresistible terrors of the Oriental arms and as they possessed neither gold nor silver the richest spoil was the beauty of the female captives some of whom were afterwards sold for a thousand pieces of gold The career though not the zeal of Akbah was checked by the prospect of a boundless ocean He spurred his horse into the waves and raising his eyes to heaven, exclaimed with the tone of a fanatic Great God! if my course were not stopped by this sea I would still go on to the unknown kingdoms of the West preaching the unity of thy holy name and putting to the sword the rebellious nations who worship any other gods than thee' [153] Yet this Mohammedan Alexander who sighed for new worlds was unable to preserve his recent conquests By the universal defection of the Greeks and Africans he was recalled from the shores of the Atlantic, and the surrounding multitudes left him only the resource of an honourable death The last scene was dignified by an example of national virtue An ambitious chief who had disputed the command and failed in the attempt was led about as a prisoner in the camp of the Arabian general The insurgents had trusted to his discontent and revenge he disdained their offers and revealed their designs In the hour of danger the grateful Akbah unlocked his fetters and advised him to retire, he chose to die under the banner of his rival Embracing as friends and martyrs, they unsheathed their scimitars broke their scabbards and maintained an obstinate combat till they fell by each other s side on the last of their slaughtered countrymen The third general or governor of Africa, Zuheir avenged and encountered the fate of his predecessor He vanquished the natives in many battles, he was overthrown by a powerful army which Constantinople had sent to the relief of Carthage

It had been the frequent practice of the Moorish tribes to join the invaders to share the plunder, to profess the faith and to revolt to their savage state of independence and idolatry on the first retreat or misfortune of the Moslems The prudence of Akbah had proposed to found an Arabian colony in the heart of Africa a citadel that might curb the levity of the barbarians a place of refuge to secure against the accidents of war the wealth and the families of the Saracens With this view and under the modest title of the station of a caravan he planted this colony in the fiftieth year of the Hegira In its present decay Cairoan[154] still holds the second rank in the kingdom of Tunis, from which it is distant about fifty miles to the south [155] its inland situation twelve miles westward of the sea has protected the city from the Greek and Sicilian fleets When the wild beasts and serpents were extirpated when the forest or rather wilderness was cleared the vestiges of a Roman town were discovered in a sandy plain the vegetable food of Cairoan is brought from afar and the scarcity of springs constrains the inhabitants to collect in cisterns and reservoirs a precarious supply of rain water These obstacles were subdued by the industry of Akbah he traced a circumference of three thousand and six hundred paces which he encompassed with a brick wall in the space of five years the governor's palace was surrounded with a sufficient number of private habitations a spacious mosch was supported by five hundred columns of granite porphyry and Numidian

and it was too fatally shown that, by his Andalusian and Mauritanian commands he held in his hand the keys of the Spanish monarchy Too feeble, however to meet his sovereign in arms he sou ht the aid of a foreign power and his rash invitation of the Moors and Arabs produced the calamities of eight hundred years In his epistles or in a personal interview he revealed the wealth and nakedness of his country the weakness of an unpopular prince the degeneracy of an effeminate people The Goths ere no longer the victorious barbarians who ad humbled the pride of Rome, despoiled the ueen of nations, and penetrated from the Danube to the Atlantic Ocean Secluded from he world by the Pyrenæan mountains the successors of Alaric had slumbered in a long peace he walls of the cities were mouldered into dust he youth had abandoned the exercise of arms and the presumption of their ancient renown would expose them in a f eld of battle to the first assault of the invaders The ambitious Saracen was fired by the ease and importance of the attempt but the execution was delayed till he had consulted the command r of the faithful and his messenger returned with the permission of Walid to an ex the unknown kingdoms of the West to th religion and throne of the cal phs In his residence of Tangier Musa with secrecy and caution continued his correspondence and hastened his preparations But the remorse of the conspirators was soothed by the fallacious assurance that he should content himself with the glory and spoil without aspiring to establish the Moslems beyond the sea that separates Africa from Europe [170]

Before Musa would trust an army of the faithful to the traitors and infidels of a foreign land, he made a less dangerous trial of their strength and veracity One hundred Arabs and four hundred Africans passed over in four vessels, from Tangier or Ceuta the place of their descent on the opposite shore of the strait is marked by the name of Tarif their chief and the date of this memorable event[171] is fixed to the month of Ramadan of the ninety first year of the Hegira to the month of July seven hundred and forty-eight years from the Spanish era of Cæsar [172] seven hundred and ten after the birth of Christ. From their first station they marched eighteen miles through a hilly country to the castle and town of Julian [173] on which (it is still called Algezire) they bestowed the name of the Green Island from a verdant cape that advances into the sea Their hospitable entertainment, the Christians who joined their standard th ir inroad into a fertile and unguarded province the richness of their spoil and the safety of their return announced to their brethren the most favourable omens of victory In the ensuing spring five thousand veterans and volunteers were embarked under the command of Tarik a dauntless and skilful soldier who surpassed the expectation of his chief and the necessary transports were provided by the industry of their too faithful ally The Saracens landed [174] at the pillar or point of Europe the corrupt and familiar appellation of Gibraltar (Gebel al Tarik) describes the mountain of Tarik and the entrenchments of his camp were the first outline of those fortifications which in the hands of our countrymen have resisted the art and power of the house of Bourbon The adjacent governors informed the court of Toledo of the descent and progress of the Arabs and the defeat of his lieutenant Edeco who had been commanded to seize and bind the presumptuous strangers, admonished Roderic of the magnitude of the danger At the royal summons, the dukes and counts the bishops and nobles of the Gothic monarchy assembled at the head of their followers and the title of King of the Romans which is employed by an Arabic historian may be excused by the close affinity of language religion and manners between the nations of Spain. His army consisted of ninety or a hundred thousand men a formidable power if their fidelity and discipline had been ad quate to their numbers The troops of Tarik had been augmented to twelve thousand Saracens but the Christian malcontents were attracted by the influence of Julian and a crowd of Africans most greedily tasted the temporal blessings of the Koran In the neighbourhood of Cadiz the town of Xeres[175] has been illustrated by the encounter which determined the fate of the kingdom the stream of the Guadalete which falls into the bay divided the two camps and marked the advancing and retreating skirmishes of three successive and bloody days On the fourth day the two armies joined a more serious and decisive issue but Alaric would have blushed at the sight of his unworthy successor sustaining on his head a diadem of pearls, encumbered with a flowing robe of gold and silken embroidery and reclining on a litter or arc of ivory drawn by two white mules Notwithstanding the valour of the Saracens, they fainted under the weight of multitudes and the plain of Xeres was overspread with sixteen thousand of their dead bod es My brethren said Tarik to his surviving companions, the period could discern the frequent traces of the prosperity and devastation of their ancestors Such is the tale of the modern Arabians Yet I strongly suspect that their ignorance of antiquity the love of the marvellous, and the fashion of extolling the philosophy of barbarians, has induced them to describe as one voluntary act the calamities of three hundred years since the first fury of the Donatists and Vandals In the progress of the revolt Cahina had most probably contributed her share of destruction and the alarm of universal ruin might terrify and alienate the cities that had reluctantly yielded to her unworthy yoke They no longer hoped perhaps they no longer wished, the return of their Byzantine sovereigns their present servitude was not alleviated by the benefits of order and justice and the most zealous Catholic must prefer the imperfect truths of the Koran to the blind and rude idolatry of the Moors The general of the Saracens was again received as the saviour of the province the friends of civil society conspired against the savages of the land and the royal prophetess was slain in the first battle which overturned the baseless fabric of her superstition and empire The same spirit revived under the successor of Hassan it was finally quelled by the activity of Musa and his two sons but the number of the rebels may be presumed from that of three hundred thousand captives sixty thousand of whom the caliph s fifth were sold for the profit of the public treasury Thirty thousand of the barbarian youth were enlisted in the troops and the pious labours of Musa to inculcate the knowledge and practice of the Koran accustomed the Africans to obey the apostle of God and the commander of the faithful In their climate and government their diet and habitation the wandering Moors resembled the Bedoweens of the desert With the religion they were proud to adopt the language, name, and origin of Arabs the blood of the strangers and natives was insensibly mingled and from the Euphrates to the Atlantic the same nation might seem to be diffused over the sandy plains of Asia and Africa Yet I will not deny that fifty thousand tents of pure Arabians might be transported over the Nile and scattered through the Libyan desert and I am not ignorant that five of the Moorish tribes still retain their barbarous idiom, with the appellation and character of white Africans [163]

V In the progress of conquest from the north and south the Goths and the Saracens encountered each other on the confines of Europe and Africa In the opinion of the latter, the difference of religion is a reasonable ground of enmity and warfare [164]

As early as the time of Othman [165] their piratical squadrons had ravaged the coast of Andalusia [166] nor had they forgotten the relief of Carthage by the Gothic succours In that age, as well as in the present the kings of Spain were possessed of the fortress of Ceuta one of the Columns of Hercules which is divided by a narrow strait from the opposite pillar or point of Europe A small portion of Mauritania was still wanting to the African conquest but Musa in the pride of victory, was repulsed from the walls of Ceuta by the vigilance and courage of Count Julian the general of the Goths From his disappointment and perplexity Musa was relieved by an unexpected message of the Christian chief who offered his place, his person and his sword to the successors of Mohammed and solicited the disgraceful honour of introducing their arms into the heart of Spain [167] If we inquire into the cause of his treachery the Spaniards will repeat the popular story of his daughter Cava [168] of a virgin who was seduced or ravished by her sovereign of a father who sacrificed his religion and country to the thirst of revenge The passions of princes have often been licentious and destructive but this well known tale romantic in itself is indifferently supported by external evidence and the history of Spain will suggest some motives of interest and policy more congenial to the breast of a veteran statesman [169] After the decease or deposition of Witiza his two sons were supplanted by the ambition of Roderic a noble Goth whose father, the duke or governor of a province had fallen a victim to the preceding tyranny The monarchy was still elective but the sons of Witiza educated on the steps of the throne were impatient of a private station Their resentment was the more dangerous as it was varnished with the dissimulation of courts their followers were excited by the remembrance of favours and the promise of a revolution and their Uncle Oppas archbishop of Toledo and Seville was the first person in the church and the second in the state It is probable that Julian was involved in the disgrace of the unsuccessful faction that he had little to hope and much to fear from the new reign and that the imprudent king could not forget or forgive the injuries which Roderic and his family had sustained The merit and influence of the count rendered him a useful or formidable subject his estates were ample his followers bold and numerous

the Christians, superstition likewise contributed her terrors and the subtle Arab encouraged the report of dreams omens and prophecies, and of the portraits of the destined conquerors of Spain that were discovered on breaking open an apartment of the royal palace Yet a spark of the vital flame was still alive some invincible fugitives preferred a life of poverty and freedom in the Asturian valleys the hardy mountaineers repulsed the slaves of the caliph and the sword of Pelagius has been transformed into the sceptre of the Catholic kings[132]

On the intelligence of this rapid success the applause of Musa degenerated into envy and he began not to complain but to fear that Tarik would leave him nothing to subdue. At the head of ten thousand Arabs and eight thousand Africans he passed over in person from Mauritania to Spain the first of his companions were the noblest of the Koreish his eldest son was left in the command of Africa the three younger brethren were of an age and spirit to second the boldest enterprises of their father At his landing in Algezire he was respectfully entertained by Count Julian who stifled his inward remorse and testified both in words and actions, that the victory of the Arabs had not impaired his attachment to their cause Some enemies yet remained for the sword of Musa The tardy repentance of the Goths had compared their own numbers and those of the invaders the cities from which the march of Tarik had declined considered themselves as impregnable and the bravest patriots defended the fortifications of Seville and Merida They were successively besieged and reduced by the labour of Musa who transported his camp from the Baetis to the Anas from the Guadalquivir to the Guadiana. When he beheld the works of Roman magnificence the bridge the aqueducts the triumphal arches and the theatre of the ancient metropolis of Lusitania I should imagine said he to his four companions that the human race must have united their art and power in the foundation of this city happy is the man who shall become its master! He aspired to that happiness, but the Emeritus sustained on this occasion the honour of their descent from the veteran legionaries of Augustus[133] Disdaining the confinement of their walls, they gave battle to the Arabs on the plain but an ambuscade rising from the shelter of a quarry or a ruin chastised their indiscretion, and intercepted their return The wooden turrets of assault were rolled forward to the foot of the rampart but the defence of Merida was obstinate and long and the castle of the martyrs was a perpetual testimony of the losses of the Moslems The constancy of the besieged was at length subdued by famine and despair and the prudent victor disguised his impatience under the names of clemency and esteem The alternative of exile or tribute was allowed the churches were divided between the two religions and the wealth of those who had fallen in the siege or retired to Gallicia was confiscated as the reward of the faithful In the midway between Merida and Toledo the lieutenant of Musa saluted the vicegerent of the caliph and conducted him to the palace of the Gothic kings Their first interview was cold and formal a rigid account was exacted of the treasures of Spain the character of Tarik was exposed to suspicion and obloquy and the hero was imprisoned reviled and ignominiously scourged by the hand or the command of Musa Yet so strict was the discipline so pure the zeal or so tame the spirit, of the primitive Moslems that after this public indignity Tarik could serve and be trusted in the reduction of the Tarragonese province A mosch was erected at Saragossa by the liberality of the Koreish the port of Barcelona was opened to the vessels of Syria and the Goths were pursued beyond the Pyrenean mountains into their Gallic province of Septimania or Languedoc.[134] In the church of St. Mary at Carcassonne Musa found but it is improbable that he left, seven equestrian statues of massy silver and from his term or column of Narbonne he returned on his footsteps to the Gallician and Lusitanian shores of the ocean. During the absence of the father his son Abdelaziz chastised the insurgents of Seville and reduced from Malaga to Valentia the sea-coast of the Mediterranean his original treaty with the discreet and valiant Theodemir[135] will represent the manners and policy of the times The conditions of peace agreed and sworn between Abdelaziz the son of Musa the son of Nassir and Theodemir prince of the Goths In the name of the most merciful God Abdelaziz makes peace on these conditions that Theodemir shall not be disturbed in his principality nor any injury be offered to the life or property the wives and children the religion and temples, of the Christians that Theodemir shall freely deliver his seven cities Orihuela Valentola Alicant Mola Vacasora Bigerra (now Bejar) Ora (or Opta) and Lorca that he shall not assist or entertain the enemies of the caliph but shall faithfully communicate his knowledge of their hostile designs that himself and each of the Gothic enemy is before you the sea is behind, whither would ye fly? Follow your general I am resolved either to lose my life or to trample on the prostrate king of the Romans' Besides the resource of despair he confided in the secret correspondence and nocturnal interviews of Count Julian with the sons and the brother of Witiza The two princes and the archbishop of Toledo occupied the most important post their well timed defection broke the ranks of the Christians each warrior was prompted by fear or suspicion to consult his personal safety and the remains of the Gothic army were scattered or destroyed in the flight and pursuit of the three following days Amidst the general disorder Roderic started from his car and mounted Orelia the fleetest of his horses, but he escaped from a soldier s death to perish more ignobly in the waters of the Bætis or Guadalquivir His diadem his robes and his courser were found on the bank, but as the body of the Gothic prince was lost in the waves the pride and ignorance of the caliph must have been gratified with some meaner head which was exposed in triumph before the palace of Damascus And such' continues a valiant historian of the Arabs, is the fate of those kings who withdraw themselves from a field of battle'[176]

Count Julian had plunged so deep into guilt and infamy, that his only hope was in the ruin of his country After the battle of Xeres he recommended the most effectual measures to the victorious Saracen The king of the Goths is slain their princes have fled before you the army is routed the nation is astonished Secure with sufficient detachments the cities of Bætica but in person and without delay march to the royal city of Toledo and allow not the distracted Christians either time or tranquillity for the election of a new monarch Tarik listened to his advice A Roman captive and proselyte who had been enfranchised by the caliph himself assaulted Cordova with seven hundred horse he swam the river surprised the town and drove the Christians into the great church where they defended themselves above three months Another detachment reduced the sea coast of Bætica which in the last period of the Moorish power has comprised in a narrow space the populous kingdom of Granada The march of Tarik from the Bætis to the Tagus[177] was directed through the Sierra Morena that separates Andalusia and Castille till he appeared in arms under the walls of Toledo[178] The most zealous of the Catholics had escaped with the relics of their saints and if the gates were shut it was only till the victor had subscribed a fair and reasonable capitulation. The voluntary exiles were allowed to depart with their effects seven churches were appropriated to the Christian worship the archbishop and his clergy were at liberty to exercise their functions the monks to practise or neglect their penance and the Goths and Romans were left in all civil and criminal cases to the subordinate jurisdiction of their own laws and magistrates. But if the justice of Tarik protected the Christians his gratitude and policy rewarded the Jews, to whose secret or open aid he was indebted for his most important acquisitions. Persecuted by the kings and synods of Spain who had often pressed the alternative of banishment or baptism that outcast nation embraced the moment of revenge the comparison of their past and present state was the pledge of their fidelity and the alliance between the disciples of Moses and of Mohammed was maintained till the final era of their common expulsion From the royal seat of Toledo the Arabian leader spread his conquests to the north over the modern realms of Castille and Leon but it is needless to enumerate the cities that yielded on his approach or again to describe the table of emerald[179] transported from the East by the Romans acquired by the Goths among the spoils of Rome and presented by the Arabs to the throne of Damascus. Beyond the Asturian mountains the maritime town of Gijon was the term[180] of the lieutenant of Musa who had performed with the speed of a traveller his victorious march of seven hundred miles from the rock of Gibraltar to the Bay of Biscay The failure of land compelled him to retreat, and he was recalled to Toledo to excuse his presumption of subduing a kingdom in the absence of his general Spain which in a more savage and disorderly state had resisted two hundred years the arms of the Romans was overrun in a few months by those of the Saracens and such was the eagerness of submission and treaty that the governor of Cordova is recorded as the only chief who fell without conditions a prisoner into their hands The cause of the Goths had been irrevocably judged in the field of Xeres and in the national dismay each part of the monarchy declined a contest with the antagonist who had vanquished the united strength of the whole[181] That strength had been wasted by two successive seasons of famine and pestilence and the governors who were impatient to surrender might exaggerate the difficulty of collecting the provisions of a siege To disarm crowd of slaves [110] I am ignorant whether Count Julian was rewarded with the death which he deserved indeed though not from the hands of the Saracens but the tale of their ingratitude to the sons of Witiza is disproved by the most unquestionable evidence The two royal youths were reinstated in the private patrimony of their father but on the decease of Eba the elder his daughter was unjustly despoiled of her portion by the violence of her uncle Sigebut. The Gothic maid pleaded her cause before the caliph Hashem and obtained the restitution of her inheritance but she was given in marriage to a noble Arabian and their two sons, Isaac and Ibrahim, were received in Spain with the consideration that was due to their origin and riches.

A province is assimilated to the victorious state by the introduction of strangers and the imitative spirit of the natives and Spain which had been successively tinctured with Punic and Roman and Gothic blood imbibed in a few generations, the name and manners of the Arabs The first conquerors and the twenty successive lieutenants of the caliphs were attended by a numerous train of civil and military followers, who preferred a distant fortune to a narrow home the private and public interest was promoted by the establishment of faithful colonies and the cities of Spain were proud to commemorate the tribe or country of their Eastern progenitors The victorious though motley bands of Tarik and Musa asserted by the name of Spaniards their original claim of conquest yet they allowed their brethren of Egypt to share their establishments of Murcia and Lisbon. The royal legion of Damascus was planted at Cordova that of Emesa at Seville that of Kinnisrin or Chalcis at Jaen that of Palestine at Algezire and Medina Sidonia The natives of Yemen and Persia were scattered round Toledo and the inland country and the fertile seats of Granada were bestowed on ten thousand horsemen of Syria and Irak the children of the purest and most noble of the Arabian tribes[111] A spirit of emulation sometimes beneficial more frequently dangerous was nourished by these hereditary factions Ten years after the conquest a map of the province was presented to the caliph the seas the rivers and the harbours the inhabitants and cities the climate the soil and the mineral productions of the earth [112] In the space of two centuries the gifts of nature were improved by the agriculture [113] the manufactures and the commerce of an industrious people and the effects of their diligence have been magnified by the idleness of their fancy The first of the Ommiades who reigned in Spain solicited the support of the Christians and in his edict of peace and protection he contents himself with a modest imposition of ten thousand ounces of gold ten thousand pounds of silver ten thousand horses, as many mules one thousand cuirasses with an equal number of helmets and lances [114] The most powerful of his successors derived from the same kingdom the annual tribute of twelve millions and forty five thousands dinars or pieces of gold about six millions of sterling money [114] a sum which in the tenth century most probably surpassed the united revenues of the Christian monarchs. His royal seat of Cordova contained six hundred moschs nine hundred baths and two hundred thousand houses he gave laws to eighty cities of the first to three hundred of the second and third order and the fertile banks of the Guadalquivir were adorned with twelve thousand villages and hamlets The Arabs might exaggerate the truth but they created and they describe the most prosperous era of the riches the cultivation and the populousness of Spain [115]

The wars of the Moslems were sanctified by the prophet but among the various precepts and examples of his life the caliphs selected the lessons of toleration that might tend to disarm the resistance of the unbelievers Arabia was the temple and patrimony of the God of Mohammed but he beheld with less jealousy and affection the nations of the earth. The polytheists and idolaters who were ignorant of his name might be lawfully extirpated by his votaries [116] but a wise policy supplied the obligation of justice and after some acts of intolerant zeal the Mohammedan conquerors of Hindostan have spared the pagodas of that devout and populous country The disciples of Abraham of Moses and of Jesus were solemnly invited to accept the more perfect revelation of Mohammed but if they preferred the payment of a moderate tribute they were entitled to the freedom of conscience and religious worship [117] In a field of battle the forfeit lives of the prisoners were redeemed by the profession of Islam the females were bound to embrace the religion of their masters and a race of sincere proselytes was gradually multiplied by the education of the infant captives But the millions of African and Asiatic converts, who swelled the native band of the faithful Arabs must have been allured rather than constrained to declare their belief in one God and the apostle of God By the nobles, shall annually pay one piece of gold four measures of wheat as many of barley with a certain proportion of honey oil and vinegar, and that each of their vassals shall be taxed at one moiety of the said imposition Given the fourth of Regeb in the year of the Hegira ninety four and subscribed with the names of four Musulman witnesses '[186] Theodemir and his subjects were treated with uncommon lenity, but the rate of tribute appears to have fluctuated from a tenth to a fifth according to the submission or obstinacy of the Christians[187] In this revolution many partial calamities were inflicted by the carnal or religious passions of the enthusiasts some churches were profaned by the new worship some relics or images were confounded with idols the rebels were put to the sword and one town (an obscure place between Cordova and Seville) was razed to its foundations Yet if we compare the invasion of Spain by the Goths or its recovery by the kings of Castille and Arragon we must applaud the moderation and discipline of the Arabian conquerors

The exploits of Musa were performed in the evening of life, though he affected to disguise his age by colouring with a red powder the whiteness of his beard But in the love of action and glory his breast was still fired with the ardour of youth and the possession of Spain was considered only as the first step to the monarchy of Europe With a powerful armament by sea and land he was preparing to repass the Pyrenees to extinguish in Gaul and Italy the declining kingdoms of the Franks and Lombards and to preach the unity of God on the altar of the Vatican From thence subduing the barbarians of Germany he proposed to follow the course of the Danube from its source to the Euxine Sea to overthrow the Greek or Roman empire of Constantinople, and returning from Europe to Asia to unite his new acquisitions with Antioch and the provinces of Syria.[188] But his vast enterprise perhaps of easy execution must have seemed extravagant to vulgar minds and the visionary conqueror was soon reminded of his dependence and servitude The friends of Tarik had effectually stated his services and wrongs at the court of Damascus the proceedings of Musa were blamed his intentions were suspected and his delay in complying with the first invitation was chastised by a harsher and more peremptory summons An intrepid messenger of the caliph entered his camp at Lugo in Gallicia and in the presence of the Saracens and Christians arrested the bridle of his horse His own loyalty, or that of his troops, inculcated the duty of obedience and his disgrace was alleviated by the recall of his rival, and the permission of investing with his two governments his two sons Abdallah and Abdelaziz His long triumph from Ceuta to Damascus displayed the spoils of Afric and the treasures of Spain four hundred Gothic nobles, with gold coronets and girdles were distinguished in his train, and the number of male and female captives, selected for their birth or beauty was computed at eighteen or even at thirty thousand persons As soon as he reached Tiberias in Palestine he was apprised of the sickness and danger of the caliph by a private message from Soliman his brother and presumptive heir who wished to reserve for his own reign the spectacle of victory Had Walid recovered the delay of Musa would have been criminal he pursued his march and found an enemy on the throne In his trial before a partial judge against a popular antagonist he was convicted of vanity and falsehood and a fine of two hundred thousand pieces of gold either exhausted his poverty or proved his rapaciousness The unworthy treatment of Tarik was revenged by a similar indignity and the veteran commander after a public whipping stood a whole day in the sun before the palace gate till he obtained a decent exile under the pious name of a pilgrimage to Mecca The resentment of the caliph might have been satiated with the ruin of Musa but his fears demanded the extirpation of a potent and injured family A sentence of death was intimated with secrecy and speed to the trusty servants of the throne both in Africa and Spain and the forms if not the substance of justice were superseded in this bloody execution In the mosch or palace of Cordova Abdelaziz was slain by the swords of the conspirators they accused their governor of claiming the honours of royalty and his scandalous marriage with Egilona the widow of Roderic offended the prejudices both of the Christians and Moslems By a refinement of cruelty the head of the son was presented to the father, with an insulting question whether he acknowledged the features of the rebel? I know his features he exclaimed with indignation I assert his innocence and I imprecate the same a juster fate against the authors of his death ' The age and despair of Musa raised him above the power of kings and he expired at Mecca of the anguish of a broken heart His rival was more favourably treated his services were forgiven, and Tarik was permitted to mingle with the

the yoke of the Arabian prophet Within fifty years after the expulsion of the Greeks a lieutenant of Africa informed the caliph that the tribute of the infidels was abolished by their conversion [27] and though he sought to disguise his fraud and rebellion his specious pretence was drawn from the rapid and extensive progress of the Mohammedan faith In the next age an extraordinary mission of five bishops was detached from Alexandria to Cairoan They were ordained by the Jacobite patriarch to cherish and revive the dying embers of Christianity [208] but the interposition of a foreign prelate a stranger to the Latins, an enemy to the Catholics, supposes the decay and dissolution of the African hierarchy It was no longer the time when the successor of St Cyprian at the head of a numerous synod could maintain an equal contest with the ambition of the Roman pontiff In the eleventh century the unfortunate priest who was seated on the ruins of Carthage implored the arms and the protection of the Vatican and he bitterly complains that his naked body had been scourged by the Saracens and that his authority was disputed by the four suffragans the tottering pillars of his throne Two epistles of Gregory the Seventh [209] are destined to soothe the distress of the Catholics and the pride of a Moorish prince The pope assures the sultan that they both worship the same God and may hope to meet in the bosom of Abraham but the complaint that three bishops could no longer be found to consecrate a brother announces the speedy and inevitable ruin of the episcopal order The Christians of Africa and Spain had long since submitted to the practice of circumcision and the legal abstinence from wine and pork and the name of Mozarabes [210] (adoptive Arabs) was applied to their civil or religious conformity [211] About the middle of the twelfth century the worship of Christ and the succession of pastors were abolished along the coast of Barbary and in the kingdoms of Cordova and Seville of Valencia and Granada [212] The throne of the Almohades or Unitarians was founded on the blindest fanaticism, and their extraordinary rigour might be provoked or justified by the recent victories and intolerant zeal of the princes of Sicily and Castille of Arragon and Portugal The faith of the Mozarabes was occasionally revived by the papal missionaries and on the landing of Charles the Fifth some families of Latin Christians were encouraged to rear their heads at Tunis and Algiers. But the seed of the Gospel was quickly eradicated and the long province from Tripoli to the Atlantic has lost all memory of the language and religion of Rome [213]

After the revolution of eleven centuries the Jews and Christians of the Turkish empire enjoy the liberty of conscience which was granted by the Arabian caliphs. During the first age of the conquest they suspected the loyalty of the Catholics whose name of Melchites betrayed their secret attachment to the Greek emperor while the Nestorians and Jacobites his inveterate enemies approved themselves the sincere and voluntary friends of the Mohammedan government.[214] Yet this partial jealousy was healed by time and submission the churches of Egypt were shared with the Catholics [215] and all the Oriental sects were included in the common benefits of toleration. The rank the immunities the domestic jurisdiction of the patriarchs the bishops and the clergy were protected by the civil magistrate the learning of individuals recommended them to the employments of secretaries and physicians they were enriched by the lucrative collection of the revenue and their merit was sometimes raised to the command of cities and provinces A caliph of the house of Abbas was heard to declare that the Christians were most worthy of trust in the administration of Persia The Moslems said he will abuse their present fortune the Magians regret their fallen greatness and the Jews are impatient for their approaching deliverance [216] But the slaves of despotism are exposed to the alternative of favour and disgrace The captive churches of the East have been afflicted in every age by the avarice or bigotry of their rulers and the ordinary and legal restraints must be offensive to the pride or the zeal of the Christians [217] About two hundred years after Mohammed they were separated from their fellow-subjects by a turban or girdle of a less honourable colour instead of horses or mules they were condemned to ride on asses in the attitude of women Their public and private buildings were measured by a diminutive standard in the streets or the baths it is their duty to give way or bow down before the meanest of the people and their testimony is rejected if it may tend to the prejudice of a true believer The pomp of processions, the sound of bells or of psalmody is interdicted in their worship a decent reverence for the national faith is imposed on their sermons and conversations and the sacrilegious attempt to enter a mosch or to seduce a Musulman will not be suffered to escape with impunity In a time however of tranquillity and justice the Christians have repetition of a sentence and the loss of a fore-skin the subject or the slave the captive or the criminal arose in a moment the free and equal companion of the victorious Moslems Every sin was expiated every engagement was dissolved the vow of celibacy was superseded by the indulgence of nature the active spirits who slept in the cloister were awakened by the trumpets of the Saracens and in the convulsion of the world, every member of a new society ascended to the natural level of his capacity and courage The minds of the multitude were tempted by the invisible as well as temporal blessings of the Arabian prophet and charity will hope that many of his proselytes entertained a serious conviction of the truth and sanctity of his revelation In the eyes of an inquisitive polytheist it must appear worthy of the human and the divine nature More pure than the system of Zoroaster more liberal than the law of Moses the religion of Mohammed might seem less inconsistent with reason than the creed of mystery and superstition which, in the seventh century disgraced the simplicity of the Gospel

In the extensive provinces of Persia and Africa the national religion has been eradicated by the Mohammedan faith The ambiguous theology of the Magi stood alone among the sects of the East but the profane writings of Zoroaster[198] might under the reverend name of Abraham be dexterously connected with the chain of divine revelation Their evil principle the demon Ahriman might be represented as the rival or as the creature of the God of light The temples of Persia were devoid of images but the worship of the sun and of fire might be stigmatised as a gross and criminal idolatry [199] The milder sentiment was consecrated by the practice of Mohammed[200] and the prudence of the caliphs the Magians or Ghebers were ranked with the Jews and Christians among the people of the written law [201] and as late as the third century of the Hegira the city of Herat will afford a lively contrast of private zeal and public toleration [202] Under the payment of an annual tribute the Mohammedan law secured to the Ghebers of Herat their civil and religious liberties but the recent and humble mosch was overshadowed by the antique splendour of the adjoining temple of fire A fanatic Imam deplored in his sermons the scandalous neighbourhood and accused the weakness or indifference of the faithful Excited by his voice the people assembled in tumult the two houses of prayer were consumed by the flames but the vacant ground was immediately occupied by the foundations of a new mosch The injur Magi appealed to the sovereign of Chorasa he promised justice and relief when behol four thousand citizens of Herat of a grave cha acter and mature age, unanimously swore th the idolatrous fane had never existed the i quisition was silenced and their conscience w satisfied (says the historian Mirchond[203]) wi this holy and meritorious perjury [204] But t greatest part of the temples of Persia we ruined by the insensible and general desertio of their votaries It was insensible since it is n accompanied with any memorial of time c place of persecution or resistance It was ge eral since the whole realm from Shiraz Samarcand imbibed the faith of the Kora and the preservation of the native tongue r veals the descent of the Mohammedans Persia [205] In the mountains and deserts an ol stinate race of unbelievers adhered to the supe stition of their fathers and a faint tradition the Magian theology is kept alive in the prov ince of Kirman along the banks of the Indu among the exiles of Surat and in the colon which in the last century was planted by Sha Abbas at the gates of Ispahan The chief ponti has retired to Mount Elbourz eighteen leagu from the city of Yezd the perpetual fire (if continue to burn) is inaccessible to the profane but his residence is the school the oracle an the pilgrimage of the Ghebers whose hard an uniform features attest the unmingled purity c their blood Under the jurisdiction of thei elders eighty thousand families maintain a innocent and industrious life their subsistenc is derived from some curious manufactures an mechanic trades and they cultivate the eart with the fervour of a religious duty Their ig norance withstood the despotism of Sha Abbas who demanded with threats and tor tures the prophetic books of Zoroaster and th obscure remnant of the Magians is spared b the moderation or contempt of their presen sovereigns [206]

The Northern coast of Africa is the only lan in which the light of the Gospel after a lon and perfect establishment has been totally ex tinguished The arts which had been taught by Carthage and Rome were involved in a clou of ignorance the doctrine of Cyprian and Au gustin was no longer studied Five hundred episcopal churches were overturned by the hostile fury of the Donatists the Vandals and the Moors The zeal and numbers of the clergy declined and the people without discipline or knowledge or hope submissively sunk under

from Mecca his disciples appeared in arms under the walls of Constantinople.[3] They were animated by a genuine or fictitious saying of the prophet, that to the first army which besieged the city of the Cæsars their sins were forgiven the long series of Roman triumphs would be meritoriously transferred to the conquerors of New Rome and the wealth of nations was deposited in this well-chosen seat of royalty and commerce No sooner had the caliph Moawiyah suppressed his rivals and established his throne than he aspired to expiate the guilt of civil blood by the success and glory of this holy expedition [2] his preparations by sea and land were adequate to the importance of the object his standard was intrusted to Sophian a veteran warrior but the troops were encouraged by the example and presence of Yezid the son and presumptive heir of the commander of the faithful. The Greeks had little to hope nor had their enemies any reasons of fear from the courage and vigilance of the reigning emperor who disgraced the name of Constantine and imitated only the inglorious years of his grandfather Heraclius Without delay or opposition the naval forces of the Saracens passed through the unguarded channel of the Hellespont, which even now under the feeble and disorderly government of the Turks, is maintained as the natural bulwark of the capital [3] The Arabian fleet cast anchor and the troops were disembarked near the palace of Hebdomon seven miles from the city During many days, from the dawn of light to the evening the line of assault was extended from the golden gate to the eastern promontory and the foremost warriors were impelled by the weight and effort of the succeeding columns. But the besiegers had formed an insufficient estimate of the strength and resources of Constantinople. The solid and lofty walls were guarded by numbers and discipline the spirit of the Romans was rekindled by the last danger of their religion and empire the fugitives from the conquered provinces more successfully renewed the defence of Damascus and Alexandria and the Saracens were dismayed by the strange and prodigious effects of artificial fire This firm and effectual resistance diverted their arms to the more easy attempts of plundering the European and Asiatic coasts of the Propontis and after keeping the sea from the month of April to that of September on the approach of winter they retreated four score miles from the capital to the isle of Cyzicus, in which they had established their magazine of spoil and provisions. So patient was their perseverance or so languid were their operations that they repeated in the six following summers the same attack and retreat with a gradual abatement of hope and vigour, till the mischances of shipwreck and disease of the sword and of fire compelled them to relinquish the fruitless enterprise They might bewail the loss or commemorate the martyrdom of thirty thousand Moslems who fell in the siege of Constantinople and the solemn funeral of Abu Ayub or Job excited the curiosity of the Christians themselves That venerable Arab one of the last of the companions of Mohammed was numbered among the ansars or auxiliaries, of Medina who sheltered the head of the flying prophet In his youth he fought, at Beder and Ohud under the holy standard in his mature age he was the friend and follower of Ali and the last remnant of his strength and life was consumed in a distant and dangerous war against the enemies of the Koran. His memory was revered but the place of his burial was neglected and unknown during a *period of seven hun*dred and eighty years, till the conquest of Constantinople by Mohammed the Second. A seasonable vision (for such are the manufacture of every religion) revealed the holy spot at the foot of the walls and the bottom of the harbour and the mosch of Ayub has been deservedly chosen for the simple and martial inauguration of the Turkish sultans.[4]

The event of the siege revived both in the East and West the reputation of the Roman arms and cast a momentary shade over the glories of the Saracens. The Greek ambassador was favourably received at Damascus in a general council of the emirs of Koreish a peace or truce of thirty years was ratified between the two empires and the stipulation of an annual tribute, fifty horses of a noble breed fifty slaves and three thousand pieces of gold degraded the majesty of the commander of the faithful [5] The aged caliph was desirous of possessing his dominions and ending his days in tranquillity and repose while the Moors and Indians trembled at his name his palace and city of Damas*cus* was insulted by the Mardaites or Maro*nites of* Mount Libanus, the firmest barrier of the empire till they were disarmed and transplanted by the suspicious policy of the Greeks.[6] After the revolt of Arabia and Persia the house of Ommiyah[7] was reduced to the kingdom of Syria and Egypt their distress and fear enforced their compliance with the pressing demands of the Christians and the tribute was increased to a slave a horse and a thousand

never been compelled to renounce the Gospel or to embrace the Koran but the punishment of death is inflicted for the apostates who have professed and deserted the law of Mohammed The martyrs of Cordova provoked the sentence of the cadhi by the public confession of their inconstancy, or their passionate invectives against the person and religion of the prophet [18]

At the end of the first century of the Hegira the caliphs were the most potent and absolute monarchs of the globe Their prerogative was not circumscribed, either in right or in fact by the power of the nobles the freedom of the commons the privileges of the church the votes of a senate, or the memory of a free constitution The authority of the companions of Mohammed expired with their lives and the chiefs or emirs of the Arabian tribes left behind in the desert the spirit of equality and independence The regal and sacerdotal characters were united in the successors of Mohammed and if the Koran was the rule of their actions they were the supreme judges and interpreters of that divine book They reigned by the right of conquest over the nations of the East, to whom the name of liberty was unknown and who were accustomed to applaud in their tyrants the acts of violence and severity that were exercised at their own expense Under the last of the Ommiades the Arabian empire extended two hundred days journey from east to west from the confines of Tartary and India to the shores of the Atlantic Ocean And if we retrench the sleeve of the robe, as it is styled by their writers, the long and narrow province of Africa the solid and compact dominion from Fargana to Aden from Tarsus to Surat will spread on every side to the measure of four or five months of the march of a caravan [219] We should vainly seek the indissoluble union and easy obedience that pervaded the government of Augustus and the Antonines, but the progress of the Mohammedan religion diffused over this ample space a general resemblance of manners and opinions. The language and laws of the Koran were studied with equal devotion at Samarcand and Seville the Moor and the Indian embraced as countrymen and brothers in the pilgrimage of Mecca and the Arabian language was adopted as the popular idiom in all the provinces to the westward of the Tigris [220]

When the Arabs first issued from the desert they must have been surprised at the ease and rapidity of their own success But when they advanced in the career of victory to the banks of the Indus and the summit of the Pyrenees when they had repeatedly tried the edge of their scimitars and the energy of their faith, they might be equally astonished that any nation could resist their invincible arms that any boundary should confine the dominion of the successor of the prophet The confidence of soldiers and fanatics may indeed be excused since the calm historian of the present hour who strives to follow the rapid course of the Saracens must study to explain by what means the church and state were saved from this impending and as it should seem from this inevitable danger The deserts of Scythia and Sarmatia might be guarded by their extent their climate their poverty and the courage of the northern shepherds China was remote and inaccessible but the greatest part of the temperate zone was subject to the Mohammedan conquerors the Greeks were exhausted by the calamities of war and the loss of their fairest provinces and the barbarians of Europe might justly tremble at the precipitate fall of the Gothic monarchy In this inquiry I shall unfold the events that rescued our ancestors of Britain and our neighbours of Gaul from the civil and religious yoke of the Koran that protected the majesty of Rome and delayed the servitude of Constantinople that invigorated the defence of the Christians and scattered among their enemies the seeds of division and decay

But the besiegers had formed an insufficient estimate of the strength and resources of Constantinople The solid and lofty walls were guarded by numbers and discipline the spirit of the Romans was rekindled by the last danger of their religion and empire the fugitives from the conquered provinces more successfully renewed the defence of Damascus and Alexandria and the Saracens were dismayed by the strange and prodigious effects of artificial fire This firm and effectual resistance diverted their arms to the more easy attempts of plundering the European and Asiatic coasts of the Propontis and after keeping the sea from the month of April to that of September on the approach of winter they retreated four score miles from the capital to the isle of Cyzicus, in which they had established their magazine of spoil and provisions. So patient was their perseverance or so languid were their operations, that they repeated in the six following summers the same attack and retreat, with a gradual abatement of hope and vigour till the mischances of shipwreck and disease, of the sword and of fire compelled them to relinquish the fruitless enterprise. They might bewail the loss or commemorate the martyrdom of thirty thousand Moslems who fell in the siege of Constantinople and the solemn funeral of Abu Ayub or Job excited the curiosity of the Christians themselves That venerable Arab one of the last of the companions of Mohammed was numbered among the ansars or auxiliaries, of Medina who sheltered the head of the flying prophet In his youth he fought, at Beder and Ohud under the holy standard in his mature age he was the friend and follower of Ali and the last remnant of his strength and life was consumed in a distant and dangerous war against the enemies of the Koran His memory was revered but the place of his burial was neglected and unknown during a period of seven hundred and eighty years till the conquest of Constantinople by Mohammed the Second A seasonable vision (for such are the manufacture of every religion) revealed the holy spot at the foot of the walls and the bottom of the harbour and the mosch of Ayub has been deservedly chosen for the simple and martial inauguration of the Turkish sultans [4]

The event of the siege revived both in the East and West the reputation of the Roman arms and cast a momentary shade over the glories of the Saracens The Greek ambassador was favourably received at Damascus, in a general council of the emirs of Koreish a peace or truce of thirty years was ratified between the two empires and the stipulation of an annual tribute fifty horses of a noble breed fifty slaves and three thousand pieces of gold degraded the majesty of the commander of the faithful [5] The aged caliph was desirous of possessing his dominions and ending his days in tranquillity and repose while the Moors and Indians trembled at his name, his palace and city of Damascus was insulted by the Mardaites or Maronites of Mount Libanus the firmest barrier of the empire till they were disarmed and transplanted by the suspicious policy of the Greeks [6] After the revolt of Arabia and Persia the house of Ommiyah [7] was reduced to the kingdom of Syria and Egypt their distress and fear enforced their compliance with the pressing demands of the Christians and the tribute was increased to a slave a horse and a thousand

never been compelled to renounce the Gospel or to embrace the Koran but the punishment of death is inflicted for the apostates who have professed and deserted the law of Mohammed The martyrs of Cordova provoked the sentence of the cadhi by the public confession of their inconstancy, or their passionate invectives against the person and religion of the prophet [218]

At the end of the first century of the Hegira the caliphs were the most potent and absolute monarchs of the globe Their prerogative was not circumscribed either in right or in fact by the power of the nobles the freedom of the commons the privileges of the church, the votes of a senate or the memory of a free constitution The authority of the companions of Mohammed expired with their lives and the chiefs or emirs of the Arabian tribes left behind in the desert the spirit of equality and independence The regal and sacerdotal characters were united in the successors of Mohammed, and if the Koran was the rule of their actions they were the supreme judges and interpreters of that divine book They reigned by the right of conquest over the nations of the East, to whom the name of liberty was unknown and who were accustomed to applaud in their tyrants the acts of violence and severity that were exercised at their own expense Under the last of the Ommiades the Arabian empire extended two hundred days journey from east to west from the confines of Tartary and India to the shores of the Atlantic Ocean And if we retrench the sleeve of the robe as it is styled by their writers, the long and narrow province of Africa the solid and compact dominion from Fargana to Aden, from Tarsus to Surat will spread on every side to the measure of four or five months of the march of a caravan [219] We should vainly seek the indissoluble union and easy obedience that pervaded the government of Augustus and the Antonines but the progress of the Mohammedan religion diffused over this ample space a general resemblance of manners and opinions The language and laws of the Koran were studied with equal devotion at Samarcand and Seville the Moor and the Indian embraced as countrymen and brothers in the pilgrimage of Mecca and the Arabian language was adopted as the popular idiom in all the provinces to the westward of the Tigris [220]

WHEN the Arabs first issued from the desert they must have been surprised at the ease and rapidity of their own success But when they advanced in the career of victory to the banks of the Indus and the summit of the Pyrenees when they had repeatedly tried the edge of their scimitars and the energy of their faith they might be equally astonished that any nation could resist their invincible arms, that any boundary should confine the dominion of the successor of the prophet The confidence of soldiers and fanatics may indeed be excused since the calm historian of the present hour, who strives to follow the rapid course of the Saracens must study to explain by what means the church and state were saved from this impending and as it should seem from this inevitable danger The deserts of Scythia and Sarmatia might be guarded by their extent their climate their poverty and the courage of the northern shepherds China was remote and inaccessible but the greatest part of the temperate zone was subject to the Mohammedan conquerors the Greeks were exhausted by the calamities of war and the loss of their fairest provinces and the barbarians of Europe might justly tremble at the precipitate fall of the Gothic monarchy In this inquiry I shall unfold the events that rescued our ancestors of Britain and our neighbours of Gaul from the civil and religious yoke of the Koran that protected the majesty of Rome and delayed the servitude of Constantinople that invigorated the defence of the Christians and scattered among their enemies the seeds of division and decay

from Mecca his disciples appeared in arms under the walls of Constantinople[1] They were animated by a genuine or fictitious saying of the prophet, that to the first army which besieged the city of the Cæsars their sins were forgiven the long series of Roman triumphs would be meritoriously transferred to the conquerors of New Rome and the wealth of nations was deposited in this well-chosen seat of royalty and commerce. No sooner had the caliph Moawiyah suppressed his rivals and established his throne than he aspired to expiate the guilt of civil blood by the success and glory of this holy expedition[2] his preparations by sea and land were adequate to the importance of the object his standard was intrusted to Sophian a veteran warrior but the troops were encouraged by the example and presence of Yezid the son and presumptive heir of the commander of the faithful The Greeks had little to hope, nor had their enemies any reasons of fear from the courage and vigilance of the reigning emperor who disgraced the name of Constantine and imitated only the inglorious years of his grandfather Heraclius. Without delay or opposition the naval forces of the Saracens passed through the unguarded channel of the Hellespont, which even now under the feeble and disorderly government of the Turks, is maintained as the natural bulwark of the capital[3] The Arabian fleet cast anchor and the troops were disembarked near the palace of Hebdomon seven miles from the city During many days, from the dawn of light to the evening the line of assault was extended from the golden gate to the eastern promontory and the foremost warriors were impelled by the weight and effort of the succeeding columns. But the besiegers had formed an insufficient estimate of the strength and resources of Constantinople. The solid and lofty walls were guarded by numbers and discipline the spirit of the Romans was rekindled by the last danger of their religion and empire the fugitives from the conquered provinces more successfully renewed the defence of Damascus and Alexandria and the Saracens were dismayed by the strange and prodigious effects of artificial fire This firm and effectual resistance diverted their arms to the more easy attempts of plundering the European and Asiatic coasts of the Propontis and after keeping the sea from the month of April to that of September on the approach of winter they retreated four score miles from the capital to the isle of Cyzicus in which they had established their magazine of spoil and provisions. So patient was their perseverance or so languid were their operations, that they repeated in the six following summers the same attack and retreat with a gradual abatement of hope and vigour till the mischances of shipwreck and disease of the sword and of fire compelled them to relinquish the fruitless enterprise They might bewail the loss, or commemorate the martyrdom of thirty thousand Moslems who fell in the siege of Constantinople and the solemn funeral of Abu Ayub or Job excited the curiosity of the Christians themselves That venerable Arab one of the last of the companions of Mohammed was numbered among the ansars, or auxiliaries, of Medina who sheltered the head of the flying prophet. In his youth he fought at Beder and Ohud under the holy standard in his mature age he was the friend and follower of Ali and the last remnant of his strength and life was consumed in a distant and dangerous war against the enemies of the Koran. His memory was revered but the place of his burial was neglected and unknown during a period of seven hundred and eighty years till the conquest of Constantinople by Mohammed the Second A seasonable vision (for such are the manufacture of every religion) revealed the holy spot at the foot of the walls and the bottom of the harbour and the mosch of Ayub has been deservedly chosen for the simple and martial inauguration of the Turkish sultans.[4]

The event of the siege revived both in the East and West, the reputation of the Roman arms and cast a momentary shade over the glories of the Saracens. The Greek ambassador was favourably received at Damascus in a general council of the emirs of Koreish a peace or truce of thirty years was ratified between the two empires and the stipulation of an annual tribute fifty horses of a noble breed fifty slaves, and three thousand pieces of gold degraded the majesty of the commander of the faithful[5] The aged caliph was desirous of possessing his dominions and ending his days in tranquillity and repose while the Moors and Indians trembled at his name his palace and city of Damascus was insulted by the Mardaites or Maronites of Mount Libanus, the firmest barrier of the empire till they were disarmed and transplanted by the suspicious policy of the Greeks[6] After the revolt of Arabia and Persia the house of Ommiyah[7] was reduced to the kingdom of Syria and Egypt their distress and fear enforced their compliance with the pressing demands of the Christians and the tribute was increased to a slave a horse, and a thousand pieces of gold for each of the three hundred and sixty five days of the solar year But as soon as the empire was again united by the arms and policy of Abdalmalek, he disclaimed a badge of servitude not less injurious to his conscience than to his pride he discontinued the payment of the tribute and the resentment of the Greeks was disabled from action by the mad tyranny of the second Justinian, the just rebellion of his subjects and the frequent change of his antagonists and successors Till the reign of Abdalmalek the Saracens had been content with the free possession of the Persian and Roman treasures in the coin of Chosroes and Cæsar By the command of that caliph a national mint was established both for silver and gold and the inscription of the Dinar, though it might be censured by some timorous casuists, proclaimed the unity of the God of Mohammed [8] Under the reign of the caliph Walid the Greek language and characters were excluded from the accounts of the public revenue [9] If this change was productive of the invention or familiar use of our present numerals the Arabic or Indian ciphers as they are commonly styled, a regulation of office has promoted the most important discoveries of arithmetic algebra and the mathematical sciences [10]

Whilst the caliph Walid sat idle on the throne of Damascus while his lieutenants achieved the conquest of Transoxiana and Spain a third army of Saracens overspread the provinces of Asia Minor and approached the borders of the Byzantine capital But the attempt and disgrace of the second siege was reserved for his brother Soliman whose ambition appears to have been quickened by a more active and martial spirit In the revolutions of the Greek empire after the tyrant Justinian had been punished and avenged a humble secretary Anastasius or Artemius was promoted by chance or merit to the vacant purple He was alarmed by the sound of war and his ambassador returned from Damascus with the tremendous news that the Saracens were preparing an armament by sea and land such as would transcend the experience of the past or the belief of the present age The precautions of Anastasius were not unworthy of his station, or of the impending danger He issued a peremptory mandate that all persons who were not provided with the means of subsistence for a three years siege should evacuate the city the public granaries and arsenals were abundantly replenished the walls were restored and strengthened and the engines for casting stones, or darts or fire were stationed along the ramparts or in the brigantines of war, of which an additional number was hastily constructed To prevent is safer, as well as more honourable than to repel an attack and a design was meditated, above the usual spirit of the Greeks of burning the naval stores of the enemy, the cypress timber that had been hewn in Mount Libanus, and was piled along the seashore of Phœnicia for the service of the Egyptian fleet This generous enterprise was defeated by the cowardice or treachery of the troops who in the new language of the empire were styled of the Obsequian Theme [11] They murdered their chief, deserted their standard in the isle of Rhodes dispersed themselves over the adjacent continent and deserved pardon or reward by investing with the purple a simple officer of the revenue The name of Theodosius might recommend him to the senate and people but after some months he sunk into a cloister, and resigned to the firmer hand of Leo the Isaurian the urgent defence of the capital and empire The most formidable of the Saracens, Moslemah the brother of the caliph was advancing at the head of one hundred and twenty thousand Arabs and Persians, the greater part mounted on horses or camels and the successful sieges of Tyana Amorium and Pergamus were of sufficient duration to exercise their skill and to elevate their hopes At the well known passage of Abydus on the Hellespont the Mohammedan arms were transported for the first time from Asia to Europe From thence wheeling round the Thracian cities of the Propontis Moslemah invested Constantinople on the land side surrounded his camp with a ditch and rampart prepared and planted his engines of assault and declared by words and actions a patient resolution of expecting the return of seed time and harvest should the obstinacy of the besieged prove equal to his own The Greeks would gladly have ransomed their religion and empire by a fine or assessment of a piece of gold on the head of each inhabitant of the city but the liberal offer was rejected with disdain and the presumption of Moslemah was exalted by the speedy approach and invincible force of the navies of Egypt and Syria They are said to have amounted to eighteen hundred ships the number betrays their inconsiderable size and of the twenty stout and capacious vessels whose magnitude impeded their progress each was manned with no more than one hundred heavy armed soldiers This huge armada proceeded on a smooth sea and with a gentle gale towards the mouth of the Bosphorus the surface of the

gnat was overshadowed in the language of the Greeks, with a moving forest and the same fatal night had been fixed by the Saracen chief for a general assault by sea and land. To allure the confidence of the enemy the emperor had thrown aside the chain that usually guarded the entrance of the harbour but while they hesitated whether they should seize the opportunity or apprehend the snare the ministers of destruction were at hand. The fire ships of the Greeks were launched against them the Arabs, their arms, and vessels, were involved in the same flames the disorderly fugitives were dashed against each other or overwhelmed in the waves and I no longer find a vestige of the fleet that had threatened to extirpate the Roman name. A still more fatal and irreparable loss was that of the caliph Soliman who died of an indigestion,[12] in his camp near Kinnisrin or Chalcis in Syria as he was preparing to lead against Constantinople the remaining forces of the East. The brother of Moslemah was succeeded by a kinsman and an enemy and the throne of an active and able prince was degraded by the useless and pernicious virtues of a bigot. While he started and satisfied the scruples of a blind conscience, the siege was continued through the winter by the neglect, rather than by the resolution of the caliph Omar.[13] The winter proved uncommonly rigorous above a hundred days the ground was covered with deep snow and the natives of the sultry climes of Egypt and Arabia lay torpid and almost lifeless in their frozen camp. They revived on the return of spring a second effort had been made in their favour and their distress was relieved by the arrival of two numerous fleets laden with corn and arms, and soldiers the first from Alexandria, of four hundred transports and galleys the second of three hundred and sixty vessels from the ports of Africa. But the Greek fires were again kindled and if the destruction was less complete it was owing to the experience which had taught the Moslems to remain at a safe distance or to the perfidy of the Egyptian mariners who deserted with their ships to the emperor of the Christians. The trade and navigation of the capital were restored and the produce of the fisheries supplied the wants and even the luxury of the inhabitants. But the calamities of famine and disease were soon felt by the troops of Moslemah and as the former was miserably assuaged so the latter was dreadfully propagated by the pernicious nutriment which hunger compelled them to extract from the most unclean or unnatural food. The spirit of conquest and even of enthusiasm was extinct the Saracens could no longer straggle beyond their lines either single or in small parties without exposing themselves to the merciless retaliation of the Thracian peasants. An army of Bulgarians was attracted from the Danube by the gifts and promises of Leo, and these savage auxiliaries made some atonement for the evils which they had inflicted on the empire by the defeat and slaughter of twenty two thousand Asiatics. A report was dexterously scattered that the Franks the unknown nations of the Latin world were arming by sea and land in the defence of the Christian cause and their formidable aid was expected with far different sensations in the camp and city. At length after a siege of thirteen months,[14] the hopeless Moslemah received from the caliph the welcome permission of retreat. The march of the Arabian cavalry over the Hellespont and through the provinces of Asia was executed without delay or molestation but an army of their brethren had been cut in pieces on the side of Bithynia and the remains of the fleet were so repeatedly damaged by tempest and fire that only five galleys entered the port of Alexandria to relate the tale of their various and almost incredible disasters.[15]

In the two sieges the deliverance of Constantinople may be chiefly ascribed to the novelty the terrors and the real efficacy of the Greek fire.[16] The important secret of compounding and directing this artificial flame was imparted by Callinicus a native of Heliopolis in Syria who deserted from the service of the caliph to that of the emperor.[17] The skill of a chemist and engineer was equivalent to the succour of fleets and armies and this discovery or improvement of the military art was fortunately reserved for the distressful period when the degenerate Romans of the East were incapable of contending with the warlike enthusiasm and youthful vigour of the Saracens. The historian who presumes to analyse this extraordinary composition should suspect his own ignorance and that of his Byzantine guides so prone to the marvellous so careless and in this instance so jealous of the truth. From their obscure and perhaps fallacious hints it should seem that the principal ingredient of the Greek fire was the naphtha[18] or liquid bitumen a light tenacious and inflammable oil[19] which springs from the earth and catches fire as soon as it comes in contact with the air. The naphtha was mingled I know not by what methods or in what proportions, with sulphur and with the pitch that is extracted from evergreen firs [20] From this mixture which produced a thick smoke and a loud explosion, proceeded a fierce and obstinate flame which not only rose in perpendicular ascent but like wise burnt with equal vehemence in descent or lateral progress instead of being extinguished, it was nourished and quickened by the element of water, and sand urine or vinegar were the only remedies that could damp the fury of this powerful agent, which was justly denominated by the Greeks the liquid or the maritime fire For the annoyance of the enemy it was em ployed with equal effect by sea and land in battles or in sieges It was either poured from the rampart in large boilers or launched in red hot balls of stone and iron or darted in arrows and javelins twisted round with flax and tow which had deeply imbibed the inflammable oil sometimes it was deposited in fireships the vic tims and instruments of a more ample revenge, and was most commonly blown through long tubes of copper, which were planted on the prow of a galley and fancifully shaped into the mouths of savage monsters that seemed to vomit a stream of liquid and consuming fire This im portant art was preserved at Constantinople, as the palladium of the stage the galleys and artillery might occasionally be lent to the allies of Rome but the composition of the Greek fire was concealed with the most jealous scruple, and the terror of the enemies was increased and prolonged by their ignorance and surprise In the treatise of the administration of the empire the royal author[21] suggests the answers and ex cuses that might best elude the indiscreet curi osity and importunate demands of the barbari ans They should be told that the mystery of the Greek fire had been revealed by an angel to the first and greatest of the Constantines, with a sacred injunction that this gift of Heaven this peculiar blessing of the Romans should never be communicated to any foreign nation that the prince and subject were alike bound to re ligious silence under the temporal and spiritual penalties of treason and sacrilege and that the impious attempt would provoke the sudden and supernatural vengeance of the God of the Chris tians By these precautions the secret was con fined above four hundred years, to the Romans of the East and at the end of the eleventh cen tury the Pisans to whom every sea and every art were familiar, suffered the effects without understanding the composition, of the Greek fire It was at length either discovered or stolen by the Mohammedans and in the holy wars of Syria and Egypt, they retorted an invention, contrived against themselves on the heads of the Christians A knight, who despised the swords and lances of the Saracens relates with heartfelt sincerity his own fears and those of his companions at the sight and sound of the mischievous engine that discharged a torrent of the Greek fire the feu Gregeois as it is styled by the more early of the French writers It came flying through the air says Joinville [22] like a winged long tailed dragon, about the thickness of a hogshead with the report of thunder and the velocity of lightning and the darkness of the night was dispelled by this deadly illumination. The use of the Greek or, as it might now be called of the Saracen fire was continued to the middle of the fourteenth century [23] when the scientific or casual compound of nitre sulphur, and charcoal effected a new revolution in the art of war and the history of mankind [24]

Constantinople and the Greek fire might ex clude the Arabs from the eastern entrance of Europe but in the West, on the side of the Pyr enees the provinces of Gaul were threatened and invaded by the conquerors of Spain.[25] The decline of the French monarchy invited the attack of these insatiate fanatics The descen dants of Clovis had lost the inheritance of his martial and ferocious spirit and their misfor tune or demerit has affixed the epithet of lazy to the last kings of the Merovingian race [26] They ascended the throne without power, and sunk into the grave without a name A country pal ace in the neighbourhood of Compiègne [27] was allotted for their residence or prison but each year in the month of March or May they were conducted in a waggon drawn by oxen to the assembly of the Franks to give audience to for eign ambassadors and to ratify the acts of the mayor of the palace That domestic officer was become the minister of the nation and the mas ter of the prince A public employment was con verted into the patrimony of a private family the elder Pepin left a king of mature years un der the guardianship of his own widow and her child and these feeble regents were forcibly dis possessed by the most active of his bastards A government half savage and half corrupt was almost dissolved and the tributary dukes and provincial counts and the territorial lords were tempted to despise the weakness of the monarch and to imitate the ambition of the mayor Among these independent chiefs, one of the boldest and most successful was Eudes duke of Aquitain who in the southern provinces of Gaul usurped the authority and even the title of king The Goths the Gascons, and the

its assembled under the standard of this [Chr]istian hero he repelled the first invasion of [the] Saracens and Zama lieutenant of the [cali]ph, lost his army and his life under the walls [of T]oulouse The ambition of his successors was [stim]ulated by reveng they repassed the Pyr[ene]es with the means and the resolution of [con]quest. The advantageous situation which [had] recommended Narbonne[31] as the first Ro[man] colony was again chosen by the Moslems [the]y claimed the province of Septimania or [Lan]guedoc as a just dependence of the Spanish [mo]narchy the vineyards of Gascony and the [cit]y of Bordeaux were possessed by the sovereign [of] Damascus and Samarcand and the south of [Fr]ance, from the mouth of the Garonne to that [of] the Rhône, assumed the manners and religion [of] Arabia.

But these narrow limits were scorned by the [spi]rit of Abdalrahman or Abderame, who had [be]en restored by the caliph Hashem to the [wi]shes of the soldiers and people of Spain That [vet]eran and daring commander adjudged to [t]he obedience of the prophet whatever yet re[m]ained of France or Europe and prepared to [e]xecute the sentence at the head of a formi[d]able host, in the full confidence of surmounting [al]l opposition either of nature or of man His first care was to suppress a domestic rebel who commanded the most important passes of the Pyrenees Munuza a Moorish chief had accepted the alliance of the duke of Aquitain and Eudes, from a motive of private or public interest, devoted his beauteous daughter to the embraces of the African misbeliever But the strongest fortresses of Cerdagne were invested by a superior force the rebel was overtaken and slain in the mountains and his widow was sent a captive to Damascus to gratify the desires or more probably the vanity of the commander of the faithful From the Pyrenees Abderame proceeded without delay to the passage of the Rhône and the siege of Arles An army of Christians attempted the relief of the city the tombs of their leaders were yet visible in the thirteenth century and many thousands of their dead bodies were carried down the rapid stream into the Mediterranean Sea The arms of Abderame were not less successful on the side of the ocean. He passed without opposition the Garonne and Dordogne which unite their waters in the gulf of Bordeaux but he found beyond those rivers, the camp of the intrepid Eudes, who had formed a second army and sustained a second defeat, so fatal to the Christians that, according to their sad confession God alone could reckon the number of the slain The victorious Saracen overran the provinces of Aquitain whose Gallic names are disguised, rather than lost in the modern appellations of Perigord Saintonge, and Poitou his standards were planted on the walls or at least before the gates of Tours and of Sens and his detachments overspread the kingdom of Burgundy as far as the well known cities of Lyons and Besançon The memory of these devastations, for Abderame did not spare the country or the people was long preserved by tradition and the invasion of France by the Moors or Mohammedans affords the groundwork of those fables which have been so wildly disfigured in the romances of chivalry and so elegantly adorned by the Italian muse In the decline of society and art, the deserted cities could supply a slender booty to the Saracens their richest spoil was found in the churches and monasteries which they stripped of their ornaments and delivered to the flames and the tutelar saints, both Hilary of Poitiers and Martin of Tours, forgot their miraculous powers in the defence of their own sepulchres[32] A victorious line of march had been prolonged above a thousand miles from the rock of Gibraltar to the banks of the Loire the repetition of an equal space would have carried the Saracens to the confines of Poland and the Highlands of Scotland the Rhine is not more impassable than the Nile or Euphrates and the Arabian fleet might have sailed without a naval combat into the mouth of the Thames Perhaps the interpretation of the Koran would now be taught in the schools of Oxford and her pulpits might demonstrate to a circumcised people the sanctity and truth of the revelation of Mohammed[33]

From such calamities was Christendom delivered by the genius and fortune of one man. Charles the illegitimate son of the elder Pepin, was content with the titles of mayor or duke of the Franks but he deserved to become the father of a line of kings In a laborious administration of twenty four years he restored and supported the dignity of the throne, and the rebels of Germany and Gaul were successively crushed by the activity of a warrior who in the same campaign could display his banner on the Elbe the Rhône and the shores of the ocean. In the public danger he was summoned by the voice of his country and his rival the duke of Aquitain was reduced to appear among the fugitives and suppliants Alas! exclaimed the Franks what a misfortune! what an indignity! We have long heard of the name and conquests

of the Arabs we were apprehensive of their attack from the East they have now conquered Spain, and invade our country on the side of the West Yet their numbers and (since they have no buckler) their arms are inferior to our own' 'If you follow my advice replied the prudent mayor of the palace 'you will not interrupt their march nor precipitate your attack They are like a torrent which it is dangerous to stem in its career The thirst of riches and the consciousness of success redoubled their valour and valour is of more avail than arms or numbers Be patient till they have loaded themselves with the incumbrance of wealth The possession of wealth will divide their counsels and assure your victory' This subtle policy is perhaps a refinement of the Arabian writers and the situation of Charles will suggest a more narrow and selfish motive of procrastination the secret desire of humbling the pride and wasting the provinces of the rebel duke of Aquitain It is more probable that the delays of Charles were inevitable and reluctant A standing army was unknown under the first and second race more than half the kingdom was now in the hands of the Saracens according to their respective situation the Franks of Neustria and Austrasia were too conscious or too careless of the impending danger and the voluntary aids of the Gepidæ and Germans were separated by a long interval from the standard of the Christian general No sooner had he collected his forces than he sought and found the enemy in the centre of France between Tours and Poitiers His well conducted march was covered by a range of hills and Abderame appears to have been surprised by his unexpected presence The nations of Asia Africa and Europe advanced with equal ardour to an encounter which would change the history of the world In the six first days of desultory combat the horsemen and archers of the East maintained their advantage but in the closer onset of the seventh day the Orientals were oppressed by the strength and stature of the Germans who with stout hearts and iron hands [31] asserted the civil and religious freedom of their posterity The epithet of Martel the hammer which had been added to the name of Charles is expressive of his weighty and irresistible strokes the valour of Eudes was excited by resentment and emulation and their companions in the eve of history are the true Peers and Paladins of French chivalry After a bloody field, in which Abderame was slain the Saracens in the close of the evening retired to their camp In the disorder and despair of the night the various tribes of Yemen and Damascus, of Africa and Spain were provoked to turn their arms against each other the remains of their host were suddenly dissolved and each emir consulted his safety by a hasty and separate retreat At the dawn of day the stillness of a hostile camp was suspected by the victorious Christians on the report of their spies they ventured to explore the riches of the vacant tents but if we expect some celebrated relics a small portion of the spoil was restored to the innocent and lawful owners The joyful tidings were soon diffused over the Catholic world, and the monks of Italy could affirm and believe that three hundred and fifty, or three hundred and seventy five thousand of the Mohammedans had been crushed by the hammer of Charles [3] while no more than fifteen hundred Christians were slain in the field of Tours But this incredible tale is sufficiently disproved by the caution of the French general, who apprehended the snares and accidents of a pursuit and dismissed his German allies to their native forests The inactivity of a conqueror betrays the loss of strength and blood and the most cruel execution is inflicted not in the ranks of battle but on the backs of a flying enemy Yet the victory of the Franks was complete and final Aquitain was recovered by the arms of Eudes the Arabs never resumed the conquest of Gaul and they were soon driven beyond the Pyrenees by Charles Martel and his valiant race [33] It might have been expected that the saviour of Christendom would have been canonised or at least applauded by the gratitude of the clergy who are indebted to his sword for their present existence But in the public distress the mayor of the palace had been compelled to apply the riches or at least the revenues of the bishops and abbots to the relief of the state and the reward of the soldiers His merits were forgotten his sacrilege alone was remembered and in an epistle to a Carlovingian prince a Gallic synod presumes to declare that his ancestor was damned that on the opening of his tomb the spectators were affrighted by a smell of fire and the aspect of a horrid dragon, and that a saint of the times was indulged with a pleasant vision of the soul and body of Charles Martel burning, to all eternity in the abyss of hell [34]

The loss of an army or a province in the Western world was less painful to the court of Damascus than the rise and progress of a domestic competitor Except among the Syrians the caliphs of the house of Ommiyah had never been the objects of the public favour The life of

ammed recorded their perseverance in try and rebellion their conversion had reluctant, their elevation irregular and ous, and their throne was cemented with most holy and noble blood of Arabia The of their race the pious Omar was dissatis with his own title their personal virtues e insufficient to justify a departure from the er of succession and the eyes and wishes of faithful were turned towards the line of shem and the kindred of the apostle of God these the Fatimites were either rash or pusil nimous but the descendants of Abbas cher ed with courage and discretion the hopes of ir rising fortunes From an obscure residence Syria, they secretly despatched their agents d missionaries who preached in the Eastern ovinces their hereditary indefeasible right d Mohammed the son of Ali the son of Abdallah, the son of Abbas the uncle of the proph , gave audience to the deputies of Chorasan nd accepted their free gift of four hundred housand pieces of gold After the death of Moammed, the oath of allegiance was adminis ered in the name of his son Ibrahim to a nu merous band of votaries, who expected only a signal and a leader and the governor of Chora san continued to deplore his fruitless admoni tions and the deadly slumber of the caliphs of Damascus till he himself with all his adherents, was driven from the city and palace of Meru by the rebellious arms of Abu Moslem.[33] That maker of kings, the author as he is named of the call of the Abbassides was at length reward ed for his presumption of merit with the usual gratitude of courts A mean, perhaps a foreign extraction could not repress the aspiring energy of Abu Moslem. Jealous of his wives liberal of his wealth, prodigal of his own blood and of that of others, he could boast with pleasure and possibly with truth that he had destroyed six hundred thousand of his enemies and such was the intrepid gravity of his mind and counte nance that he was never seen to smile except on a day of battle In the visible separation of par ties, the green was consecrated to the Fatimites the Ommiades were distinguished by the white and the black as the most adverse was naturally adopted by the Abbassides Their turbans and garments were stained with that gloomy colour two black standards on pike staves nine cubits long, were borne aloft in the van of Abu Moslem and their allegorical names of the night and the shadow obscurely represented the indissoluble union and perpetual succession of the line of Hashem. From the Indus to the Euphrates the East was convulsed by the quarrel of the white and the black factions the Abbassides were most frequently victorious but their public success was clouded by the personal misfor tune of their chief The court of Damascus awakening from a long slumber resolved to prevent the pilgrimage of Mecca which Ibra him had undertaken with a splendid retinue to recommend himself at once to the favour of the prophet and of the people A detachment of cavalry intercepted his march and arrested his person and the unhappy Ibrahim snatched away from the promise of untasted royalty ex pired in iron fetters in the dungeons of Haran His two younger brothers Saffah and Almansor eluded the search of the tyrant and lay con cealed at Cufa till the zeal of the people and the approach of his Eastern friends allowed them to expose their persons to the impatient public. On Friday in the dress of a caliph in the colours of the sect Saffah proceeded with religious and military pomp to the mosch ascending the pulpit, he prayed and preached as the lawful successor of Mohammed and after his departure his kinsmen bound a willing people by an oath of fidelity But it was on the banks of the Zab and not in the mosch of Cufa that this important controversy was deter mined Every advantage appeared to be on the side of the white faction the authority of es tablished government an army of a hundred and twenty thousand soldiers, against a sixth part of that number and the presence and mer it of the caliph Mervan the fourteenth and last of the house of Ommiyah Before his accession to the throne he had deserved by his Georgian warfare the honourable epithet of the ass of Mesopotamia[34] and he might have been ranked among the greatest princes had not says Abulfeda the eternal order decreed that moment for the ruin of his family a decree against which all human prudence and fortitude must struggle in vain The orders of Mervan were mistaken or disobeyed the return of his horse from which he had dismounted on a necessary occasion impressed the belief of his death and the enthusiasm of the black squadrons was ably conducted by Abdallah the uncle of his com petitor After an irretrievable defeat the caliph escaped to Mosul but the colours of the Abbas sides were displayed from the rampart he sud denly repassed the Tigris cast a melancholy look on his palace of Haran crossed the Euphrates abandoned the fortifications of Damas cus and without halting in Palestine pitched his last and fatal camp at Busir on the banks of the Nile [7] His speed was urged by the incessant diligence of Abdallah, who in every step of the pursuit acquired strength and reputation the remains of the white faction were finally vanquished in Egypt and the lance, which terminated the life and anxiety of Mervan was not less welcome perhaps to the unfortunate than to the victorious chief The merciless inquisition of the conqueror eradicated the most distant branches of the hostile race their bones were scattered, their memory was accursed and the martyrdom of Hossein was abundantly revenged on the posterity of his tyrants Fourscore of the Ommiades who had yielded to the faith or clemency of their foes were invited to a banquet at Damascus The laws of hospitality were violated by a promiscuous massacre the board was spread over their fallen bodies, and the festivity of the guests was enlivened by the music of their dying groans By the event of the civil war the dynasty of the Abbassides was firmly established but the Christians only could triumph in the mutual hatred and common loss of the disciples of Mohammed [38]

Yet the thousands who were swept away by the sword of war might have been speedily retrieved in the succeeding generation if the consequences of the revolution had not tended to dissolve the power and unity of the empire of the Saracens In the proscription of the Ommiades a royal youth of the name of Abdalrahman alone escaped the rage of his enemies who hunted the wandering exile from the banks of the Euphrates to the valleys of Mount Atlas His presence in the neighbourhood of Spain revived the zeal of the white faction The name and cause of the Abbassides had been first vindicated by the Persians the West had been pure from civil arms and the servants of the abdicated family still held by a precarious tenure the inheritance of their lands and the offices of government Strongly prompted by gratitude indignation and fear they invited the grandson of the caliph Hashem to ascend the throne of his ancestors and in his desperate condition the extremes of rashness and prudence were almost the same The acclamations of the people saluted his landing on the coast of Andalusia and after a successful struggle Abdalrahman established the throne of Cordova and was the father of the Ommiades of Spain who reigned above two hundred and fifty years from the Atlantic to the Pyrenees [39] He slew in battle a lieutenant of the Abbassides who had invaded his dominions with a fleet and army the head of Ala in salt and camphire was suspended by a daring messenger before the palace of Mecca and the caliph Almansor rejoiced in his safety that he was removed by seas and lands from such a formidable adversary Their mutual designs or declarations of offensive war evaporated without effect but instead of opening a door to the conquest of Europe Spain was dissevered from the trunk of the monarchy engaged in perpetual hostility with the East and inclined to peace and friendship with the Christian sovereigns of Constantinople and France. The example of the Ommiades was imitated by the real or fictitious progeny of Ali the Edrissites of Mauritania, and the more powerful Fatimites of Africa and Egypt In the tenth century the chair of Mohammed was disputed by three caliphs or commanders of the faithful, who reigned at Bagdad Cairoan and Cordova, excommunicated each other, and agreed only in a principle of discord, that a sectary is more odious and criminal than an unbeliever [40]

Mecca was the patrimony of the line of Hashem yet the Abbassides were never tempted to reside either in the birthplace or the city of the prophet Damascus was disgraced by the choice and polluted with the blood of the Ommiades and after some hesitation Almansor the brother and successor of Saffah laid the foundations of Bagdad,[41] the Imperial seat of his posterity during a reign of five hundred years [42] The chosen spot is on the eastern bank of the Tigris about fifteen miles above the ruins of Modain the double wall was of a circular form and such was the rapid increase of a capital now dwindled to a provincial town that the funeral of a popular saint might be attended by eight hundred thousand men and sixty thousand women of Bagdad and the adjacent villages In this city of peace [43] amidst the riches of the East the Abbassides soon disdained the abstinence and frugality of the first caliphs and aspired to emulate the magnificence of the Persian kings After his wars and buildings Almansor left behind him in gold and silver about thirty millions sterling [44] and this treasure was exhausted in a few years by the vices or virtues of his children His son Mahadi in a single pilgrimage to Mecca expended six millions of dinars of gold A pious and charitable motive may sanctify the foundation of cisterns and caravanseras which he distributed along a measured road of seven hundred miles but his train of camels laden with snow could serve only to astonish the natives of Arabia and to refresh the fruits and liquors of the royal banquet.[45] The courtiers would surely praise the liberality of his grandson Almamon who gave away four fifths of the income of a province, a sum of two millions four hundred thousand gold dinars, before he drew his foot from the stirrup At the nuptials of the same prince a thousand pearls of the largest size were showered on the head of the bride [46] and a lottery of lands and houses displayed the capricious bounty of for tune The glories of the court were brightened rather than impaired in the decline of the em pire and a Greek ambassador might admire or pity the magnificence of the feeble Moctader "The caliph s whole army says the historian Abulfeda both horse and foot was under arms, which together made a body of one hun dred and sixty thousand men. His state officers the favourite slaves stood near him in splendid apparel their belts glittering with gold and gems. Near them were seven thousand eunuchs, four thousand of them white the remainder black. The porters or doorkeepers were in num ber seven hundred Barges and boats with the most superb decorations were seen swimming upon the Tigris. Nor was the palace itself less splendid in which were hung up thirty-eight thousand pieces of tapestry twelve thousand five hundred of which were of silk embroidered with gold. The carpets on the floor were twenty two thousand. A hundred lions were brought out, with a keeper to each lion [47] Among the other spectacles of rare and stupendous luxury was a tree of gold and silver spreading into eighteen large branches, on which and on the lesser boughs, sat a variety of birds made of the same precious metals as well as the leaves of the tree. While the machinery affected spontaneous motions, the several birds warbled their natural harmony Through this scene of magnificence the Greek ambassador was led by the vizir to the foot of the caliph s throne. [48] In the West the Ommiades of Spain supported with equal pomp the title of commander of the faithful Three miles from Cordova in honour of his favourite sultana the third and greatest of the Abdalrahmans constructed the city palace and gardens of Zehra Twenty five years, and above three millions sterling were employed by the founder his liberal taste invited the artists of Constantinople the most skilful sculptors and architects of the age and the buildings were sustained or adorned by twelve hundred col umns of Spanish and African of Greek and Italian marble The hall of audience was en crusted with gold and pearls and a great basin in the centre was surrounded with the curious and costly figures of birds and quadrupeds In a lofty pavilion of the gardens one of these ba sins and fountains so delightful in a sultry cli mate was replenished not with water but with the purest quicksilver The seraglio of Abdal rahman his wives concubines and black eu nuchs, amounted to six thousand three hundred persons and he was attended to the field by a guard of twelve thousand horse whose belts and scimitars were studded with gold [49]

In a private condition our desires are per petually repressed by poverty and subordina tion but the lives and labours of millions are devoted to the service of a despotic prince whose laws are blindly obeyed and whose wishes are instantly gratified Our imagination is daz zled by the splendid picture and whatever may be the cool dictates of reason there are few among us who would obstinately refuse a trial of the comforts and the cares of royalty It may therefore be of some use to borrow the experi ence of the same Abdalrahman whose magnifi cence has perhaps excited our admiration and envy and to transcribe an authentic memorial which was found in the closet of the deceased caliph I have now reigned above fifty years in victory or peace beloved by my subjects, dreaded by my enemies and respected by my allies Riches and honours, power and pleasure have waited on my call nor does any earthly blessing appear to have been wanting to my felicity In this situation I have diligently num-bered the days of pure and genuine happiness which have fallen to my lot they amount to FOURTEEN —O man! place not thy confidence in this present world! [50] The luxury of the caliphs, so useless to their private happiness re laxed the nerves and terminated the progress, of the Arabian empire Temporal and spiritual conquest had been the sole occupation of the first successors of Mohammed and after sup-plying themselves with the necessaries of life the whole revenue was scrupulously devoted to that salutary work. The Abbassides were im poverished by the multitude of their wants and their contempt of economy Instead of pursuing the great object of ambition their leisure their affections the powers of their mind were di verted by pomp and pleasure the rewards of valour were embezzled by women and eu nuchs, and the royal camp was encumbered by the luxury of the palace A similar temper was diffused among the subjects of the caliph Their stern enthusiasm was softened by time and prosperity they sought riches in the occupa tions of industry fame in the pursuits of litera ture, and happiness in the tranquillity of domestic life War was no longer the passion of the Saracens, and the increase of pay the repetition of donatives were insufficient to allure the posterity of those voluntary champions who had crowded to the standard of Abubeker and Omar for the hopes of spoil and of paradise

Under the reign of the Ommiades the studies of the Moslems were confined to the interpretation of the Koran, and the eloquence and poetry of their native tongue A people continually exposed to the dangers of the field must esteem the healing powers of medicine, or rather of surgery but the starving physicians of Arabia murmured a complaint that exercise and temperance deprived them of the greatest part of their practice [51] After their civil and domestic wars the subjects of the Abbassides awakening from this mental lethargy found leisure and felt curiosity for the acquisition of profane science This spirit was first encouraged by the caliph Almansor who besides his knowledge of the Mohammedan law had applied himself with success to the study of astronomy But when the sceptre devolved to Almamon the seventh of the Abbassides he completed the designs of his grandfather and invited the Muses from their ancient seats His ambassadors at Constantinople his agents in Armenia Syria and Egypt, collected the volumes of Grecian science at his command they were translated by the most skilful interpreters into the Arabic language his subjects were exhorted assiduously to peruse these instructive writings and the successor of Mohammed assisted with pleasure and modesty at the assemblies and disputations of the learned 'He was not ignorant,' says Abulpharagius 'that they are the elect of God his best and most useful servants whose lives are devoted to the improvement of their rational faculties The mean ambition of the Chinese or the Turks may glory in the industry of their hands or the indulgence of their brutal appetites Yet these dexterous artists must view, with hopeless emulation the hexagons and pyramids of the cells of a beehive [52] these fortitudinous heroes are awed by the superior fierceness of the lions and tigers and in their amorous enjoyments they are much inferior to the vigour of the grossest and most sordid quadrupeds The teachers of wisdom are the true luminaries and legislators of a world which without their aid would again sink in ignorance and barbarism' [53] The zeal and curiosity of Almamon were imitated by succeeding princes of the line of Abbas their rivals the Fatimites of Africa and the Ommiades of Spain were the patrons of the learned as well as the commanders of the faithful the same royal prerogative was claimed by their independent emirs of the provinces and their emulation diffused the taste and the rewards of science from Samarcand and Bochara to Fez and Cordova The vizir of a sultan consecrated a sum of two hundred thousand pieces of gold to the foundation of a college at Bagdad, which he endowed with an annual revenue of fifteen thousand dinars The fruits of instruction were communicated, perhaps at different times, to six thousand disciples of every degree from the son of the noble to that of the mechanic a sufficient allowance was provided for the indigent scholars and the merit or industry of the professors was repaid with adequate stipends. In every city the productions of Arabic literature were copied and collected by the curiosity of the studious and the vanity of the rich A private doctor refused the invitation of the sultan of Bochara because the carriage of his books would have required four hundred camels The royal library of the Fatimites consisted of one hundred thousand manuscripts elegantly transcribed and splendidly bound which were lent, without jealousy or avarice to the students of Cairo Yet this collection must appear moderate if we can believe that the Ommiades of Spain had formed a library of six hundred thousand volumes forty four of which were employed in the mere catalogue Their capital, Cordova with the adjacent towns of Malaga Almeria and Murcia had given birth to more than three hundred writers and above seventy public libraries were opened in the cities of the Andalusian kingdom The age of Arabian learning continued about five hundred years till the great eruption of the Moguls and was coeval with the darkest and most slothful period of European annals but since the sun of science has arisen in the West it should seem that the Oriental studies have languished and declined [54]

In the libraries of the Arabians as in those of Europe the far greater part of the innumerable volumes were possessed only of local value or imaginary merit [55] The shelves were crowded with orators and poets whose style was adapted to the taste and manners of their countrymen with general and partial histories which each revolving generation supplied with a new harvest of persons and events with codes and commentaries of jurisprudence which derived their authority from the law of the prophet with the interpreters of the Koran and orthodox tradition and with the whole theological tribe polemics mystics scholastics, and moralists, the first or the last of writers, according to the dif ferent estimates of sceptics or believers. The works of speculation or science may be reduced to the four classes of philosophy mathematics astronomy and physic. The sages of Greece were translated and illustrated in the Arabic language and some treatises now lost in the original, have been recovered in the versions of the East,[16] which possessed and studied the writings of Aristotle and Plato of Euclid and Apollonius, of Ptolemy Hippocrates and Ga len.[17] Among the ideal systems which have varied with the fashion of the times, the Arabi ans adopted the philosophy of the Stagirit alike intelligible or alike obscure for the readers of every age. Plato wrote for the Athenians, and his allegorical genius is too closely blended with the language and religion of Greece. After the fall of that religion the Peripatetics, emerging from their obscurity prevailed in the contro versies of the Oriental sects and their founder was long afterwards restored by the Moham medans of Spain to the Latin schools[18] The physics, both of the Academy and the Lycæum, as they are built, not on observation but on ar gument, have retarded the progress of real knowledge. The metaphysics of infinite or fi nite spirit have too often been enlisted in the service of superstition But the human faculties are fortified by the art and practice of dialec tics the ten predicaments of Aristot e collect and methodise our ideas,[19] and his syllogism is the keenest weapon of dispute It was dexter ously wielded in the schools of the Saracens, but, as it is more effectual for the detection of error than for the investigation of truth, it is not surprising that new generations of masters and disciples should still revolve in the same circle of logical argument. The mathematics are dis tinguished by a peculiar privilege, that, in the course of ages, they may always advance and can never recede But the ancient geometry if I am not misinformed, was resumed in the same state by the Italians of the fifteenth cen tury and whatever may be the origin of the name the science of algebra is ascribed to the Grecian Diophantus by the modest testimony of the Arabs themselves[20] They cultivated with more success the sublime science of astronomy which elevates the mind of man to disdain his diminutive planet and momentary existence The costly instruments of observation were sup plied by the caliph Almamon and the land of the Chaldeans still afforded the same spacious level, and the same unclouded horizon. In the plains of Sinaar and a second time in those of Cufa his mathematicians accurately measured a degree of the great circle of the earth and de termined at twenty four thousand miles the en tire circumference of our globe[21] From the reign of the Abbassides to that of the grandchildren of Tamerlane the stars without the aid of glasses were diligently observed and the astro nomical tables of Bagdad Spain and Samar cand[22] correct some minute errors, without dar ing to renounce the hypothesis of Ptolemy with out advancing a step towards the discovery of the solar system In the eastern courts the truths of science could be recommended only by ignorance and folly and the astronomer would have been disregarded had he not de based his wisdom or honesty by the vain predic tions of astrology[23] But in the science of medi cine the Arabians have been deservedly ap plauded The names of Mesua and Geber of Razis and Avicenna are ranked with the Gre cian masters in the city of Bagdad eight hun dred and sixty physicians were licensed to exer cise their lucrative profession[24] in Spain the life of the Catholic princes was intrusted to the skill of the Saracens,[25] and the school of Salerno their legitimate offspring revived in Italy and Europe the precepts of the healing art.[26] The success of each professor must have been influ enced by personal and accidental causes but we may form a less fanciful estimate of their general knowledge of anatomy[27] botany[28] and chemistry[29] the threefold basis of their theory and practice A superstitious reverence for the dead confined both the Greeks and the Arabi ans to the dissection of apes and quadrupeds the more solid and visible parts were known in the time of Galen and the finer scrutiny of the human frame was reserved for the microscope and the injections of modern artists. Botany is an active science, and the discoveries of the torrid zone might enrich the herbal of Dios corides with two thousand plants Some tradi tionary knowledge might be secreted in the temples and monasteries of Egypt much useful experience had been acquired in the practice of arts and manufactures but the science of chem istry owes its origin and improvement to the industry of the Saracens They first invented and named the alembic for the purposes of dis tillation analysed the substances of the three kingdoms of nature tried the distinction and affinities of alcalis and acids and converted the poisonous minerals into soft and salutary med icines But the most eager search of Arabian chemistry was the transmutation of metals and the elixir of immortal health the reason and the fortunes of thousands were evaporated in the crucibles of alchymy and the consummation of the great work was promoted by the worthy aid of mystery, fable and superstition

But the Moslems deprived themselves of the principal benefits of a familiar intercourse with Greece and Rome, the knowledge of antiquity the purity of taste, and the freedom of thought. Confident in the riches of their native tongue, the Arabians disdained the study of any foreign idiom The Greek interpreters were chosen among their Christian subjects, they formed their translations sometimes on the original text more frequently perhaps on a Syriac version and in the crowd of astronomers and physicians there is no example of a poet an orator, or even an historian, being taught to speak the language of the Saracens [70] The mythology of Homer would have provoked the abhorrence of those stern fanatics they possessed in lazy ignorance the colonies of the Macedonians and the provinces of Carthage and Rome the heroes of Plutarch and Livy were buried in oblivion and the history of the world before Mohammed was reduced to a short legend of the patriarchs the prophets and the Persian kings Our education in the Greek and Latin schools may have fixed in our minds a standard of exclusive taste, and I am not forward to condemn the literature and judgment of nations of whose language I am ignorant Yet I know that the classics have much to teach, and I believe that the Orientals have much to learn the temperate dignity of style the graceful proportions of art the forms of visible and intellectual beauty the just delineation of character and passion the rhetoric of narrative and argument the regular fabric of epic and dramatic poetry [71] The influ*ence of truth and reason is of a less ambiguous* complexion The philosophers of Athens and Rome enjoyed the blessings and asserted the rights, of civil and religious freedom Their moral and political writings might have gradually unlocked the fetters of Eastern despotism diffused a liberal spirit of inquiry and toleration and encouraged the Arabian sages to sus*pect that their caliph was a tyrant, and their* prophet an impostor [72] The instinct of superstition was alarmed by the introduction even of the abstract sciences and the more rigid doc*tors of the* law condemned the rash and pernicious curiosity of Almamon [73] To the thirst of martyrdom the vision of paradise and the belief of predestination we must ascribe the invincible enthusiasm of the prince and people And the sword of the Saracens became *less for*midable when their youth was drawn away from the camp to the college when the armies of the faithful presumed to read and to reflect. Yet the foolish vanity of the Greeks was jealous of their studies and reluctantly imparted the sacred fire to the barbarians of the East.[74]

In the bloody conflict of the Ommiades and Abbassides the Greeks had stolen the opportunity of avenging their wrongs and enlarging their limits But a severe retribution was exacted by Mohadi the third caliph of the new dynasty *who seized in his turn the favourable oppor*tunity, while a woman and a child, Irene and Constantine were seated on the Byzantine throne An army of ninety five thousand Persians and Arabs was sent from the Tigris to the Thracian Bosphorus under the command of Harun [75] or Aaron the second son of the commander of the faithful His encampment on the opposite heights of Chrysopolis or Scutari informed Irene in her palace of Constantinople, of the loss of her troops and provinces With the consent or connivance of their sovereign her ministers subscribed an ignominious peace and the exchange of some royal *gifts could not dis*guise the annual tribute of seventy thousand dinars of gold which was imposed on the Roman empire The Saracens had too rashly ad*vanced into the midst of a distant* and hostile land their retreat was solicited by the promise of faithful guides and plentiful markets and not a Greek had courage to whisper that their weary forces might be surrounded and destroyed in their necessary passage between a slippery mountain and the river Sangarius Five years after this expedition Harun ascended the throne of his father and his elder brother the most *powerful and vigorous monarch of his race il*lustrious in the West as the ally of Charlemagne and familiar to the most childish readers as the perpetual hero of the Arabian tales His title to the name of Al Rashid (the Just) is sullied by the extirpation of the generous perhaps the innocent Barmecides yet he could listen to the complaint of a poor widow who had been pillaged by his troops and who dared in a pas*sage of the Koran to threaten the inattentive* despot with the judgment of God and posterity His court was adorned with luxury and science but in a reign of three and twenty years Harun repeatedly visited his provinces from Chorasan to Egypt nine times he performed the pilgrimage of Mecca eight times he invaded the territories of the Romans and as often as they declined the payment of the tribute they were taught to feel that a month of depredation was more costly than a year of submission But when the unnatural mother of Constantine was deposed and banished her successor Nicephorus, resolved to obliterate this badge of servitude and disgrace The epistle of the emperor to the caliph was pointed with an allusion to the game of chess, which had already spread from Persia to Greece The queen (he spoke of Irene) considered you as a rook and herself as a pawn That pusillanimous female submitted to pay a tribute the double of which she ought to have exacted from the barbarians Restore therefore the fruits of your injustice or abide the determination of the sword At these words the ambassadors cast a bundle of swords before the foot of the throne. The caliph smiled at the menace and drawing his scimitar samsamah a weapon of historic or fabulous renown he cut asunder the feeble arms of the Greeks without turning the edge or endangering the temper of his blade He then dictated an epistle of tremendous brevity In the name of the most merciful God Harun al Rashid commander of the faithful to Nicephorus, the Roman dog I have read thy letter O thou son of an unbelieving mother Thou shalt not hear thou shalt behold my reply It was written in characters of blood and fire on the plains of Phrygia and the warlike celerity of the Arabs could only be checked by the arts of deceit and the show of repentance The triumphant caliph retired after the fatigues of the campaign to his favourite palace of Racca on the Euphrates[76] but the distance of five hundred miles and the inclemency of the season encouraged his adversary to violate the peace Nicephorus was astonished by the bold and rapid march of the commander of the faithful who repassed in the depth of winter the snows of Mount Taurus his stratagems of policy and war were exhausted and the perfidious Greek escaped with three wounds from a field of battle overspread with forty thousand of his subjects Yet the emperor was ashamed of submission and the caliph was resolved on victory One hundred and thirty five thousand regular soldiers received pay and were inscribed in the military roll and above three hundred thousand persons of every denomination marched under the black standard of the Abbassides. They swept the surface of Asia Minor far beyond Tyana and Ancyra and invested the Pontic Heraclea,[77] once a flourishing state, now a paltry town at that time capable of sustaining in her antique walls a month's siege against the forces of the East. The ruin was complete, the spoil was ample but if Harun had been conversant with Grecian story he would have regretted the statue of Hercules, whose attributes, the club the bow the quiver and the lion's hide were sculptured in massy gold The progress of desolation by sea and land from the Euxine to the isle of Cyprus compelled the emperor Nicephorus to retract his haughty defiance. In the new treaty the ruins of Heraclea were left for ever as a lesson and a trophy and the coin of the tribute was marked with the image and superscription of Harun and his three sons[78] Yet this plurality of lords might contribute to remove the dishonour of the Roman name After the death of their father the heirs of the caliph were involved in civil discord and the conqueror the liberal Almamon was sufficiently engaged in the restoration of domestic peace and the introduction of foreign science

Under the reign of Almamon at Bagdad of Michael the Stammerer at Constantinople the islands of Crete[79] and Sicily were subdued by the Arabs The former of these conquests is disdained by their own writers, who were ignorant of the fame of Jupiter and Minos but it has not been overlooked by the Byzantine historians, who now begin to cast a clearer light on the affairs of their own times[80] A band of Andalusian volunteers discontented with the climate or government of Spain explored the adventures of the sea but as they sailed in no more than ten or twenty galleys, their warfare must be branded with the name of piracy As the subjects and sectaries of the white party they might lawfully invade the dominions of the black caliphs A rebellious faction introduced them into Alexandria[81] they cut in pieces both friends and foes, pillaged the churches and the moschs sold above six thousand Christian captives, and maintained their station in the capital of Egypt till they were oppressed by the forces and the presence of Almamon himself From the mouth of the Nile to the Hellespont the islands and sea-coasts both of the Greeks and Moslems were exposed to their depredations they saw they envied they tasted the fertility of Crete and soon returned with forty galleys to a more serious attack. The Andalusians wandered over the land fearless and unmolested but when they descended with their plunder to the sea shore, their vessels were in flames and their chief Abu Caab confessed himself the author of the mischief Their clamours accused his madness or treachery Of what do you complain? replied the crafty emir I have brought you to a land flowing with milk and honey Here is your true country repose from your toils and forget the barren place of your nativity ' ' And our wives and children? ' Your beauteous captives will supply the place of your wives, and in their embraces you will soon become the fathers of a new progeny ' The first habitation was their camp, with a ditch and rampart in the bay of Suda, but an apostate monk led them to a more desirable position in the eastern parts, and the name of Candax, their fortress and colony has been extended to the whole island under the corrupt and modern appellation of Candia The hundred cities of the age of Minos were diminished to thirty and of these only one most probably Cydonia had courage to retain the substance of freedom and the profession of Christianity The Saracens of Crete soon repaired the loss of their navy and the timbers of Mount Ida were launched into the main During a hostile period of one hundred and thirty-eight years the princes of Constantinople attacked these licentious corsairs with fruitless curses and ineffectual arms

The loss of Sicily[82] was occasioned by an act of superstitious rigour An amorous youth who had stolen a nun from her cloister, was sentenced by the emperor to the amputation of his tongue Euphemius appealed to the reason and policy of the Saracens of Africa and soon returned with the Imperial purple a fleet of one hundred ships and an army of seven hundred horse and ten thousand foot They landed at Mazara near the ruins of the ancient Selinus but after some partial victories Syracuse[83] was delivered by the Greeks the apostate was slain before her walls and his African friends were reduced to the necessity of feeding on the flesh of their own horses In their turn they were relieved by a powerful reinforcement of their brethren of Andalusia the largest and western part of the island was gradually reduced and the commodious harbour of Palermo was chosen for the seat of the naval and military power of the Saracens Syracuse preserved about fifty years the faith which she had sworn to Christ and to Cæsar In the last and fatal siege her citizens displayed some remnant of the spirit which had formerly resisted the powers of Athens and Carthage They stood above twenty days against the battering rams and catapultæ the mines and tortoises of the besiegers and the place might have been relieved, if the mariners of the Imperial fleet had not been detained at Constantinople in building a church to the Virgin Mary The deacon Theodosius with the bishop and clergy was dragged in chains from the altar to Palermo cast into a subterraneous dungeon and exposed to the hourly peril of death or apostasy His pathetic, and not inelegant complaint may be read as the epitaph of his country[84] From the Roman conquest to this final calamity Syracuse now dwindled to the primitive isle of Ortygea had insensibly declined Yet the relics were still precious the plate of the cathedral weighed five thousand pounds of silver the entire spoil was computed at one million of pieces of gold (about four hundred thousand pounds sterling) and the captives must outnumber the seventeen thousand Christians who were transported from the sack of Tauromenium into African servitude In Sicily the religion and language of the Greeks were eradicated and such was the docility of the rising generation that fifteen thousand boys were circumcised and clothed on the same day with the son of the Fatimite caliph The Arabian squadrons issued from the harbours of Palermo Biserta and Tunis a hundred and fifty towns of Calabria and Campania were attacked and pillaged nor could the suburbs of Rome be defended by the name of the Cæsars and apostles. Had the Mohammedans been united Italy must have fallen an easy and glorious accession to the empire of the prophet But the caliphs of Bagdad had lost their authority in the West the Aglabites and Fatimites usurped the provinces of Africa their emirs of Sicily aspired to independence and the design of conquest and dominion was degraded to a repetition of predatory inroads[85]

In the sufferings of prostrate Italy the name of Rome awakens a solemn and mournful recollection A fleet of Saracens from the African coast presumed to enter the mouth of the Tiber and to approach a city which even yet in her fallen state was revered as the metropolis of the Christian world The gates and ramparts were guarded by a trembling people but the tombs and temples of St Peter and St Paul were left exposed in the suburbs of the Vatican and of the Ostian way Their invisible sanctity had protected them against the Goths the Vandals, and the Lombards but the Arabs disdained both the Gospel and the legend and their rapacious spirit was approved and animated by the precepts of the Koran. The Christian idols were stripped of their costly offerings a silver altar was torn away from the shrine of St Peter and if the bodies or the buildings were left entire their deliverance must be imputed to the haste rather than the scruples of the Saracens In their course along the Appian way they pillaged fused and besieged Gaeta but they had turned aside from the walls of Rome and by their divisions, the Capitol was saved from the yoke of the prophet of Mecca The same danger still impended on the heads of the Roman people and their domestic force was unequal to the assault of an African emir They claimed the protection of their Latin sovereign but the Carlovingian standard was overthrown by a detachment of the barbarians they meditated the restoration of the Greek emperors but the attempt was treasonable and the succour remote and precarious [46] Their distress appeared to receive some aggravation from the death of their spiritual and temporal chief but the pressing emergency superseded the forms and intrigues of an election and the unanimous choice of Pope Leo the Fourth[47] was the safety of the church and city This pontiff was born a Roman the courage of the first ages of the republic glowed in his breast and amidst the ruins of his country he stood erect, like one of the firm and lofty columns that rear their heads above the fragments of the Roman forum. The first days of his reign were consecrated to the purification and removal of relics to prayers and processions, and to all the solemn offices of religion, which served at least to heal the imagination and restore the hopes of the multitude The public defence had been long neglected not from the presumption of peace, but from the distress and poverty of the times As far as the scantiness of his means and the shortness of his leisure would allow the ancient walls were repaired by the command of Leo fifteen towers in the most accessible stations were built or renewed two of these commanded on either side the Tiber and an iron chain was drawn across the stream to impede the ascent of a hostile navy The Romans were assured of a short respite by the welcome news that the siege of Gaeta had been raised and that a part of the enemy with their sacrilegious plunder had perished in the waves

But the storm which had been delayed soon burst upon them with redoubled violence. The Aglabite, who reigned in Africa, had inherited from his father a treasure and an army a fleet of Arabs and Moors, after a short refreshment in the harbours of Sardinia cast anchor before the mouth of the Tiber sixteen miles from the city and their discipline and numbers appeared to threaten not a transient inroad but a serious design of conquest and dominion. But the vigilance of Leo had formed an alliance with the vassals of the Greek empire the free and maritime states of Gaeta Naples, and Amalfi and in the hour of danger their galleys appeared in the port of Ostia under the command of Cæsarius, the son of the Neapolitan duke a noble and valiant youth who had already vanquished the fleets of the Saracens. With his principal companions Cæsarius was invited to the Lateran palace and the dexterous pontiff affected to inquire their errand and to accept with joy and surprise their providential succour The city bands in arms attended their father to Ostia where he reviewed and blessed his generous deliverers They kissed his feet, received the communion with martial devotion and listened to the prayer of Leo that the same God who had supported St Peter and St. Paul on the waves of the sea would strengthen the hands of his champions against the adversaries of his holy name After a similar prayer and with equal resolution the Moslems advanced to the attack of the Christian galleys, which preserved their advantageous station along the coast. The victory inclined to the side of the allies, when it was less gloriously decided in their favour by a sudden tempest which confounded the skill and courage of the stoutest mariners. The Christians were sheltered in a friendly harbour while the Africans were scattered and dashed in pieces among the rocks and islands of a hostile shore Those who escaped from shipwreck and hunger neither found nor deserved mercy at the hands of their implacable pursuers The sword and the gibbet reduced the dangerous multitude of captives and the remainder was more usefully employed to restore the sacred edifices which they had attempted to subvert The pontiff at the head of the citizens and allies, paid his grateful devotion at the shrines of the apostles and among the spoils of this naval victory thirteen Arabian bows of pure and massy silver were suspended round the altar of the fisherman of Galilee. The reign of Leo the Fourth was employed in the defence and ornament of the Roman state. The churches were renewed and embellished near four thousand pounds of silver were consecrated to repair the losses of St Peter and his sanctuary was decorated with a plate of gold of the weight of two hundred and sixteen pounds embossed with the portraits of the pope and emperor and encircled with a string of pearls Yet this vain magnificence reflects less glory on the character of Leo than the paternal care with which he rebuilt the walls of Horta and Ameria and transported the wandering inhabitants of Centumcellæ to his new foundation of Leopolis

They stood above twenty days against the battering rams and catapultæ the mines and tortoises of the besiegers and the place might have been relieved if the mariners of the Imperial fleet had not been detained at Constantinople in building a church to the Virgin Mary The deacon Theodosius with the bishop and clergy, was dragged in chains from the altar to Palermo, cast into a subterraneous dungeon and exposed to the hourly peril of death or apostasy His pathetic, and not inelegant complaint may be read as the epitaph of his country[84] From the Roman conquest to this final calamity Syracuse, now dwindled to the primitive isle of Ortygea had insensibly declined Yet the relics were still precious the plate of the cathedral weighed five thousand pounds of silver the entire spoil was computed at one million of pieces of gold (about four hundred thousand pounds sterling) and the captives must outnumber the seventeen thousand Christians who were transported from the sack of Tauromenium into African servitude. In Sicily the religion and language of the Greeks were eradicated, and such was the docility of the rising generation, that fifteen thousand boys were circumcised and clothed on the same day with the son of the Fatimite caliph The Arabian squadrons issued from the harbours of Palermo, Biserta and Tunis a hundred and fifty towns of Calabria and Campania were attacked and pillaged nor could the suburbs of Rome be defended by the name of the Cæsars and apostles. Wi h Motassem the eighth of the Abbassides, the glory of his family and nation expired W h n the Arabian conquerors had spread them selves over th East and were mingled with the servile crowds of Persia Syria and Egypt they insensibly lost the freeborn and martial virtues of the desert The courage of the South is the artificial fruit of discipline and prejudice the active power of enthusiasm had decayed and the mercenary forces of the caliphs were re cruited in those climates of the North of which valour is the hardy and spontaneous produc tion Of the Turks[37] who dwelt beyond the Oxus and Jaxartes the robust youths either taken in war or purchased in trade were educated in the exercises of the field and the profession of the Mohammedan faith The Turkish guards stood in arms round the throne of their bene factor and their chiefs usurped the dominion of the palace and the provinces. Motassem the first author of this dangerous example intro duced into the capital above fifty thousand Turks their licentious conduct provoked the public indignation and the quarrels of the sol diers and people induced the caliph to retire from Bagdad and establish his own re dence and the camp of his barbarian favourites at Sa mara on the Tigris, about twelve leagues above the City of Peace [38] His son Mota akkel was a jealous and cruel tyrant odious to his subject., he cast himself on the fidelity of the strangers and these strangers, ambitious and apprehen sive were tempted by the rich promise of a revo lution At the instigation or at least in the cause of his son they burst into his apartment at the hour of supper and the caliph was cut into seven p eces by the same swords which he had recently distributed among the guards of his life and throne To this throne yet streaming with a father s blood Montasser was trium phantly led but in a reign of six months he found only the pangs of a guilty conscience If he wept at the sight of an old tapestry which represented the crime and punishment of the son of Chosroes if his days were abridged by gr ef and remorse we may allow some pity to a parricide who exclaimed in the bitterness of death that he had lost both this world and the world to come After this act of treason the en signs of royalty the garment and walking staff of Mohammed were given and torn away by the foreign mercenaries who in four years cre a ed deposed and murd red three commanders of the faithful As often as the Turks were in flamed by fear or rage or avarice these ca liphs were dragged by the feet, exposed naked to the scorching sun beaten with iron clubs, and compelled to purchase by the abdication of their d gnity a short reprieve of inevitable fate [39] At length however the fury of the tem

twelve miles from the sea shore[89] By his liberality a colony of Corsicans with their wives and children was planted in the station of Porto at the mouth of the Tiber the falling city was restored for their use the fields and vineyards were divided among the new settlers their first efforts were assisted by a gift of horses and cattle and the hardy exiles who breathed revenge against the Saracens swore to live and die under the standard of St Peter The nations of the West and North who visited the threshold of the apostles had gradually formed the large and populous suburb of the Vatican and their various habitations were distinguished in the language of the times as the schools of the Greeks and Goths of the Lombards and Saxons But this venerable spot was still open to sacrilegious insult the design of enclosing it with walls and towers exhausted all that authority could command or charity would supply and the pious labour of four years was animated in every season and at every hour by the presence of the indefatigable pontiff The love of fame a generous but worldly passion, may be detected in the name of the Leonine city, which he bestowed on the Vatican yet the pride of the dedication was tempered with Christian penance and humility The boundary was trod by the bishop and his clergy, barefoot in sackcloth and ashes, the songs of triumph were modulated to psalms and litanies the walls were besprinkled with holy water and the ceremony was concluded with a prayer, that under the guardian care of the apostles and the angelic host both the old and the new Rome might ever be preserved pure prosperous and impregnable[90]

The emperor Theophilus son of Michael the Stammerer was one of the most active and high spirited princes who reigned at Constantinople during the middle age In offensive or defensive war he marched in person five times against the Saracens formidable in his attack, esteemed by the enemy in his losses and defeats In the last of these expeditions he penetrated into Syria and besieged the obscure town of Sozopetra, the casual birthplace of the caliph Motassem whose father Harun was attended in peace or war by the most favoured of his wives and concubines The revolt of a Persian impostor employed at that moment the arms of the Saracen and he could only intercede in favour of a place for which he felt and acknowledged some degree of filial affection These solicitations determined the emperor to wound his pride in so sensible a part Sozopetra was levelled with the ground, the Syrian prisoners were marked or mutilated with ignominious cruelty, and a thousand female captives were forced away from the adjacent territory Among these a matron of the house of Abbas invoked in an agony of despair the name of Motassem and the insults of the Greeks engaged the honour of her kinsman to avenge his indignity and to answer her appeal Under the reign of the two elder brothers, the inheritance of the youngest had been confined to Anatolia Armenia Georgia and Circassia this frontier station had exercised his military talents and among his accidental claims to the name of Octonary[91] the most meritorious are the eight battles which he gained or fought against the enemies of the Koran In this personal quarrel the troops of Irak, Syria and Egypt were recruited from the tribes of Arabia and the Turkish hordes his cavalry might be numerous, though we should deduct some myriads from the hundred and thirty thousand horses of the royal stables and the expense of the armament was computed at four millions sterling or one hundred thousand pounds of gold From Tarsus the place of assembly the Saracens advanced in three divisions along the high road of Constantinople Motassem himself commanded the centre, and the vanguard was given to his son Abbas who, in the trial of the first adventures, might succeed with the more glory, or fail with the least reproach In the revenge of his injury the caliph prepared to retaliate a similar affront The father of Theophilus was a native of Amorium[92] in Phrygia the original seat of the Imperial house had been adorned with privileges and monuments and whatever might be the indifference of the people Constantinople itself was scarcely of more value in the eyes of the sovereign and his court. The name of AMORIUM was inscribed on the shields of the Saracens and their three armies were again united under the walls of the devoted city It had been proposed by the wisest counsellors to evacuate Amorium to remove the inhabitants and to abandon the empty structures to the vain resentment of the barbarians The emperor embraced the more generous resolution of defending in a siege and battle the country of his ancestors When the armies drew near the front of the Mohammedan line appeared to a Roman eye more closely planted with spears and javelins but the event of the action was not glorious on either side to the national troops The Arabs were broken but it was by the swords of thirty thousand Persians who had obtained service and settlement in the Byzantine empire The Greeks were repulsed and vanquished but it

ath. Thirty thousand citizens and strangers were put to the sword the sacred precincts were polluted by the burial of three thousand dead bodies the well of Zemzem overflowed with blood the golden spout was forced from its place the veil of the Caaba was divided among these impious sectaries and the black stone the first monument of the nation was borne away in triumph to their capital After this deed of sacrilege and cruelty they continued to infest the confines of Irak Syria, and Egypt but the vital principle of enthusiasm had withered at the root. Their scruples of their avarice again opened the pilgrimage of Mecca and restored the black stone of the Caaba and it is needless to inquire into what factions they were broken or by whose swords they were finally extirpated. The sect of the Carmathians may be considered as the second visible cause of the decline and fall of the empire of the caliphs.[101]

The third and most obvious cause was the weight and magnitude of the empire itself The caliph Almamon might proudly assert that it was easier for him to rule the East and the West than to manage a chess board of two feet square [102] yet I suspect that in both those games he was guilty of many fatal mistakes and I perceive that in the distant provinces the authority of the first and most powerful of the Abbassides was already impaired The analogy of despotism invests the representative with the full majesty of the prince the division and balance of powers might relax the habits of obedience might encourage the passive subject to inquire into the origin and administration of civil government. He who is born in the purple is seldom worthy to reign but the elevation of a private man, of a peasant perhaps, or a slave, affords a strong presumption of his courage and capacity The viceroy of a remote kingdom aspires to secure the property and inheritance of his precarious trust the nations must rejoice in the presence of their sovereign and the command of armies and treasures are at once the object and the instrument of his ambition A change was scarcely visible as long as the lieutenants of the caliph were content with their vicarious title while they solicited for themselves or their sons a renewal of the Imperial grant, and still maintained on the coin and in the public prayers the name and prerogative of the commander of the faithful But in the long and hereditary exercise of power they assumed the pride and attributes of royalty the alternative of peace or war of reward or punishment, depended solely on their will and the revenues of their government were reserved for local services or private magnificence Instead of a regular supply of men and money the successors of the prophet were flattered with the ostentatious gift of an elephant, or a cast of hawks, a suit of silk hangings or some pounds of musk and amber [103]

After the revolt of Spain from the temporal and spiritual supremacy of the Abbassides, the first symptoms of disobedience broke forth in the province of Africa Ibrahim the son of Aglab the lieutenant of the vigilant and rigid Harun bequeathed to the dynasty of the Aglabites the inheritance of his name and power The indolence or policy of the caliphs dissembled the injury and loss, and pursued only with poison the founder of the Edrisites [104] who erected the kingdom and city of Fez on the shores of the Western ocean [105] In the East the first dynasty was that of the Taherites[106]—the posterity of the valiant Taher who in the civil wars of the sons of Harun had served with too much zeal and success the cause of Almamon the younger brother He was sent into honourable exile to command on the banks of the Oxus and the independence of his successors who reigned in Chorasan till the fourth generation was palliated by their modest and respectful demeanour the happiness of their subjects and the security of their frontier They were supplanted by one of those adventurers so frequent in the annals of the East, who left his trade of a brazier (from whence the name of Soffarides) for the profession of a robber In a nocturnal visit to the treasure of the prince of Sistan Jacob the son of Leith, stumbled over a lump of salt, which he unwarily tasted with his tongue Salt, among the Orientals, is the symbol of hospitality and the pious robber immediately retired without spoil or damage The discovery of this honourable behaviour recommended Jacob to pardon and trust he led an army at first for his benefactor at last for himself subdued Persia and threatened the residence of the Abbassides On his march towards Bagdad the conqueror was arrested by a fever He gave audience in bed to the ambassador of the caliph and beside him on a table were exposed a naked scimitar a crust of brown bread, and a bunch of onions If I die, said he your master is delivered from his fears If I live this must determine between us. If I am vanquished I can return without reluctance to the homely fare of my youth From the height where he stood the descent would not have been so soft or harmless a timely death secured his own repose and pest was spent or diverted the Abbassides returned to the less turbulent residence of Bagdad the insolence of the Turks was curbed with a firmer and more skilful hand and their numbers were divided and destroyed in foreign warfare But the nations of the East had been taught to trample on the successors of the prophet and the blessings of domestic peace were obtained by the relaxation of strength and discipline So uniform are the mischiefs of military despotism that I seem to repeat the story of the Prætorians of Rome [100]

While the flame of enthusiasm was damped by the business the pleasure and the knowledge of the age it burnt with concentrated heat in the breasts of the chosen few the congenial spirits who were ambitious of reigning either in this world or in the next How carefully so ever the book of prophecy had been sealed by the apostle of Mecca, the wishes, and (if we may profane the word) even the reason of fanaticism, might believe that after the successive missions of Adam, Noah Abraham Moses Jesus and Mohammed the same God in the fulness of time would reveal a still more perfect and permanent law In the two hundred and seventy seventh year of the Hegira and in the neighbourhood of Cufa an Arabian preacher of the name of Carmath assumed the lofty and incomprehensible style of the Guide the Director the Demonstration the Word the Holy Ghost the Camel the Herald of the Messiah who had conversed with him in a human shape and the representative of Mohammed the son of Ali of St John the Baptist and of the angel Gabriel In his mystic volume the precepts of the Koran were refined to a more spiritual sense he relaxed the duties of ablution fasting and pilgrimage allowed the indiscriminate use of wine and forbidden food and nourished the fervour of his disciples by the daily repetition of fifty prayers The idleness and ferment of the rustic crowd awakened the attention of the magistrates of Cufa a timid persecution assisted the progress of the new sect and the name of the prophet became more revered after his person had been withdrawn from the world His twelve apostles dispersed themselves among the Bedoweens a race of men, says Abulfeda equally devoid of reason and of religion and the success of their preaching seemed to threaten Arabia with a new revolution The Carmathians were ripe for rebellion since they disclaimed the title of the house of Abbas and abhorred the worldly pomp of the caliphs of Bagdad They were susceptible of discipline since they vowed a blind and absolute submission to their Imam who was called to the prophetic office by the voice of God and the people Instead of the legal tithes he claimed the fifth of their substance and spoil the most flagitious sins were no more than the type of disobedience and the brethren were united and concealed by an oath of secrecy

After a bloody conflict they prevailed in the province of Bahrein along the Persian Gulf far and wide the tribes of the desert were subject to the sceptre or rather to the sword of Abu Said and his son Abu Taher and these rebellious imams could muster in the field a hundred and seven thousand fanatics The mercenaries of the caliph were dismayed at the approach of an enemy who neither asked nor accepted quarter and the difference between them in fortitude and patience is expressive of the change which three centuries of prosperity had effected in the character of the Arabians. Such troops were discomfited in every action the cities of Racca and Baalbec of Cufa and Bassora were taken and pillaged Bagdad was filled with consternation and the caliph trembled behind the veils of his palace In a daring inroad beyond the Tigris Abu Taher advanced to the gates of the capital with no more than five hundred horse By the special order of Moctader the bridges had been broken down and the person or head of the rebel was expected every hour by the commander of the faithful His lieutenant from a motive of fear or pity apprised Abu Taher of his danger and recommended a speedy escape Your master,' said the intrepid Carmathian to the messenger, is at the head of thirty thousand soldiers three such men as these are wanting in his host at the same instant turning to three of his companions he commanded the first to plunge a dagger into his breast the second to leap into the Tigris and the third to cast himself headlong down a precipice They obeyed without a murmur Relate continued the imam what you have seen before the evening your general shall be chained among my dogs Before the evening the camp was surprised and the menace was executed The rapine of the Carmathians was sanctified by their aversion to the worship of Mecca they robbed a caravan of pilgrims and twenty thousand devout Moslems were abandoned on the burning sands to a death of hunger and thirst Another year they suffered the pilgrims to proceed without interruption but in the festival of devotion, Abu Taher stormed the holy city and trampled on the most venerable relics of the Mohammedan

ous caliphs resumed the grave and abstemious virtues of the primitive times Despoiled of their armour and silken robes they fasted they prayed, they studied the Koran and the tradition of the Sonnites they performed with zeal and knowledge the functions of their ecclesiastical character The respect of nations still waited on the successors of the apostle the oracles of the law and conscience of the faithful and the weakness or division of their tyrants sometimes restored the Abbassides to the sovereignty of Bagdad. But their misfortunes had been embittered by the triumph of the Fatimites the real or spurious progeny of Ali Arising from the extremity of Africa these successful rivals extinguished in Egypt and Syria, both the spiritual and temporal authority of the Abbassides and the monarch of the Nile insulted the humble pontiff on the banks of the Tigris

In the declining age of the caliphs in the century which elapsed after the war of Theophilus and Motassem the hostile transactions of the two nations were confined to some inroads by sea and land the fruits of their close vicinity and indelible hatred But when the Eastern world was convulsed and broken the Greeks were roused from their lethargy by the hopes of conquest and revenge The Byzantine empire since the accession of the Basilian race, had reposed in peace and dignity and they might encounter with their entire strength the front of some petty emir whose rear was assaulted and threatened by his national foes of the Mohammedan faith The lofty titles of the morning star and the death of the Saracens,[111] were applied in the public acclamations to Nicephorus Phocas a prince as renowned in the camp as he was unpopular in the city In the subordinate station of great domestic, or general of the East, he reduced the island of Crete, and extirpated the nest of pirates who had so long defied with impunity the majesty of the empire [112] His military genius was displayed in the conduct and success of the enterprise which had so often failed with loss and dishonour The Saracens were confounded by the landing of his troops on safe and level bridges which he cast from the vessels to the shore Seven months were consumed in the siege of Candia the despair of the native Cretans was stimulated by the frequent aid of their brethren of Africa and Spain and after the massy wall and double ditch had been stormed by the Greeks a hopeless conflict was still maintained in the streets and houses of the city The whole island was subdued in the capital and a submissive people accepted without resistance the baptism of the conqueror [113] Constantinople applauded the long forgotten pomp of a triumph but the imperial diadem was the sole reward that could repay the service or satisfy the ambition of Nicephorus.

After the death of the younger Romanus, the fourth in lineal descent of the Basilian race his widow Theophania successively married Nicephorus Phocas and his assassin John Zimisces, the two heroes of the age They reigned as the guardians and colleagues of her infant sons and the twelve years of their military command form the most splendid period of the Byzantine annals The subjects and confederates whom they led to war appeared at least in the eyes of an enemy two hundred thousand strong and of these about thirty thousand were armed with cuirasses [114] a train of four thousand mules attended their march and their evening camp was regularly fortified with an enclosure of iron spikes A series of bloody and undecisive combats is nothing more than an anticipation of what would have been effected in a few years by the course of nature but I shall briefly prosecute the conquests of the two emperors from the hills of Cappadocia to the desert of Bagdad The sieges of Mopsuestia and Tarsus in Cilicia first exercised the skill and perseverance of their troops on whom at this moment I shall not hesitate to bestow the name of Romans In the double city of Mopsuestia which is divided by the river Sarus, two hundred thousand Moslems were predestined to death or slavery [115] a surprising degree of population which must at least include the inhabitants of the dependent districts They were surrounded and taken by assault but Tarsus was reduced by the slow progress of famine and no sooner had the Saracens yielded on honourable terms than they were mortified by the distant and unprofitable view of the naval succours of Egypt They were dismissed with a safe-conduct to the confines of Syria a part of the old Christians had quietly lived under their dominion and the vacant habitations were replenished by a new colony But the mosch was converted into a stable the pulpit was delivered to the flames many rich crosses of gold and gems the spoil of Asiatic churches were made a grateful offering to the piety or avarice of the emperor and he transported the gates of Mopsuestia and Tarsus which were fixed in the wall of Constantinople an eternal monument of his victory After they had forced and secured the narrow passes of Mount Amanus, the two Roman princes re that of the caliph, who paid with the most lavish concessions the retreat of his brother Amrou to the palaces of Shiraz and Ispahan The Abbassides were too feeble to contend, too proud to forgive they invited the powerful dynasty of the Samanides who passed the Oxus with ten thousand horse, so poor that their stirrups were of wood so brave that they vanquished the Soffarian army eight times more numerous than their own The captive Amrou was sent in chains a grateful offering to the court of Bagdad, and as the victor was content with the inheritance of Transoxiana and Chorasan, the realms of Persia returned for a while to the allegiance of the caliphs The provinces of Syria and Egypt were twice dismembered by their Turkish slaves of the race of Toulun and Ikshid [107] These barbarians in religion and manners the countrymen of Mohammed emerged from the bloody factions of the palace to a provincial command and an independent throne their names became famous and formidable in their time but the founders of these two potent dynasties confessed, either in words or actions the vanity of ambition The first on his deathbed implored the mercy of God to a sinner ignorant of the limits of his own power the second in the midst of four hundred thousand soldiers and eight thousand slaves concealed from every human eye the chamber where he attempted to sleep Their sons were educated in the vices of kings and both Egypt and Syria were recovered and possessed by the Abbassides during an interval of thirty years In the decline of their empire Mesopotamia, with the important cities of Mosul and Aleppo was occupied by the Arabian princes of the tribe of Hamadan The poets of their court could repeat without a blush that nature had formed their countenances for beauty their tongues for eloquence and their hands for liberality and valour but the genuine tale of the elevation and reign of the Hamadanites exhibits a scene of treachery murder and parricide At the same fatal period the Persian kingdom was again usurped by the dynasty of the Bowides by the sword of three brothers, who under various names were styled the support and columns of the state and who from the Caspian sea to the ocean would suffer no tyrants but themselves Under their reign the language and genius of Persia revived and the Arabs three hundred and four years after the death of Mohammed were deprived of the sceptre of the East.

Rahdi the twentieth of the Abbassides and the thirty ninth of the successors of Mohammed, was the last who deserved the title of commander of the faithful,[108] the last (says Abulfeda) who spoke to the people or conversed with the learned, the last who in the expense of his household represented the wealth and magnificence of the ancient caliphs After him the lords of the Eastern world were reduced to the most abject misery, and exposed to the blows and insults of a servile condition The revolt of the provinces circumscribed their dominions within the walls of Bagdad but that capital still contained an innumerable multitude vain of their past fortune discontented with their present state, and oppressed by the demands of a treasury which had formerly been replenished by the spoil and tribute of nations Their idleness was exercised by faction and controversy Under the mask of piety the rigid followers of Hanbal[109] invaded the pleasures of domestic life burst into the houses of plebeians and princes spilt the wine broke the instruments beat the musicians and dishonoured with infamous suspicions the associates of every handsome youth In each profession which allowed room for two persons the one was a votary the other an antagonist of Ali and the Abbassides were awakened by the clamorous grief of the sectaries who denied their title and cursed their progenitors A turbulent people could only be repressed by a military force but who could satisfy the avarice or assert the discipline of the mercenaries themselves? The African and the Turkish guards drew their swords against each other, and the chief commanders the emirs al Omra [110] imprisoned or desposed their sovereigns and violated the sanctuary of the mosch and haram If the caliphs escaped to the camp or court of any neighbouring prince, their deliverance was a change of servitude, till they were prompted by despair to invite the Bowides, the sultans of Persia who silenced the factions of Bagdad by their irresistible arms The civil and military powers were assumed by Moezal dowlat, the second of the three brothers and a stipend of sixty thousand pounds sterling was assigned by his generosity for the private expense of the commander of the faithful but on the fortieth day at the audience of the ambassadors of Chorasan and in the presence of a trembling multitude the caliph was dragged from his throne to a dungeon by the command of the stranger and the rude hands of his Dilemites His palace was pillaged his eyes were put out and the mean ambition of the Abbassides aspired to the vacant station of danger and disgrace In the school of adversity the luxuri

A RAY of historic light seems to beam from the darkness of the tenth century We open with curiosity and respect the royal volumes of Constantine Porphyrogenitus[1] which he composed at a mature age for the instruction of his son and which promise to unfold the state of the Eastern empire both in peace and war both at home and abroad In the first of these works he minutely describes the pompous ceremonies of the church and palace of Constantinople according to his own practice and that of his predecessors[2] In the second he attempts an accurate survey of the provinces the themes as they were then denominated both of Europe and Asia[3] The system of Roman tactics, the discipline and order of the troops and the military operations by land and sea are explained in the third of these didactic collections, which may be ascribed to Constantine or his father Leo[4] In the fourth of the administration of the empire he reveals the secrets of the Byzantine policy in friendly or hostile intercourse with the nations of the earth The literary labours of the age the practical systems of law agriculture and history might redound to the benefit of the subject and the honour of the Macedonian princes The sixty books of the Basilics[5] the code and pandects of civil jurisprudence were gradually framed in the three first reigns of that prosperous dynasty The art of agriculture had amused the leisure and exercised the pens of the best and wisest of the ancients and their chosen precepts are comprised in the twenty books of the Geoponics[6] of Constantine At his command the historical examples of vice and virtue were methodised in fifty three books,[7] and every citizen might apply to his contemporaries or himself the lesson or the warning of past times From the august character of a legislator the sovereign of the East descends to the more humble office of a teacher and a scribe and if his successors and subjects were regardless of his paternal cares we may inherit and enjoy the everlasting legacy

peatedly carried their arms into the heart of Syria Yet instead of assaulting the walls of Antioch the humanity or superstition of Nicephorus appeared to respect the ancient metropolis of the East he contented himself with drawing round the city a line of circumvallation left a stationary army and instructed his lieutenant to expect without impatience the return of spring But in the depth of winter, in a dark and rainy night an adventurous subaltern, with three hundred soldiers approached the rampart applied his scaling ladders occupied two adjacent towers stood firm against the pressure of multitudes and bravely maintained his post till he was relieved by the tardy though effectual support of his reluctant chief The first tumult of slaughter and rapine subsided the rein of Cæsar and of Christ was restored and the efforts of a hundred thousand Saracens, of the armies of Syria and the fleets of Africa, were consumed without effect before the walls of Antioch The royal city of Aleppo was subject to Seifeddowlat of the dynasty of Hamadan who clouded his past glory by the precipitate retreat which abandoned his kingdom and capital to the Roman invaders In his stately palace that stood without the walls of Aleppo they joyfully seized a well furnished magazine of arms, a stable of fourteen hundred mules and three hundred bags of silver and gold. But the walls of the city withstood the strokes of their battering rams and the besiegers pitched their tents on the neighbouring mountain of Jaushan Their retreat exasperated the quarrel of the townsmen and mercenaries the guard of the gates and ramparts was deserted and while they furiously charged each other in the market place they were surprised and destroyed by the sword of a common enemy The male sex was exterminated by the sword ten thousand youths were led into captivity the weight of the precious spoil exceeded the strength and number of the beasts of burthen the superfluous remainder was burnt, and after a licentious possession of ten days the Romans marched away from the naked and bleeding city In their Syrian inroads they commanded the husbandmen to cultivate their lands, that they themselves in the ensuing season might reap the benefit more than a hundred cities were reduced to obedience, and eighteen pulpits of the principal moschs were committed to the flames to expiate the sacrilege of the disciples of Mohammed The classic names of Hierapolis Apamea and Emesa revive for a moment in the list of conquest the emperor Zimisces encamped in the paradise of Damascus and accepted the ransom of a submissive people and the torrent was only stopped by the impregnable fortress of Tripoli on the sea coast of Phœnicia Since the days of Heraclius the Euphrates below the passage of Mount Taurus had been impervious and almost invisible to the Greeks The river yielded a free passage to the victorious Zimisces and the historian may imitate the speed with which he overran the once famous cities of Samosata Edessa, Martyropolis Amida [116] and Nisibis the ancient limit of the empire in the neighbourhood of the Tigris His ardour was quickened by the desire of grasping the virgin treasures of Ecbatana [117] a well known name under which the Byzantine writer has concealed the capital of the Abbassides The consternation of the fugitives had already diffused the terror of his name but the fancied riches of Bagdad had already been dissipated by the avarice and prodigality of domestic tyrants The prayers of the people, and the stern demands of the lieutenant of the Bowides required the caliph to provide for the defence of the city The helpless Mothi replied that his arms his revenues, and his provinces had been torn from his hands and that he was ready to abdicate a dignity which he was unable to support The emir was inexorable the furniture of the palace was sold and the paltry price of forty thousand pieces of gold was instantly consumed in private luxury But the apprehensions of Bagdad were relieved by the retreat of the Greeks thirst and hunger guarded the desert of Mesopotamia and the emperor satiated with glory and laden with Oriental spoils returned to Constantinople and displayed in his triumph the silk the aromatics, and three hundred myriads of gold and silver Yet the powers of the East had been bent not broken by this transient hurricane After the departure of the Greeks the fugitive princes returned to their capitals the subjects disclaimed their involuntary oaths of allegiance the Moslems again purified their temples and overturned the idols of the saints and martyrs the Nestorians and Jacobites preferred a Saracen to an orthodox master, and the numbers and spirit of the Melchites were inadequate to the support of the church and state Of these extensive conquests Antioch with the cities of Cilicia and the isle of Cyprus was alone restored, a permanent and useful accession to the Roman empire [118]

A RAY of historic light seems to beam from the darkness of the tenth century We open with curiosity and respect the royal volumes of Constantine Porphyrogenitus [1] which he composed at a mature age for the instruction of his son and which promise to unfold the state of the Eastern empire both in peace and war both at home and abroad In the first of these works he minutely describes the pompous ceremonies of the church and palace of Constantinople according to his own practice and that of his predecessors [2] In the second he attempts an accurate survey of the provinces the themes as they were then denominated both of Europe and Asia [3] The system of Roman tactics, the discipline and order of the troops and the military operations by land and sea are explained in the third of these didactic collections, which may be ascribed to Constantine or his father Leo [4] In the fourth of the administration of the empire, he reveals the secrets of the Byzantine policy in friendly or hostile intercourse with the nations of the earth The literary labours of the age the practical systems of law agriculture and history might redound to the benefit of the subject, and the honour of the Macedonian princes The sixty books of the Basilics [5] the code and pandects of civil jurisprudence were gradually framed in the three first reigns of that prosperous dynasty The art of agriculture had amused the leisure and exercised the pens of the best and wisest of the ancients and their chosen precepts are comprised in the twenty books of the Geoponics [6] of Constantine At his command the historical examples of vice and virtue were methodised in fifty three books [7] and every citizen might apply to his contemporaries or himself the lesson or the warning of past times From the august character of a legislator the sovereign of the East descends to the more humble office of a teacher and a scribe and if his successors and subjects were regardless of his paternal cares we may inherit and enjoy the everlasting legacy

A closer survey will indeed reduce the value of the gift and the gratitude of posterity in the possession of these Imperial treasures we may still deplore our poverty and ignorance and the fading glories of their authors will be obliterated by indifference or contempt. The Basilics will sink to a broken copy a partial and mutilated version in the Greek language of the laws of Justinian but the sense of the old civilians is often superseded by the influence of bigotry and the absolute prohibition of divorce concubinage and interest for money enslaves the freedom of trade and the happiness of private life In the historical book a subject of Constantine might admire the inimitable virtues of Greece and Rome he might learn to what a pitch of energy and elevation the human character had formerly aspired But a contrary effect must have been produced by a new edition of the lives of the saints which the great logothete or chancellor of the empire was directed to prepare and the dark fund of superstition was enriched by the fabulous and florid legends of Simon the Metaphrast [8] The merits and miracles of the whole calendar are of less account in the eyes of a sage than the toil of a single husbandman who multiplies the gifts of the Creator and supplies the food of his brethren Yet the royal authors of the Geoponics were more seriously employed in expounding the precepts of the destroying art, which has been taught since the days of Xenophon [9] as the art of heroes and kings But the Tactics of Leo and Constantine are mingled with the baser alloy of the age in which they lived It was destitute of original genius they implicitly transcribe the rules and maxims which had been confirmed by victories It was unskilled in the propriety of style and method they blindly confound the most distant and discordant institutions the phalanx of Sparta and that of Macedon the legions of Cato and Trajan of Augustus and Theodosius. Even the use or at least the importance of these military rudiments may be fairly questioned their general theory is dictated by reason but the merit as well as difficulty consists in the application The discipline of a soldier is formed by exercise rather than by study the talents of a commander are appropriated to those calm though rapid, minds which nature produces to decide the fate of armies and nations the former is the habit of a life the latter the glance of a moment and the battles won by lessons of tactics may be numbered with the epic poems created from the rules of criticism The book of ceremonies is a recital tedious yet imperfect of the despicable pageantry which had infected the church and state since the gradual decay of the purity of the one and the power of the other A review of the themes or provinces might promise such authentic and useful information as the curiosity of government only can obtain instead of traditionary fables on the origin of the cities, and malicious epigrams on the vices of their inhabitants[10] Such information the historian would have been pleased to record nor should his silence be condemned if the most interesting objects the population of the capital and provinces the amount of taxes and revenues, the numbers of subjects and strangers who served under the Imperial standard have been unnoticed by Leo the Philosopher and his son Constantine His treatise of the public administration is stained with the same blemishes yet it is discriminated by peculiar merit the antiquities of the nations may be doubtful or fabulous but the geography and manners of the barbaric world are delineated with curious accuracy Of these nations the Franks alone were qualified to observe in their turn and to describe the metropolis of the East The ambassador of the great Otho, a bishop of Cremona has painted the state of Constantinople about the middle of the tenth century his style is glowing his narrative lively his observation keen, and even the *prejudices and passions of Liutprand are stamp*ed with an original character of freedom and genius[11] From this scanty fund of foreign and domestic materials I shall investigate the form and substance of the Byzantine empire the provinces and wealth the civil government and military force the character and literature of the Greeks in a period of six hundred years *from the reign of Heraclius to the successful in*vasion of the Franks or Latins

After the final division between the sons of Theodosius, the swarms of the barbarians from Scythia and Germany overspread the provinces and extinguished the empire of ancient Rome The weakness of Constantinople was concealed by extent of dominion, her limits were inviolate, or at least entire and the kingdom of Justinian was enlarged by the splendid acquisition of Africa and Italy But the possession of these new conquests was transient and precarious and almost a moiety of the Eastern empire was torn away by the arms of the Saracens. Syria and Egypt were oppressed by the Arabian caliphs and after the reduction of Africa, their lieutenants invaded and subdued the Roman province which had been changed into the Gothic monarchy of Spain The islands of the Mediterranean were not inaccessible to their naval powers, and it was from their extreme stations the harbours of Crete and the fortresses of Cilicia, that the faithful or rebel emirs insulted the majesty of the throne and capital. The remaining provinces under the obedience of the emperors were cast into a new mould and the jurisdiction of the presidents the consulars and the counts was superseded by the institution of the themes[12] or military governments which prevailed under the successors of Heraclius and are described by the pen of the royal author Of the twenty nine themes twelve in Europe and seventeen in Asia the origin is obscure the etymology doubtful or capricious, the limits were arbitrary and fluctuating, but some particular names that sound the most strangely to our ear were derived from the character and attributes of the troops that were maintained at the expense and for the guard of the respective divisions The vanity of the Greek princes most eagerly grasped the shadow of conquest and the memory of lost dominion A new Mesopotamia was created on the western side of the Euphrates the appellation and praetor of Sicily were transferred to a narrow slip of Calabria and a fragment of the duchy of Beneventum was promoted to the style and title of the theme of Lombardy In the decline of the Arabian empire the successors of Constantine might indulge their pride in more solid advantages The victories of Nicephorus John Zimisces and Basil the Second revived the fame and enlarged the boundaries of the Roman name the province of Cilicia the metropolis of Antioch the islands of Crete and Cyprus were restored to the allegiance of Christ and Cæsar, one third of Italy was annexed to the throne of Constantinople the kingdom of Bulgaria was destroyed and the last sovereigns of the Macedonian dynasty extended their sway from the sources of the Tigris to the neighbourhood of Rome In the eleventh century the prospect was again clouded by new enemies and new misfortunes the relics of Italy were swept away by the Norman adventurers and almost all the Asiatic branches were dissevered from the Roman trunk by the Turkish conquerors After these losses the emperors of the Comnenian family continued to reign from the Danube to Peloponnesus and from Belgrade to Nice Trebizond and the winding stream of the Meander The spacious provinces of Thrace Macedonia and Greece were obedient to their sceptre the possession of Cyprus Rhodes and Crete was accompanied by the fifty islands of the Ægean or Holy Sea[13] and the remnant of their empire transcends the measure of the largest of the European kingdoms

The same princes might assert with dignity and truth, that of all the monarchs of Christendom they possessed the greatest city[14] the most ample revenue, the most flourishing and populous state With the decline and fall of the empire th cities of the West had decayed and fallen nor could the ruins of Rome or the mud walls wooden hovels, and narrow precincts of Paris and London prepare the Latin stranger to contemplate the situation and extent of Constantinople her stately palaces and churches, and the arts and luxury of an innumerable people. Her treasures might attract but her virgin strength had repelled and still promised to repel the audacious invasion of the Persian and Bulgarian the Arab and the Russian The provinces were less fortunate and impregnable, and few districts, few cities could be discovered which had not been violated by some fierce barbarian impatient to despoil, because he was hopeless to possess From the age of Justinian the Eastern empire was sinking below its former level the powers of destruction were more active than those of improvement and the calamities of war were embittered by the more permanent evils of civil and ecclesiastical tyranny The captive who had escaped from the barbarians was often stripped and imprisoned by the ministers of his sovereign the Greek superstition relaxed th mind by prayer and emaciated the body by fasting and the multitude of convents and festivals diverted many hands and many days from the temporal service of mankind. Yet the subjects of the Byzantine empire were still the most dexterous and dili*gent of* nations their country was blessed by nature with every advantage of soil climate, and situation and, in the support and restoration of the arts their patient and peaceful temper was more useful than the warlike spirit and feudal anarchy of Europe The provinces that still adhered to the empire were repeopled and enriched by the misfortunes of those which were irrecoverably lost. From the yoke of the caliphs the Catholics of Syria Egypt and Africa retired to the allegiance of their prince to the society of their brethren the movable wealth which eludes the search of oppression accompanied and alleviated their exile and Constantinople received into her bosom the fugitive trade of Alexandria and Tyre The chiefs of Armenia and Scythia who fled from hostile or religious persecution were hospitably entertained their followers were encouraged to build new cities and to cultivate waste lands and many spots, both in Europe and Asia preserved the name the manners or at least the memory of these national colonies Even the tribes of barbarians who had seated themselves in arms on the territory of the empire were gradually reclaimed to the laws of the church and state and as long as they were separated from the Greeks their posterity suppli d a race of faithful and obedient soldiers Did we possess sufficient materials to survey the twenty nine themes of the Byzantine monarchy our curiosity might be satisfied with a chosen example it is fortunate enough that the clearest light should be thrown on the most interesting province and the name of PELOPONNESUS will awaken the attention of the classic reader

As early as the eighth century in the troubled reign of the Iconoclasts Greece and even Peloponnesus,[15] were overrun by some Sclavonian bands who outstripped the royal standard of Bulgaria The strangers of old Cadmus and Danaus and Pelops, had planted in that fruitful soil the seeds of policy and learning but the savages of the north eradicated what yet remained of their sickly and withered roots In this irruption the country and the inhabitants were transformed the Grecian blood was contaminated and the proudest nobles of Peloponnesus were branded with the names of foreigners and slaves By the diligence of succeeding princes the land was in some measure purified from the barbarians and the humble remnant was bound by an oath of obedience tribute and military service which they often renewed and often violated The siege of Patras was formed by a singular concurrence of the Sclavonians of Peloponnesus and the Saracens of Africa In their last distress a pious fiction of th approach of the prætor of Corinth revived the courage of the citizens Their sally was bold and successful the strangers embarked the rebels submitted and the glory of the day was ascribed to a phantom or a stranger who fought in the foremost ranks under the character of St. Andrew the Apostle The shrine which contained his relics was decorated with the trophies of victory and the captive race was for ever devoted to the service and vassalage of the metropolitan church of Patras By the revolt of two Sclavonian tribes in the neighbourhood of Helos and Lacedæmon the peace of the peninsula was often disturbed They sometimes insulted the weakness and sometimes resisted the oppression of the Byzantine government till at length the approach of their hostile brethren extorted a golden bull to define the rights and obligations of the Ezzerites and Milengi, whose annual tribute was defined at twelve hundred pieces of gold From these strangers the Imperial geographer has accurately distinguished a domestic and perhaps original race who in some degree might derive their blood from the much injured Helots The liberality of the Romans and especially of Augustus had enfranchised the maritime cities from the dominion of Sparta, and the continuance of the same benefit ennobled them with the title of Eleuthero or Free Laconians [16] In the time of Constantine Porphyrogenitus they had acquired the name of Mainotes under which they dishonour the claim of liberty by the inhuman pillage of all that is shipwrecked on their rocky shores Their territory barren of corn but fruitful of olives extended to the Cape of Malea they accepted a chief or prince from the Byzantine prætor and a light tribute of four hundred pieces of gold was the badge of their immunity rather than of their dependence The freemen of Laconia assumed the character of Romans and long adhered to the religion of the Greeks By the zeal of the emperor Basil they were baptised in the faith of Christ but the altars of Venus and Neptune had been crowned by these rustic votaries five hundred years after they were proscribed in the Roman world In the theme of Peloponnesus[17] forty cities were still numbered and the declining state of Sparta Argos and Corinth may be suspended in the tenth century at an equal distance perhaps, between their antique splendour and their present desolation The duty of military service, either in person or by substitute, was imposed on the lands or benefices of the province, a sum of five pieces of gold was assessed on each of the substantial tenants and the same capitation was shared among several heads of inferior value On the proclamation of an Italian war, the Peloponnesians excused themselves by a voluntary oblation of one hundred pounds of gold (four thousand pounds sterling), and a thousand horses with their arms and trappings The churches and monasteries furnished their contingent a sacrilegious profit was extorted from the sale of ecclesiastical honours and the indigent bishop of Leucadia[18] was made responsible for a pension of one hundred pieces of gold [19]

But the wealth of the province and the trust of the revenue were founded on the fair and plentiful produce of trade and manufactures and some symptoms of liberal policy may be traced in a law which exempts from all personal taxes the mariners of Peloponnesus and the workmen in parchment and purple This denomination may be fairly applied or extended to the manufactures of linen woollen and more especially of silk the two former of which had flourished in Greece since the days of Homer and the last was introduced perhaps as early as the reign of Justinian These arts which were exercised at Corinth Thebes, and Argos afforded food and occupation to a numerous people the men women and children were distributed according to their age and strength and if many of these were domestic slaves their masters who directed the work and enjoyed the profit were of a free and honourable condition The gifts which a rich and generous matron of Peloponnesus presented to the emperor Basil her adopted son were doubtless fabricated in the Grecian looms Danielis bestowed a carpet of fine wool of a pattern which imitated the spots of a peacock s tail of a magnitude to overspread the floor of a new church erected in the triple name of Christ of Michael the archangel, and of the prophet Elijah She gave six hundred pieces of silk and linen of various use and denomination the silk was painted with the Tyrian dye and adorned by the labours of the needle and the linen was so exquisitely fine, that an entire piece might be rolled in the hollow of a cane [20] In his description of the Greek manufactures an historian of Sicily discriminates their price according to the weight and quality of the silk the closeness of the texture the beauty of the colours and the taste and materials of the embroidery A single or even a double or treble thread was thought sufficient for ordinary sale but the union of six threads composed a piece of stronger and more costly workmanship Among the colours he celebrates with affectation of eloquence the fiery blaze of the scarlet and the softer lustre of the green The embroidery was raised either in silk or gold the more simple ornament of stripes or circles was surpassed by the nicer imitation of flowers the vestments that were fabricated for the palace or the altar often glittered with precious stones, and the figures were delineated in

strings of Oriental pearls[21] Till the twelfth century Greece alone of all the countries of Christendom was possessed of the insect who is taught by nature and of the workmen who are instructed by art, to prepare this elegant luxury But the secret had been stolen by the dexterity and diligence of the Arabs the caliphs of the East and West scorned to borrow from the unbelievers their furniture and apparel and two cities of Spain Almeria and Lisbon were famous for the manufacture the use and perhaps th exportation of silk It was first introduced into Sicily by the Normans and this emigration of trade distinguishes the victory of Roger from the uniform and fruitless hostilities of every age After the sack of Corinth Athens and Thebes his lieutenant embarked with a captive train of weavers and artificers of both sexes a trophy glorious to their master and disgraceful to the Greek emperor[22] The king of Sicily was not insensible of the value of the present and in the restitution of the prisoners, he excepted only the male and female manufacturers of Thebes and Corinth who labour says the Byzantine historian under a barbarous lord like the old Eretrians in the service of Darius[23] A stately edifice in the palace of Palermo was erected for the use of this industrious colony[24] and the art was propagated by their children and disciples to satisfy the increasing demand of the western world The decay of the looms of Sicily may be ascribed to the troubles of the island and the competition of the Italian cities In the year thirteen *hundred and four*teen Lucca alone among her sister republics enjoyed the lucrative monopoly[25] A domestic revolution dispersed the manufacturers to Florence Bologna Venice Milan and even the countries beyond the Alps and thirteen years after this event, the statutes of Modena enjoin the planting of mulberry trees and regulate the d es on raw silk.[26] The northern climates are less p opitious to the education of the silkworm but the industry of France and England [2]7 is supplied and enriched by the productions of Italy and China

I must repeat the complaint that the vague and scanty memorials of the times will not afford any just estimate of the taxes the revenue and th resources of the Greek empire From every province of Europe and Asia the rivulets of gold and silver discharged into the Imperial reservoir a cop ous and perennial stream. The separation of the b anches from the trunk increased the relative magnitude of Constantinople a.d the maxims of despotism contracted the state to the capital the capital to the palace and the palace to the royal person. A Jewish traveller who visited the East in the twelfth century is lost in his admiration of the Byzantine riches It is here says Benjamin of Tudela in the queen of cities, that the tributes of the Greek empire are annually deposited and the lofty towers are filled with precious magazines of silk purple and gold It is said that Constantinople pays each day to her sovereign twenty thousand pieces of gold which are levied on the shops taverns and markets, on *the mer*chants of Persia and Egypt, of Russia and Hungary of Italy and Spain who frequent the capital by sea and land "[28] In all pecuniary matters the authority of a Jew is doubtless respectable but as the three hundred and sixty five days would produce a yearly income exceeding seven millions sterling I am tempted to retrench at least the numerous festivals of the Greek calendar The mass of treasure that was saved by Theodora and Basil the Second will suggest a splendid though indefinite idea of their supplies and resources The mother of Michael before she retired to a cloister attempted to check or expose the prodigality of her ungrateful son by a free and faithful account of the wealth which he inherited one hundred and nine thousand pounds of gold and three hundred thousand of silver the fruits of her own economy and that of her deceased husband[29] The avarice of Basil is not less renowned than his valour and fortune his victorious armies were paid and rewarded without breaking into the mass of two hundred thousand pounds of gold (about eight millions sterling) which he had buried in the subterraneous vaults of the palace[30] Such accumulation of treasure is rejected by the theory and practice of modern policy and we are more apt to compute the national riches by the use and abuse of the public credit. Yet the maxims of antiquity are still embraced by a monarch formidable to his enemies by a republic respectable to her allies and both have attained their respective ends of military power and domestic tranquillity

Whatever might be consumed for the present wants or reserved for the future use of the state the first and most sacred demand was for the pomp and pleasure of the emperor and his discretion only could define the measure of his private expen e The princes of Constantinople were far removed from the simplicity of nature yet with the revolving seasons they were led by taste or fashion to withdraw to a purer air from the smoke and tumult of the capital They en joyed or affected to enjoy the rustic festival of the vintage their leisure was amused by the exercise of the chase and the calmer occupation of fishing and in the summer heats they were shaded from the sun and refreshed by the cooling breezes from the sea The coasts and islands of Asia and Europe were covered with their magnificent villas but instead of the modest art which secretly strives to hide itself and to decorate the scenery of nature the marble structure of their gardens served only to expose the riches of the lord and the labours of the architect The successive casualties of inheritance and forfeiture had rendered the sovereign proprietor of many stately houses in the city and suburbs of which twelve were appropriated to the ministers of state but the great palace [31] the centre of the Imperial residence was fixed during eleven centuries to the same position between the hippodrome the cathedral of St Sophia and the gardens which descended by many a terrace to the shores of the Propontis The primitive edifice of the first Constantine was a copy or rival of ancient Rome the gradual improvements of his successors aspired to emulate the wonders of the old world [3] and in the tenth century the Byzantine palace excited the admiration at least of the Latins by an unquestionable pre eminence of strength size and magnificence [33] But the toil and treasure of so many ages had produced a vast and irregular pile each separate building was marked with the character of the times and of the founder and the want of space might excuse the reigning monarch who demolished perhaps with secret satisfaction the works of his predecessors The economy of the emperor Theophilus allowed a more free and ample scope for his domestic luxury and splendour A favourite ambassador who had astonished the Abbassides themselves by his pride and liberality presented on his return the model of a palace which the caliph of Bagdad had recently constructed on the banks of the Tigris The model was instantly copied and surpassed the new buildings of Theophilus[34] were accompanied with gardens and with five churches one of which was conspicuous for size and beauty it was crowned with three domes the roof of gilt brass reposed on columns of Italian marble and the walls were incrusted with marbles of various colours In the face of the church a semicircular portico of the figure and name of the Greek sigma was supported by fifteen columns of Phrygian marble and the subterranean vaults were of a similar construction The square before the sigma was decorated with a fountain, and the margin of the basin was lined and encompassed with plates of silver In the beginning of each season the basin instead of water, was replenished with the most exquisite fruits which were abandoned to the populace for the entertainment of the prince He enjoyed this tumultuous spectacle from a throne resplendent with gold and gems which was raised by a marble staircase to the height of a lofty terrace Below the throne were seated the officers of his guards the magistrates the chiefs of the factions of the circus the inferior steps were occupied by the people and the place below was covered with troops of dancers singers and pantomimes The square was surrounded by the hall of justice the arsenal, and the various offices of business and pleasure, and the purple chamber was named from the annual distribution of robes of scarlet and purple by the hand of the empress herself The long series of the apartments was adapted to the seasons and decorated with marble and porphyry with painting sculpture and mosaics with a profusion of gold silver and precious stones His fanciful magnificence employed the skill and patience of such artists as the times could afford, but the taste of Athens would have despised their frivolous and costly labours, a golden tree with its leaves and branches which sheltered a multitude of birds warbling their artificial notes, and two lions of massy gold and of the natural size who looked and roared like their brethren of the forest The successors of Theophilus of the Basilian and Comnenian dynasties were not less ambitious of leaving some memorial of their residence and the portion of the palace most splendid and august was dignified with the title of the golden triclinium [35] With becoming modesty the rich and noble Greeks aspired to imitate their sovereign and when they passed through the streets on horseback in their robes of silk and embroidery they were mistaken by the children for kings [36] A matron of Peloponnesus [37] who had cherished the infant fortunes of Basil the Macedonian was excited by tenderness or vanity to visit the greatness of her adopted son In a journey of five hundred miles from Patras to Constantinople her age or indolence declined the fatigue of a horse or carriage the soft litter or bed of Danielis was transported on the shoulders of ten robust slaves and as they were relieved at easy distances a band of three hundred was selected for the performance of this service She was entertained in the Byzantine palace with filial

reverence and the honours of a queen and whatever might be the origin of her wealth her gifts were not unworthy of the regal dignity I have already described the fine and curious manufactures of Peloponnesus of linen silk and woollen but the most acceptable of her presents consisted in three hundred beautiful youths of whom one hundred were eunuchs [35] for h was not ignorant says the historian that the air of the palace is more congenial to such insects than a shepherd s dairy to the flies of the summer During her lifetime she be stowed the greater part of her estates in Peloponnesus and her testament instituted Leo the son of Basil her universal heir After the pay ment of the legacies fourscore villas or farms were added to the Imperial domain and three thousand slaves of Danielis were enfranchised by their new lord and transplanted as a colony to the Italian coast From this example of a pri vate matron we may estimate the wealth and magnificence of the emperors Yet our enjoy ments are confined by a narrow circle and whatsoever may be its value the luxury of life is possessed with more innocence and safety by the master of his own than by the steward of the public fortune

In an absolute government which levels the distinctions of noble and plebeian birth the sovereign is the sole fountain of honour and the rank both in the palace and the empire de pends on the titles and offices which are be stowed and resumed by his arbitrary will Above a thousand years from Vespasian to Alexius Comnenus [36] the Cæsar was the second person or at least the second degree after the supreme title of Augustus was more freely com municated to the sons and brothers of the reigning monarch To elude without violating his promise to a powerful associate the husband of his sister and without giving himself an equal to reward the piety of his brother Isaac the crafty Alexius interposed a new and super eminent dignity The happy flexibility of the Greek tongue allowed him to compound the names of Augustus and Emperor (Sebastos and Autocrator) and the union produced the sonorous title of Sebastocrator He was exalted above the Cæsar on the first step of the throne the public acclamations repeated his name and he was only distinguished from the sovereign by some peculiar ornaments of the head and feet The emperor alone could assume the purple or red buskins, and the close diadem or tiara which imitated the fashion of the Persian kings [40] It was a high pyramidal cap of cloth or silk al most concealed by a profusion of pearls and jewels the crown was formed by a horizontal circle and two arches of gold at the summit the point of their intersection was placed a globe or cross and two strings or lappets of pearl depended on either cheek Instead of red the buskins of the Sebastocrator and Cæsar were green and on their open coronets or crowns the precious gems were more sparingly distributed Beside and below the Cæsar the fancy of Alexius created the Panhypersebastos and the Protosebastos whose sound and signification will satisfy a Grecian ear They imply a superi ority and a priority above the simple name of Augustus and this sacred and primitive title of the Roman prince was degraded to the kins men and servants of the Byzantine court The daughter of Alexius applauds with fond com placency this artful gradation of hopes and honours but the science of words is accessible to the meanest capacity and this vain diction ary was easily enriched by the pride of his suc cessors To their favourite sons or brothers they imparted the more lofty appellation of Lord or Despot which was illustrated with new orna ments and prerogatives and placed immedi ately after the person of the emperor himself The five titles of 1 Despot 2 Sebastocrator 3 Cæsar 4 Panhypersebastos and 5 Protosebastos were usually confined to the princes of his blood they were the emanations of his majesty but as they exercised no regular functions, their existence was useless and their authority pre carious

But in every monarchy the substantial pow ers of government must be divided and exer cised by the ministers of the palace and treas ury the fleet and army The titles alone can differ and in the revolution of ages the counts and præfects the prætor and quæstor, insensi bly descended while their servants rose above their heads to the first honours of the state 1 In a monarchy which refers every object to the p rson of the prince the care and ceremonies of the palace form the most respectable depart ment The Curopalata [41] so illustrious in the age of Justinian was supplanted by the Protovestiare whose primitive functions were limited to the custody of the wardrobe From thence his juris diction was extended over the numerous me nials of pomp and luxury and he presided with his silver wand at the public and private audi ence 2 In the ancient system of Constantine the name of Logothete or accountant was ap plied to the receivers of the finances the prin cipal officers were distinguished as the Logo-

thetes of the domain of the posts the Army, the private and public treasure, and the great Logothete the supreme guardian of the laws and revenues is compared with the chancellor of the Latin monarchies [42] His discerning eye pervaded the civil administration and he was assisted in due subordination by the eparch or præfect of the city the first secretary, and the keepers of the privy seal the archives, and the red and purple ink which was reserved for the sacred signature of the emperor alone [43] The introductor and interpreter of foreign ambassadors were the great Chiaus[44] and the Dragoman [45] two names of Turkish origin and which are still familiar to the Sublime Porte 3 From the humble style and service of guards the Domestics insensibly rose to the station of generals, the military themes of the East and West the legions of Europe and Asia were often divided till the great Domestic was finally invested with the universal and absolute command of the land forces The Protostrator in his original functions was the assistant of the emperor when he mounted on horseback he gradually became the lieutenant of the great Domestic in the field and his jurisdiction extended over the stables the cavalry and the royal train of hunting and hawking The Stratopedarch was the great judge of the camp the Protospathaire commanded the guards the Constable [46] the great Æteriarch and the Acolyth were the separate chiefs of the Franks the barbarians and the Varangi or English the mercenary strangers who, in the decay of the national spirit formed the nerve of the Byzantine armies 4 The naval powers were under the command of the great Duke in his absence they obeyed the great Drungaire of the fleet and in his place the Emir or Admiral a name of Saracen extraction [47] but which has been naturalised in all the modern languages of Europe Of these officers and of many more whom it would be useless to enumerate the civil and military hierarchy was framed Their honours and emoluments their dress and titles their mutual salutations and respective pre-eminence were balanced with more exquisite labour than would have fixed the constitution of a free people and the code was almost perfect when this baseless fabric the monument of pride and servitude was for ever buried in the ruins of the empire [48]

The most lofty titles and the most humble postures which devotion has applied to the Supreme Being have been prostituted by flattery and fear to creatures of the same nature with ourselves The mode of adoration [49] of falling prostrate on the ground and kissing the feet of the emperor, was borrowed by Diocletian from Persian servitude but it was continued and aggravated till the last age of the Greek monarchy Excepting only on Sundays when it was waived from a motive of religious pride this humiliating reverence was exacted from all who entered the royal presence from the princes invested with the diadem and purple, and from the ambassadors who represented their independent sovereigns the caliphs of Asia Egypt or Spain the kings of France and Italy and the Latin emperors of ancient Rome In his transactions of business, Liutprand bishop of Cremona [50] asserted the free spirit of a Frank and the dignity of his master Otho Yet his sincerity cannot disguise the abasement of his first audience When he approached the throne the birds of the golden tree began to warble their notes which were accompanied by the roarings of the two lions of gold With his two companions Liutprand was compelled to bow and to fall prostrate and thrice he touched the ground with his forehead He arose but in the short interval the throne had been hoisted by an engine from the floor to the ceiling the Imperial figure appeared in new and more gorgeous apparel and the interview was concluded in haughty and majestic silence In this honest and curious narrative the bishop of Cremona represents the ceremonies of the Byzantine court, which are still practised in the Sublime Porte, and which were preserved in the last age of the dukes of Muscovy or Russia After a long journey by the sea and land from Venice to Constantinople the ambassador halted at the golden gate till he was conducted by the formal officers to the hospitable palace prepared for his reception but this palace was a prison and his jealous keepers prohibited all social intercourse either with strangers or natives At his first audience he offered the gifts of his master—slaves and golden vases and costly armour The ostentatious payment of the officers and troops displayed before his eyes the riches of the empire he was entertained at a royal banquet [51] in which the ambassadors of the nations were marshalled by the esteem or contempt of the Greeks from his own table the emperor as the most signal favour sent the plates which he had tasted and his favourites were dismissed with a robe of honour [52] In the morning and evening of each day his civil and military servants attended their duty in the palace their labour was repaid by the sight perhaps by the smile of their lord his commands were signified

by a nod or a sign but all earthly greatness stood silent and submissive in his presence In his regular or extraordinary processions through the capital he unveiled his person to the public view the rites of policy were connected with those of religion and his visits to the principal churches were regulated by the festivals of the Greek calendar On the eve of these processions the gracious or devout intention of the monarch was proclaimed by the heralds The streets were cleared and purified the pavement was strewed with flowers the most precious furniture, the gold and silver plate and silken hangings, were displayed from the windows and balconies and a severe discipline restrained and silenced the tumult of the populace The march was opened by the military officers at the head of their troops they were followed in long order by the magistrates and ministers of the civil government the person of the emperor was guarded by his eunuchs and domestics, and at the church door he was solemnly received by the patriarch and his clergy The task of applause was not abandoned to the rude and spontaneous voices of the crowd The most convenient stations were occupied by the bands of the blue and green factions of the circus and their furious conflicts which had shaken the capital were insensibly sunk to an emulation of servitude From either side they echoed in responsive melody the praises of the emperor their poets and musicians directed the choir and long life[52] and victory were the burden of every song The same acclamations were performed at the audience the banquet and the church, and as an evidence of boundless sway they were repeated in the Latin [53] Gothic, Persian, French, and even English language [54] by the mercenaries who sustained the real or fictitious character of those nations By the pen of Constantine Porphyrogenitus this science of form and flattery has been reduced into a pompous and trifling volume [55] which the vanity of succeeding times might enrich with an ample supplement Yet the calmer reflection of a prince would surely suggest that the same acclamations were applied to every character and every reign and if he had risen from a private rank he might remember that his own voice had been the loudest and most eager in applause at the very moment when he envied the fortune or conspired against the life of his predecessor [56]

The princes of the North of the nations says Constantine without faith or fame were ambitious of mingling their blood with the blood of the Cæsars, by their marriage with a royal virgin or by the nuptials of their daughters with a Roman prince [57] The aged monarch in his instructions to his son reveals the secret maxims of policy and pride and suggests the most decent reasons for refusing these insolent and unreasonable demands. Every animal says the discreet emperor is prompted by nature to seek a mate among the animals of his own species, and the human species is divided into various tribes by the distinction of language religion and manners. A just regard to the purity of descent preserves the harmony of public and private life but the mixture of foreign blood is the fruitful source of disorder and discord Such had ever been the opinion and practice of the sage Romans their jurisprudence proscribed the marriage of a citizen and a stranger in the days of freedom and virtue a senator would have scorned to match his daughter with a king the glory of Mark Antony was sullied by an Egyptian wife [58] and the emperor Titus was compelled by popular censure to dismiss with reluctance the reluctant Berenice [59] This perpetual interdict was ratified by the fabulous sanction of the great Constantine The ambassadors of the nations, more especially of the unbelieving nations were solemnly admonished that such strange alliances had been condemned by the founder of the church and city The irrevocable law was inscribed on the altar of St. Sophia and the impious prince who should stain the majesty of the purple was excluded from the civil and ecclesiastical communion of the Romans If the ambassadors were instructed by any false brethren in the Byzantine history, they might produce three memorable examples of the violation of this imaginary law the marriage of Leo or rather of his father Constantine the Fourth with the daughter of the king of the Chazars the nuptials of the grand-daughter of Romanus with a Bulgarian prince and the union of Bertha of France or Italy with young Romanus the son of Constantine Porphyrogenitus himself To these objections three answers were prepared which solved the difficulty and established the law I The deed and the guilt of Constantine Copronymus were acknowledged The Isaurian heretic who sullied the baptismal font and declared war against the holy images had indeed embraced a barbarian wife By this impious alliance he accomplished the measure of his crimes and was devoted to the just censure of the church and of posterity II Romanus could not be alleged as a legitimate emperor he was a plebeian usurper ig norant of the laws and regardless of the honour of the monarchy His son Christopher the father of the bride was the third in rank in the college of princes at once the subject and the accomplice of a rebellious parent The Bulgarians were sincere and devout Christians and the safety of the empire with the redemption of many thousand captives depended on this preposterous alliance Yet no consideration could dispense from the law of Constantine the clergy the senate and the people disapproved the conduct of Romanus and he was reproached both in his life and death, as the author of the public disgrace III For the marriage of his own son with the daughter of Hugo, king of Italy a more honourable defence is contrived by the wise Porphyrogenitus Constantine the great and holy esteemed the fidelity and valour of the Franks [61] and his prophetic spirit beheld the vision of their future greatness They alone were excepted from the general prohibition Hugo king of France, was the lineal descendant of Charlemagne [62] and his daughter Bertha inherited the prerogatives of her family and nation The voice of truth and malice insensibly betrayed the fraud or error of the Imperial court The patrimonial estate of Hugo was reduced from the monarchy of France to the simple county of Arles though it was not denied that in the confusion of the times, he had usurped the sovereignty of Provence and invaded the kingdom of Italy His father was a private noble, and if Bertha derived her female descent from the Carlovingian line every step was polluted with illegitimacy or vice The grandmother of Hugo was the famous Valdrada the concubine rather than the wife of the second Lothair whose adultery divorce and second nuptials had provoked against him the thunders of the Vatican His mother as she was styled the great Bertha was successively the wife of the Count of Arles and of the Marquis of Tuscany France and Italy were scandalised by her gallantries and till the age of threescore her lovers of every degree were the zealous servants of her ambition The example of maternal incontinence was copied by the king of Italy and the three favourite concubines of Hugo were decorated with the classic names of Venus Juno and Semele [63] The daughter of Venus was granted to the solicitations of the Byzantine court her name of Bertha was changed to that of Eudoxia and she was wedded or rather betrothed, to young Romanus the future heir of the empire of the East The consummation of this foreign alliance was suspended by the tender age of the two parties, and at the end of five years the union was dissolved by the death of the virgin spouse The second wife of the emperor Romanus was a maiden of plebeian but of Roman, birth and their two daughters Theophano and Anne were given in marriage to the princes of the earth The eldest was bestowed as the pledge of peace on the eldest son of the great Otho who had solicited this alliance with arms and embassies It might legally be questioned how far a Saxon was entitled to the privilege of the French nation but every scruple was silenced by the fame and piety of a hero who had restored the empire of the West After the death of her father in law and husband Theophano governed Rome Italy, and Germany during the minority of her son, the third Otho and the Latins have praised the virtues of an empress who sacrificed to a superior duty the remembrance of her country [64] In the nuptials of her sister Anne every prejudice was lost and every consideration of dignity was superseded by the stronger argument of necessity and fear A Pagan of the North Wolodomir, great prince of Russia aspired to a daughter of the Roman purple and his claim was enforced by the threats of war the promise of conversion and the offer of a powerful succour against a domestic rebel A victim of her religion and country the Grecian princess was torn from the palace of her fathers and condemned to a savage reign and a hopeless exil on the banks of the Borysthenes or in the neighbourhood of the Polar circle [65] Yet the marriage of Anne was fortunate and fruitful the daughter of her grandson Jeroslaus was recommended by her Imperial descent and the king of France Henry I sought a wife on the last borders of Europe and Christendom [66]

In the Byzantine palace the emperor was the first slave of the ceremonies which he imposed of the rigid forms which regulated each word and gesture besieged him in the palace and violated the leisure of his rural solitude But the lives and fortunes of millions hung on his arbitrary will and the firmest minds superior to the allurements of pomp and luxury, may be seduced by the more active pleasure of commanding their equals The legislative and executive powers were centred in the person of the monarch and the last remains of the authority of the senate were finally eradicated by Leo the Philosopher [67] A lethargy of servitude had benumbed the minds of the Greeks in the wildest tumults of rebellion they never aspired to the idea of a free constitution and the private char acter of the prince was the only source and measure of their public happiness Superstition riveted their chains in the church of St. Sophia he was solemnly crowned by the patriarch at the foot of the altar they pledged their passive and unconditional obedience to his government and family On his side he engaged to abstain as much as possible from the capital punishments of death and mutilation his orthodox creed was subscribed with his own hand and he promised to obey the decrees of the seven synods and the canons of the holy church [68] But the assurance of mercy was loose and indefinite he swore not to his people but to an invisible judge and except in the inexpiable guilt of heresy the ministers of heaven were always prepared to preach the indefeasible right and to absolve the venial transgressions of their sovereign The Greek ecclesiastics were themselves the subjects of the civil magistrate at the nod of a tyrant the bishops were created or transferred or deposed or punished with an ignominious death whatever might be their wealth or influence they could never succeed like the Latin clergy in the establishment of an independent republic and the patriarch of Constantinople condemned what he secretly envied the temporal greatness of his Roman brother Yet the exercise of boundless despotism is happily checked by the laws of nature and necessity In proportion to his wisdom and virtue the master of an empire is confined to the path of his sacred and laborious duty In proportion to his vice and folly he drops the sceptre too weighty for his hands and the motions of the royal image are ruled by the imperceptible thread of some minister or favourite who undertakes for his private interest to exercise the task of the public oppression In some fatal moment the most absolute monarch may dread the reason or the caprice of a nation of slaves and experience has proved that whatever is gained in the extent is lost in the safety and solidity of regal power

Whatever titles a despot may assume *what*ever claims he may assert, it is on the sword that he must ultimately depend to guard him against his foreign and domestic enemies From the age of Charlemagne to that of the Crusades the world (for I overlook the remote monarchy of China) was occupied and disputed by the three great empires or nations of the Greeks the Saracens and the Franks Their military strength may be ascertained by a comparison of their courage their arts and riches and their obedience to a supreme head who might call into action all the energies of the state The Greeks, far inferior to their rivals in the first were superior to the Franks and at least equal to the Saracens in the second and third of these war like qualifications

The wealth of the Greeks enabled them to purchase the service of the poorer nations, and to maintain a naval power for the protection of their coasts and the annoyance of their enemies [69] A commerce of mutual benefit exchanged the gold of Constantinople for the blood *of the Sclavonians and Turks the Bul*garians and Russians their valour contributed to the victories of Nicephorus and Zimisces and if a hostile people pressed too closely on the frontier they were recalled to the defence of their country and the desire of peace by the well managed attack of a more distant tribe [70] The command of the Mediterranean from the mouth of the Tanais to the Columns of Hercules was always claimed, and often possessed by the successors of Constantine Their capital was filled with naval stores and dexterous artificers the situation of Greece and Asia the long coasts deep gulfs and numerous islands accustomed their subjects to the exercise of navigation and the trade of Venice and Amalfi supplied a nursery of seamen to the Imperial fleet [71] Since the time of the Peloponnesian and Punic wars the sphere of action had not been enlarged and the science of naval architecture appears to have declined The art of constructing those stupendous machines which displayed three or six or ten ranges of oars rising above or falling behind each other was unknown to the ship builders of Constantinople as well as to the mechanicians of modern days [72] The Dromones [73] or light galleys of the Byzantine empire were content with two tier of oars each tier was composed of five and twenty benches and two rowers were seated on each bench who plied their oars on either side of the vessel To these we must add the captain or centurion who in time of action stood erect with his armour bearer on the poop two steersmen at the helm, and two officers at the prow the one to manage the anchor the other to point and play against the enemy the tube of liquid fire The whole crew as in the infancy of the art performed the double service of mariners and soldiers they were provided with defensive and offensive arms—with bows and arrows which they used from the upper deck with long pikes which they pushed through the port holes of the lower tier Sometimes indeed the ships of war were of a larger and more solid construction and the

labours of combat and navigation were more regularly divided between seventy soldiers and two hundred and thirty mariners But for the most part they were of the light and manageable size and as the cape of Malea in Peloponnesus was still clothed with its ancient terrors an Imperial fleet was transported five miles over land across the Isthmus of Corinth [74] The principles of maritime tactics had not undergone any change since the time of Thucydides a squadron of galleys still advanced in a crescent, charged to the front and strove to impel their sharp beaks against the feeble sides of their antagonists A machine for casting stones and darts was built of strong timbers in the midst of the deck and the operation of boarding was effected by a crane that hoisted baskets of armed men The language of signals so clear and copious in the naval grammar of the moderns was imperfectly expressed by the various positions and colours of a commanding flag In the darkness of the night the same orders to chase, to attack to halt to retreat to break to form were conveyed by the lights of the leading galley By land the fire signals were repeated from one mountain to another a chain of eight stations commanded a space of five hundred miles and Constantinople in a few hours was apprised of the hostile motions of the Saracens of Tarsus [75] Some estimate may be formed of the power of the Greek emperors by the curious and minute detail of the armament which was prepared for the reduction of Crete A fleet of one hundred and twelve galleys, and seventy five vessels of the Pamphylian style, was equipped in the capital, the islands of the Ægean Sea and the seaports of Asia Macedonia and Greece It carried thirty four thousand mariners seven thousand three hundred and forty soldiers seven hundred Russians and five thousand and eighty seven Mardaites whose fathers had been transplanted from the mountains of Libanus Their pay most probably of a month was computed at thirty four centenaries of gold about one hundred and thirty six thousand pounds sterling Our fancy is bewildered by the endless recapitulation of arms and engines of clothes and linen of bread for the men and forage for the horses and of stores and utensils of every description inadequate to the conquest of a petty island but amply sufficient for the establishment of a flourishing colony [76]

The invention of the Greek fire did not like that of gunpowder produce a total revolution in the art of war To these liquid combustibles the city and empire of Constantine owed their deliverance, and they were employed in sieges and sea fights with terrible effect But they were either less improved or less susceptible of improvement the engines of antiquity the catapultæ, balistæ and battering rams, were still of most frequent and powerful use in the attack and defence of fortifications, nor was the decision of battles reduced to the quick and heavy fire of a line of infantry, whom it were fruitless to protect with armour against a similar fire of their enemies Steel and iron were still the common instruments of destruction and safety and the helmets, cuirasses and shields of the tenth century did not either in form or substance essentially differ from those which had covered the companions of Alexander or Achilles [77] But instead of accustoming the modern Greeks like the legionaries of old to the constant and easy use of this salutary weight their armour was laid aside in light chariots which followed the march till on the approach of an enemy they resumed with haste and reluctance the unusual encumbrance Their offensive weapons consisted of swords battle axes and spears but the Macedonian pike was shortened a fourth of its length and reduced to the more convenient measure of twelve cubits or feet. The sharpness of the Scythian and Arabian arrows had been severely felt, and the emperors lament the decay of archery as a cause of the public misfortunes and recommend as an advice and a command that the military youth till the age of forty should assiduously practise the exercise of the bow [78] The bands or regiments were usually three hundred strong and as a medium between the extremes of four and sixteen the foot soldiers of Leo and Constantine were formed eight deep, but the cavalry charged in four ranks from the reasonable consideration that the weight of the front could not be increased by any pressure of the hindmost horses If the ranks of the infantry or cavalry were sometimes doubled this cautious array betrayed a secret distrust of the courage of the troops whose numbers might swell the appearance of the line but of whom only a chosen band would dare to encounter the spears and swords of the barbarians The order of battle must have varied according to the ground the object and the adversary but their ordinary disposition in two lines and a reserve presented a succession of hopes and resources most agreeable to the temper as well as the judgment of the Greeks [79] In case of a repulse the first line fell back into the intervals of the second and the reserve breaking into two divisions wheeled round the flanks

to improve the victory or cover the retreat. Whatever authority could enact was accom plished at least in theory by the camps and marches, the exercises and evolutions the edicts and books, of the Byzantine monarch [80] What ever art could produce from the forge the loom or the laboratory was abundantly supplied by the riches of the prince and the industry of his numerous workmen But neither authority nor art could frame the most important machine, the soldier himself and if the ceremonies of Con stantine always suppose the safe and triumphal return of the emperor [81] his tactics seldom soar above the means of escaping a defeat and pro crastinating the war [82] Notwithstanding some transient success, the Greeks were sunk in their own esteem and that of their neighbours A cold hand and a loquacious tongue was the vulgar description of the nation the author of the Tac tics was besieged in his capital and the last of th barbarians, who trembled at the name of th Saracens or Franks could proudly exhibit the medals of gold and silver which they had extorted from the feeble sovereign of Constan ti ople What spirit their government and char a ter denied might have been inspired in some degree, by the influence of religion but the re ligion of the Greeks could only teach them to suffer and to yield The emperor Nicephorus, who restored for a moment the discipline and glory of the Roman name was desirous of be stowin the honours of martyrdom on the Chris tians who lost their lives in a holy war against the infidels. But this political law was defeated by the opposition of the patriarch the bishops and the principal senators and they strenu ously urged the canons of St. Basil that all who were polluted by the bloody trade of a soldier should be separated during three years from the communion of th faithful.[83]

These scruples of the Greeks have been com pared with the tears of the primitive Moslems when they were held back from battle and this contrast of base superstition and high spirited enthusiasm unfolds to a philosophic eye the his tory of the rival nations The subjects of the last caliphs[84] had undoubtedly degenerated from the z al and faith of the companions of the prophet Yet their martial creed represented the Deity as th author of war [85] the vital though latent spark of fanaticism still glowed in the heart of their religion and among the Saracens who dwelt on the Christian borders it was fre quently rekindled to a lively and active flame Their regular force was formed of the valiant slaves who had been educated to guard the per son and accompany the standard of their lord but the Musulman people of Syria and Cilicia of Africa and Spain was awakened by the trumpet which proclaimed a holy war again t the infidels The rich were ambitious of death or victory in the cause of God the poor were allured by the hopes of plunder and the old the infirm and the women assumed their share of meritorious service by sending their substi tutes with arms and horses into the field These offensive and defensive arms were similar in strength and temper to those of the Romans, whom they far excelled in the management of the horse and the bow the massy silver of their belts, their bridles, and their swords displayed the magnificence of a prosperous nation and except some black archers of the South the Arabs disdained the naked bravery of their an cestors. Instead of waggons they were attended by a long train of camels mules and asses the multitude of these animals whom they be decked with flags and streamers, appeared to swell the pomp and magnitude of their host and the horses of the enemy were often disordered by the uncouth figure and odious smell of the camels of the East. Invincible by their patience of thirst and heat, their spirits were frozen by a winter's cold and the consciousness of their propensity to sleep exacted the most rigorous precautions against the surprises of the night. Their order of battle was a long square of two deep solid lines the first of archers the second of cavalry In their engagements by sea and land they sustained with patient firmness the fury of the attack and seldom advanced to the charge till they could discern and oppress the lassitude of their foes But if they were repulsed and broken they knew not how to rally or re new the combat, and their dismay was height ened by the superstitious prejudice that God had declared himself on the side of their ene mies The decline and fall of the caliphs coun tenanced this fearful opinion nor were there wanting among the Mohammedans and Chris tians some obscure prophecies[86] which prog nosticated their alternate defeats The unity of the Arabian empire was dissolved but the inde pendent fragments were equal to populous and powerful kingdoms and in their naval and mili tary armaments an emir of Aleppo or Tunis might command no despicable fund of skill and industry and treasure In their transac tions of peace and war with the Saracens the princes of Constantinople too often felt that these barbarians had nothing barbarous in their discipline and that, if they were destitute of original genius, they had been endowed with a quick spirit of curiosity and imitation The model was indeed more perfect than the copy, their ships, and engines and fortifications were of a less skilful construction and they confess, without shame that the same God who has given a tongue to the Arabian had more nicely fashioned the hands of the Chinese and the heads of the Greeks [8]

A name of some German tribes between the Rhine and the Weser had spread its victorious influence over the greatest part of Gaul, Germany, and Italy and the common appellation of FRANKS[89] was applied by the Greeks and Arabians to the Christians of the Latin church, the nations of the West who stretched beyond their knowledge to the shores of the Atlantic Ocean The vast body had been inspired and united by the soul of Charlemagne but the division and degeneracy of his race soon annihilated the Imperial power, which would have rivalled the Cæsars of Byzantium, and revenged the indignities of the Christian name The enemies no longer feared, nor could the subjects any longer trust the application of a public revenue the labours of trade and manufactures in the military service the mutual aid of provinces and armies, and the naval squadrons which were regularly stationed from the mouth of the Elbe to that of the Tiber In the beginning of the tenth century the family of Charlemagne had almost disappeared his monarchy was broken into many hostile and independent states the regal title was assumed by the most ambitious chief their revolt was imitated in a long subordination of anarchy and discord, and the nobles of every province disobeyed their sovereign oppressed their vassals and exercised perpetual hostilities against their equals and neighbours Their private wars which overturned the fabric of government fomented the martial spirit of the nation In the system of modern Europe the power of the sword is possessed at least in fact by five or six mighty potentates their operations are conducted on a distant frontier by an order of men who devote their lives to the study and practice of the military art the rest of the country and community enjoys in the midst of war the tranquillity of peace and is only made sensible of the change by the aggravation or decrease of the public taxes. In the disorders of the tenth and eleventh centuries every peasant was a soldier and every village a fortification each wood or valley was a scene of murder and rapine and the lords of each castle were compelled to assume the character of princes and warriors To their own courage and policy they boldly trusted for the safety of their family, the protection of their lands and the revenge of their injuries and, like the conquerors of a larger size they were too apt to transgress the privilege of defensive war The powers of the mind and body were hardened by the presence of danger and necessity of resolution the same spirit refused to desert a friend and to forgive an enemy and instead of sleeping under the guardian care of the magistrate, they proudly disdained the authority of the laws In the days of feudal anarchy the instruments of agriculture and art were converted into the weapons of bloodshed the peaceful occupations of civil and ecclesiastical society were abolished or corrupted and the bishop who exchanged his mitre for a helmet was more forcibly urged by the manners of the times than by the obligation of his tenure.[90]

The love of freedom and of arms was felt with conscious pride by the Franks themselves, and is observed by the Greeks with some degree of amazement and terror ' The Franks, says the emperor Constantine are bold and valiant to the verge of temerity, and their dauntless spirit is supported by the contempt of danger and death In the field and in close onset they press to the front and rush headlong against the enemy, without deigning to compute either his numbers or their own Their ranks are formed by the firm connections of consanguinity and friendship and their martial deeds are prompted by the desire of saving or revenging their dearest companions In their eyes a retreat is shameful flight and flight is indelible infamy [91] A nation endowed with such high and intrepid spirit must have been secure of victory if these advantages had not been counterbalanced by many weighty defects. The decay of their naval power left the Greeks and Saracens in possession of the sea for every purpose of annoyance and supply In the age which preceded the institution of knighthood the Franks were rude and unskilful in the service of cavalry [92] and in all perilous emergencies their warriors were so conscious of their ignorance that they chose to dismount from their horses and fight on foot. Unpractised in the use of pikes or of missile weapons they were encumbered by the length of their swords the weight of their armour the magnitude of their shields and if I may repeat the satire of the meagre Greeks by their unwieldy intemperance Their independent spirit disdained the yoke of subordination and abandoned the standard of their chief if he attempted to keep the field beyond the term of their stipulation or service On all sides they were open to the snares of an enemy less brave but more artful than themselves They might be bribed for the barbarians were venal or surprised in the night for they neglected the precautions of a close encampment or vigilant sentinels The fatigues of a summer's campaign exhausted their strength and patience and they sunk in despair if their voracious appetite was disappointed of a plentiful supply of wine and of food This general character of the Franks was marked with some national and local shades which I should ascribe to accident rather than to climate but which were visible both to natives and to foreigners. An ambassador of the great Otho declared in the palace of Constantinople that the Saxons could dispute with swords better than with pens, and that they preferred inevitable death to the dishonour of turning their backs to an enemy[97] It was the glory of the nobles of France that in their humble dwellings war and rapine were the only pleasure, the sole occupation of their lives They affected to deride the palaces, the banquets the polished manners of the Italians who in the estimate of the Greeks themselves had degenerated from the liberty and valour of the ancient Lombards[98]

By the well known edict of Caracalla his subjects from Britain to Egypt were entitled to the name and privileges of Romans and their national sovereign might fix his occasional or permanent residence in any province of their common country In the division of the East and West an ideal unity was scrupulously preserved and in their titles laws and statutes the successors of Arcadius and Honorius announced themselves as the inseparable colleagues of the same office as the joint sovereigns of the Roman world and city which were bounded by the same limits After the fall of the Western monarchy the majesty of the purple resided solely in the princes of Constantinople and of these Justinian was the first who after a divorce of sixty years, regained the dominion of ancient Rome and asserted by the right of conquest the august title of Emperor of the Romans[94] A motive of vanity or discontent solicited one of his successors Constans the Second to abandon the Thracian Bosphorus and to restore the pristine honours of the Tiber an extravagant project (exclaims the malicious Byzantine) as if he had despoiled a beautiful and blooming virgin to enrich or rather to expose the deformity of a wrinkled and decrepit matron[95] But the sword of the Lombards opposed his settlement in Italy he entered Rome not as a conqueror but as a fugitive and after a visit of twelve days he pillaged and for ever deserted the ancient capital of the world[96] The final revolt and separation of Italy was accomplished about two centuries after the conquests of Justinian and from his reign we may date the gradual oblivion of the Latin tongue That legislator had composed his Institutes his Code and his Pandects in a language which he celebrates as the proper and public style of the Roman government the consecrated idiom of the palace and senate of Constantinople of the camps and tribunals of the East[97] But this foreign dialect was unknown to the people and soldiers of the Asiatic provinces it was imperfectly understood by the greater part of the interpreters of the laws and the ministers of the state After a short conflict nature and habit prevailed over the obsolete institutions of human power for the general benefit of his subjects Justinian promulgated his novels in the two languages the several parts of his voluminous jurisprudence were successively translated[98] the original was forgotten the version was studied and the Greek whose intrinsic merit deserved indeed the preference obtained a legal as well as popular establishment in the Byzantine monarchy The birth and residence of succeeding princes estranged them from the Roman idiom Tiberius by the Arabs[99] and Maurice by the Italians[100] are distinguished as the first of the Greek Cæsars as the founders of a new dynasty and empire the silent revolution was accomplished before the death of Heraclius and the ruins of the Latin speech were darkly preserved in the terms of jurisprudence and the acclamations of the palace After the restoration of the Western empire by Charlemagne and the Othos the names of Franks and Latins acquired an equal signification and extent and these haughty barbarians asserted with some justice their superior claim to the language and dominion of Rome They insulted the aliens of the East who had renounced the dress and idiom of Romans, and their reasonable practice will justify the frequent appellation of Greeks[101] But this contemptuous appellation was indignantly rejected by the prince and people to whom it is applied Whatsoever changes had been introduced by the lapse of ages they alleged a lineal and unbroken succession from Augustus and Constantine and in the lowest period of degeneracy and decay the name of ROMANS adhered to the last fragments of the empire of Constantinople[102]

While the government of the East was trans

acted in Latin, the Greek was the language of literature and philosophy nor could the masters of this rich and perfect idiom be tempted to envy the borrowed learning and imitative taste of their Roman disciples After the fall of Paganism the loss of Syria and Egypt and the extinction of the schools of Alexandria and Athens the studies of the Greeks insensibly retired to some regular monasteries and, above all to the royal college of Constantinople which was burnt in the reign of Leo the Isaurian [103] In the pompous style of the age the president of that foundation was named the Sun of Science his twelve associates the professors in the different arts and faculties were the twelve signs of the zodiac a library of thirty six thousand five hundred volumes was open to their inquiries and they could show an ancient manuscript of Homer on a roll of parchment one hundred and twenty feet in length the intestines as it was fabled of a prodigious serpent [104] But the seventh and eighth centuries were a period of discord and darkness the library was burnt the college was abolished, the Iconoclasts are represented as the foes of antiquity and a savage ignorance and contempt of letters has disgraced the princes of the Heraclean and Isaurian dynasties [105]

In the ninth century we trace the first dawnings of the restoration of science [106] After the fanaticism of the Arabs had subsided the caliphs aspired to conquer the arts rather than the provinces of the empire their liberal curiosity rekindled the emulation of the Greeks, brushed away the dust from their ancient libraries and taught them to know and reward the philosophers whose labours had been hitherto repaid by the pleasure of study and the pursuit of truth The Cæsar Bardas the uncle of Michael the Third was the generous protector of letters a title which alone has preserved his memory and excused his ambition A particle of the treasures of his nephew was sometimes diverted from the indulgence of vice and folly a school was opened in the palace of Magnaura and the presence of Bardas excited the emulation of the masters and students At their head was the philosopher Leo archbishop of Thessalonica, his profound skill in astronomy and the mathematics was admired by the strangers of the East and this occult science was magnified by vulgar credulity which modestly supposes that all knowledge superior to its own must be the effect of inspiration or magic At the pressing entreaty of the Cæsar his friend, the celebrated Photius,[107] renounced the freedom of a secular and studious life, ascended the patriarchal throne, and was alternately excommunicated and absolved by the synods of the East and West By the confession even of priestly hatred no art or science except poetry was foreign to this universal scholar, who was deep in thought indefatigable in reading and eloquent in diction Whilst he exercised the office of protospathaire or captain of the guards, Photius was sent ambassador to the caliph of Bagdad [108] The tedious hours of exile perhaps of confinement were beguiled by the hasty composition of his Library, a living monument of erudition and criticism Two hundred and fourscore writers historians orators philosophers theologians are reviewed without any regular method he abridges their narrative or doctrine appreciates their style and character and judges even the fathers of the church with a discreet freedom which often breaks through the superstition of the times The emperor Basil who lamented the defects of his own education intrusted to the care of Photius his son and successor Leo the Philosopher and the reign of that prince and of his son Constantine Porphyrogenitus forms one of the most prosperous eras of the Byzantine literature By their munificence the treasures of antiquity were deposited in the Imperial library by their pens or those of their associates they were imparted in such extracts and abridgments as might amuse the curiosity without oppressing the indolence of the public Besides the Basilics or code of laws, the arts of husbandry and war of feeding or destroying the human species were propagated with equal diligence and the history of Greece and Rome was digested into fifty three heads or titles of which two only (of embassies and of virtues and vices) have escaped the injuries of time In every station the reader might contemplate the image of the past world apply the lesson or warning of each page and learn to admire perhaps to imitate the examples of a brighter period I shall not expatiate on the works of the Byzantine Greek who by the assiduous study of the ancients have deserved in some measure the remembrance and gratitude of the moderns The scholars of the present age may still enjoy the benefit of the philosophical commonplace book of Stobæus the grammatical and historic lexicon of Suidas the Chiliads of Tzetzes which comprise six hundred narratives in twelve thousand verses and the commentaries on Homer of Eustathius archbishop of Thessalonica who from his horn of plenty, has poured the names and authorities of four hundred writers From these originals and from the numerous tribe of scholiasts and critics[109] some estimate may be formed of the literary wealth of the twelfth century Constantinople was enlightened by the genius of Homer and Demosthenes of Aristotle and Plato and in the enjoyment or neglect of our present riches we must envy the generation that could still peruse the history of Theopompus the orations of Hyperides the comedies of Menander[110] and the odes of Alcæus and Sappho The frequent labour of illustration attests not only the existence but the popularity of the Grecian classics the general knowledge of the age may be deduced from the example of two learned females, the empress Eudocia and the princess Anna Comnena who cultivated in the purple the arts of rhetoric and philosophy[111] The vulgar dialect of the city was gross and barbarous a more correct and elaborate style distinguished the discourse or at least the compositions of the church and palace which sometimes affected to copy the purity of the Attic models

In our modern education the painful though necessary attainment of two languages which are no longer living may consume the time and damp the ardour of the youthful student The poets and orators were long imprisoned in the barbarous dialects of our Western ancestors devoid of harmony or grace and their genius without precept or example was abandoned to the rude and native powers of their judgment and fancy But the Greeks of Constantinople, after purging away the impurities of their vulgar speech acquired the free use of their ancient language the most happy composition of human art and a familiar knowledge of the sublime masters who had pleased or instructed the first of nations But these advantages only tend to aggravate the reproach and shame of a degenerate people They held in their lifeless hands the riches of their fathers without inheriting the spirit which had created and improved that sacred patrimony they read they praised they compiled but their languid souls seemed alike incapable of thought and action In the revolution of ten centuries not a single discovery was made to exalt the dignity or promote the happiness of mankind Not a single idea has been added to the speculative systems of antiquity and a succession of patient disciples became in their turn the dogmatic teachers of the next servile generation Not a single composition of history philosophy or literature has been saved from oblivion by the intrinsic beauties of style or sentiment of original fancy or even of successful imitation In prose, the least offensive of the Byzantine writers are absolved from censure by their naked and unpresuming simplicity but the orators most eloquent[112] in their own conceit, are the farthest removed from the models whom they affect to emulate In every page our taste and reason are wounded by the choice of gigantic and obsolete words a stiff and intricate phraseology the discord of images the childish play of false or unseasonable ornament and the painful attempt to elevate themselves to astonish the reader and to involve a trivial meaning in the smoke of obscurity and exaggeration Their prose is soaring to the vicious affectation of poetry their poetry is sinking below the flatness and insipidity of prose The tragic epic and lyric muses were silent and inglorious the bards of Constantinople seldom rose above a riddle or epigram a panegyric or tale they forgot even the rules of prosody and with the melody of Homer yet sounding in their ears they confound all measure of feet and syllables in the impotent strains which have received the name of political or city verses[113] The minds of the Greeks were bound in the fetters of a base and imperious superstition which extends her dominion round the circle of profane science Their understandings were bewildered in metaphysical controversy in the belief of visions and miracles they had lost all principles of moral evidence and their taste was vitiated by the homilies of the monks an absurd medley of declamation and Scripture Even these contemptible studies were no longer dignified by the abuse of superior talents the leaders of the Greek church were humbly content to admire and copy the oracles of antiquity nor did the schools or pulpit produce any rivals of the fame of Athanasius and Chrysostom[114]

In all the pursuits of active and speculative life the emulation of states and individuals is the most powerful spring of the efforts and improvements of mankind The cities of ancient Greece were cast in the happy mixture of union and independence which is repeated on a larger scale but in a looser form by the nations of modern Europe the union of language religion and manners which renders them the spectators and judges of each other s merit[115] the independence of government and interest which asserts their separate freedom and excites them to strive for pre-eminence in the career of glory The situation of the Romans was less favourable yet in the early ages of the republic which fixed the national character a similar emulation was kindled among the states of Latium and Italy, and in the arts and sciences they aspired to equal or surpass their Grecian masters The empire of the Cæsars undoubtedly checked the activity and progress of the human mind its magnitude might indeed allow some scope for domestic competition, but when it was gradually reduced at first to the East and at last to Greece and Constantinople the Byzantine subjects were degraded to an abject and languid temper, the natural effect of their solitary and insulated state From the North they were oppressed by nameless tribes of barbarians to whom they scarcely imparted the appellation of men The language and religion of the more polished Arabs were an insurmountable bar to all social intercourse The conquerors of Europe were their brethren in the Christian faith but the speech of the Franks or Latins was unknown their manners were rude and they were rarely connected in peace or war with the successors of Heraclius Alone in the universe, the self satisfied pride of the Greeks was not disturbed by the comparison of foreign merit and it is no wonder if they fainted in the race since they had neither competitors to urge their speed nor judges to crown their victory The nations of Europe and Asia were mingled by the expeditions to the Holy Land and it is under the Comnenian dynasty that a faint emulation of knowledge and military virtue was rekindled in the Byzantine empire

Origin and Doctrine of the Paulicians Their Persecution by the Greek Emperors Revolt in Armenia, etc Transplantation into Thrace Propagation in the West The Seeds, Character, and Consequences of the Reformation

In the profession of Christianity the variety of national characters may be clearly distinguished The natives of Syria and Egypt abandoned their lives to lazy and contemplative devotion Rome again aspired to the dominion of the world and the wit of the lively and loquacious Greeks was consumed in the disputes of metaphysical theology The incomprehensible mysteries of the Trinity and Incarnation instead of commanding their silent submission were agitated in vehement and subtle controversies which enlarged their faith at the expense perhaps of their charity and reason From the council of Nice to the end of the seventh century the peace and unity of the church was invaded by these spiritual wars and so deeply did they affect the decline and fall of the empire that the historian has too often been compelled to attend the synods to explore the creeds and to enumerate the sects of this busy period of ecclesiastical annals From the beginning of the eighth century to the last ages of the Byzantine empire the sound of controversy was seldom heard curiosity was exhausted zeal was fatigued and in the decrees of six councils the articles of the Catholic faith had been irrevocably defined The spirit of dispute however vain and pernicious requires some energy and exercise of the mental faculties and the prostrate Greeks were content to fast to pray and to believe in blind obedience to the patriarch and his clergy During a long dream of superstition the Virgin and the saints their visions and miracles their relics and images were preached by the monks and worshipped by the people, and the appellation of people might be extended without injustice to the first ranks of civil society At an unseasonable moment the Isaurian emperors attempted somewhat rudely to awaken their subjects under their influence reason might obtain some proselytes a far greater number was swayed by interest or fear but the Eastern world embraced or deplored their visible deities and the restoration of images was celebrated as the feast of orthodoxy In this passive and unanimous state the ecclesiastical rulers were relieved from the toil or deprived of the pleasure of persecution The Pagans had disappeared the Jews were silent and obscure the disputes with the Latins were rare and remote hostilities against a national enemy and the sects of Egypt and Syria enjoyed a free toleration under the shadow of the Arabian caliphs About the middle of the seventh century a branch of Manichæans was selected as the victims of spiritual tyranny their patience was at length exasperated to despair and rebellion, and their exile has scattered over the West the seeds of reformation These important events will justify some inquiry into the doctrine and story of the Paulicians[1] and as they cannot plead for themselves our candid criticism will magnify the good and abate or suspect the evil that is reported by their adversaries

The Gnostics, who had distracted the in fancy were oppressed by the greatness and authority of the church Instead of emulating or surpassing the wealth learning and num bers of the Catholics their obscure remnant was driven from the capitals of the East and West, and confined to the villages and moun tains along the borders of the Euphrates Some vestig of the Marcionites may be detected in the fifth century [2] but the numerous sects were finally lost in the odious name of the Mani chæans and these heretics who presumed to reconcile the doctrines of Zoroaster and Christ were pursued by the two religions with equal and unrelenting hatred Under the grandson of Heraclius in the neighbourhood of Samosata more famous for th birth of Lucian than for the title of a Syrian kingdom a reformer arose esteemed by the Paulicians as the chosen mes senger of truth. In his humble dwelling of Mananalis Constantine entertained a deacon who returned from Syrian captivity and re ceived the inestimable gift of the New Testa ment, which was already concealed from the vulgar by the prudence of the Greek and per haps of the Gnostic, clergy [3] These books be came th measure of his studies and the rule of his faith and the Catholics who dispute his interpretation acknowledge that his text was genuine and sincere But he attached himself with peculiar devotion to the writings and character of St. Paul the name of the Pauli cians is derived by their enemies from some un known and domestic teacher but I am confi de t that they gloried in their affinity to the apo tle of th Gentiles His disciples Titus Timothy Sylvanus Tychicus were repre sented by Constantine and his fellow labourers th names of th apostolic churches were ap plied to the congregations which th ey assembled in Armen a and Cappadocia and this innocent allegory revived the example and memory of the first ages. In the Gospel and the Epistles of St. Paul his faithful follower investigated the creed of primiti e Christianity and whatever might be the success a Protestant reader will a plaud the spirit of the inquiry But if the Scriptures of the Paulician were pure they were not perfect. Their founders rejected the two Epistles of St. Peter [4] the apostle of the circumcision whose dispute with their favourite for the observance of the law could not easily be forgiven.[5] They agreed with their Gnostic brethren in the universal contempt for the Old Testament the books of Moses and the proph ets which have been con ecrated by the decrees of the Catholic church With equal boldness and doubtle s with more reason Constantine the new Sylvanus disclaimed the visions which in so many bulky and splendid volumes had been published by the Oriental sects [6] the fabulous productions of the Hebrew patriarchs and the sages of the East the spu ious gospels, epistles and acts which in the first age had overwhelmed the orthodox code the theology of Manes and the authors of the kindred heresies and the thirty generations or æons which had been created by the fruit ful fancy of Valentine The Paulicians sincerely condemned the memory and opinions of the Manichæan sect and complained of the in justice which impressed that invidious name on the simple votaries of St Paul and of Christ

Of the ecclesiastical chain many links had been broken by the Paulician reformers and their liberty was enlarged as they reduced the number of masters at whose voice profane reason must bow to mystery and miracle The early separation of the Gnostics had preceded the establishment of the Catholic worship and against the gradual innovations of discipline and doctrine they were as strongly guarded by habit and aversion as by th silence of St. Paul and the evangelists. The objects which had been transformed by the magic of superstition appeared to the eyes of the Paulicians in their genuine and naked colours An image made without hands was the common workmanship of a mortal artist to whose skill alone the wood and canvas must be ind bted for their merit or value The miraculous relics were a heap of bones and ashes destitute of life or virtue or of any relation perhaps with the person to whom they were ascribed The true and vivifying cross was a piece of sound or rotten timber the body and blood of Christ a loaf of bread and a cup of wine the gifts of nature and the symbols of grace The mother of God was de graded from her celestial honours and immacu late virginity and the saints and angels were no longer solicited to exercise the laborious off ce of mediation in heaven and ministry upon earth In the practice or at least in the theory of the sacraments the Paulicians were inclined to abolish all visible objects of worship and the words of the Gospel were in their judgment the baptism and communion of the faithful They indulged a convenient latitude for the interpretation of Scripture and as often as they

similar emulation was kindled among the states of Latium and Italy and in the arts and sciences they aspired to equal or surpass their Grecian masters The empire of the Cæsars undoubtedly checked the activity and progress of the human mind its magnitude might indeed allow some scope for domestic competition, but when it was gradually reduced at first to the East and at last to Greece and Constantinople, the Byzantine subjects were degraded to an abject and languid temper the natural effect of their solitary and insulated state From the North they were oppressed by nameless tribes of barbarians to whom they scarcely imparted the appellation of men The language and religion of the more polished Arabs were an insurmountable bar to all social intercourse The conquerors of Europe were their brethren in the Christian faith but the speech of the Franks or Latins was unknown their manners were rude and they were rarely connected in peace or war with the successors of Heraclius Alone in the universe the self satisfied pride of the Greeks was not disturbed by the comparison of foreign merit and it is no wonder if they fainted in the race since they had neither competitors to urge their speed nor judges to crown their victory The nations of Europe and Asia were mingled by the expeditions to the Holy Land and it is under the Comnenian dynasty that a faint emulation of knowledge and military virtue was rekindled in the Byzantine empire

The Pagans had disappeared the Jews were silent and obscure the disputes with the Latins were rare and remote hostilities against a national enemy and the sects of Egypt and Syria enjoyed a free toleration under the shadow of the Arabian caliphs About the middle of the seventh century a branch of Manichæans was selected as the victims of spiritual tyranny their patience was at length exasperated to despair and rebellion and their exile has scattered over the West the seeds of reformation. These important events will justify some inquiry into the doctrine and story of the Paulicians[1] and as they cannot plead for

From the blood and ashes of the first victims a succession of teachers and congregations repeatedly arose amidst their foreign hostilities they found leisure for domestic quarrels they preached, they disputed they suffered and the virtues the apparent virtues of Sergius in a pilgrimage of thirty three years are reluctantly confessed by the orthodox historians [16] The native cruelty of Justinian the Second was stimulated by a pious cause and he vainly hoped to extinguish in a single conflagration the name and memory of the Paulicians By their primitive simplicity their abhorrence of popular superstition, the Iconoclast princes might have been reconciled to some erroneous doctrines but they themselves were exposed to the calumnies of the monks and they chose to be the tyrants lest they be accused as the accomplices, of the Manichæans Such a reproach has sullied the clemency of Nicephorus who relaxed in their favour the severity of the penal statutes nor will his character sustain the honour of a more liberal motive The feeble Michael the First, the rigid Leo the Armenian were foremost in the race of persecution but the prize must doubtless be adjudged to the sanguinary devotion of Theodora who restored the images to the Oriental church Her inquisitors explored the cities and mountains of the lesser Asia and the flatterers of the empress have affirmed that, in a short reign one hundred thousand Paulicians were extirpated by the sword the gibbet or the flames. Her guilt or merit has perhaps been stretched beyond the measure of truth but if the account be allowed it must be presumed that many simple Iconoclasts were punished under a more odious name and that some who were driven from the church, unwillingly took refuge in the bosom of heresy

The most furious and desperate of rebels are the sectaries of a religion long persecuted and at length provoked In a holy cause they are no longer susceptible of fear or remorse the justice of their arms hardens them against the feelings of humanity and they revenge their fathers wrongs on the children of their tyrants Such have been the Hussites of Bohemia and the Calvinists of France, and such in the ninth century were the Paulicians of Armenia and the adjacent provinces [17] They were first awakened to the massacre of a governor and bishop who exercised the Imperial mandate of converting or destroying the heretics and the deepest recesses of Mount Argæus protected their independence and revenge A more dangerous and consuming flame was kindled by the persecution of Theodora and the revolt of Carbeas a valiant Paulician who commanded the guards of the general of the East His father had been impaled by the Catholic inquisitors and religion or at least nature might justify his desertion and revenge Five thousand of his brethren were united by the same motives they renounced the allegiance of anti Christian Rome a Saracen emir introduced Carbeas to the caliph and the commander of the faithful extended his sceptre to the implacable enemy of the Greeks In the mountains between Siwas and Trebizond he founded or fortified the city of Tephrice [18] which is still occupied by a fierce and licentious people and the neighbouring hills were covered with the Paulician fugitives who now reconciled the use of the Bible and the sword During more than thirty years Asia was afflicted by the calamities of foreign and domestic war in their hostile inroads the disciples of St. Paul were joined with those of Mohammed and the peaceful Christians the aged parent and tender virgin who were delivered into barbarous servitude might justly accuse the intolerant spirit of their sovereign. So urgent was the mischief so intolerable the shame that even the dissolute Michael the son of Theodora was compelled to march in person against the Paulicians he was defeated under the walls of Samosata and the Roman emperor fled before the heretics whom his mother had condemned to the flames The Saracens fought under the same banners but the victory was ascribed to Carbeas and the captive generals with more than a hundred tribunes were either released by his avarice or tortured by his fanaticism The valour and ambition of Chrysocheir [19] his successor embraced a wider circle of rapine and revenge. In alliance with his faithful Moslems, he boldly penetrated into the heart of Asia the troops of the frontier and the palace were repeatedly overthrown the edicts of persecution were answered by the pillage of Nice and Nicomedia of Ancyra and Ephesus nor could the apostle St. John protect from violation his city and sepulchre The cathedral of Ephesus was turned into a stable for mules and horses and the Paulicians vied with the Saracens in their contempt and abhorrence of images and relics It is not unpleasing to observe the triumph of rebellion over the same despotism which has disdained the prayers of an injured people The emperor Basil the Macedonian was reduced to sue for peace to offer a ransom for the captives and to request

were pressed by the literal sense they could escape to the intricate mazes of figure and allegory Their utmost diligence must have been employed to dissolve the connection between the Old and the New Testament since they adored the latter as the oracles of God and abhorred the former as the fabulous and absurd invention of men or demons We cannot be surprised that they should have found in the Gospel the orthodox mystery of the Trinity but instead of confessing the human nature and substantial sufferings of Christ they amused their fancy with a celestial body that passed through the virgin like water through a pipe with a fantastic crucifixion that eluded the vain and impotent malice of the Jews A creed thus simple and spiritual was not adapted to the genius of the times [7] and the rational Christian, who might have been contented with the light yoke and easy burden of Jesus and his apostles was justly offended that the Paulicians should dare to violate the unity of God the first article of natural and revealed religion Their belief and their trust was in the Father, of Christ of the human soul, and of the invisible world But they likewise held the eternity of matter a stubborn and rebellious substance the origin of a second principle of an active being who has created this visible world and exercises his temporal reign till the final consummation of death and sin [8] The appearances of moral and physical evil had established the two principles in the ancient philosophy and religion of the East, from whence this doctrine was transfused to the various swarms of the Gnostics A thousand shades may be devised in the nature and character of Ahriman from a rival god to a subordinate demon from passion and frailty to pure and perfect malevolence but in spite of our efforts the goodness and the power of Ormusd are placed at the opposite extremities of the line, and every step that approaches the one must recede in equal proportion from the other [9]

The apostolic labours of Constantine Sylvanus soon multiplied the number of his disciples the secret recompense of spiritual ambition The remnant of the Gnostic sects, and especially the Manichæans of Armenia, were united under his standard many Catholics were converted or seduced by his arguments and he preached with success in the regions of Pontus[10] and Cappadocia which had long since imbibed the religion of Zoroaster The Paulician teachers were distinguished only by their Scriptural names by the modest title of Fellow pilgrims by the austerity of their lives their zeal or knowledge and the credit of some extraordinary gifts of the Holy Spirit But they were incapable of desiring or at least of obtaining the wealth and honours of the Catholic prelacy such anti Christian pride they bitterly censured and even the rank of elders or presbyters was condemned as an institution of the Jewish synagogue The new sect was loosely spread over the provinces of Asia Minor to the westward of the Euphrates, six of their principal congregations represented the churches to which St Paul had addressed his epistles and their founder chose his residence in the neighbourhood of Colonia [11] in the same district of Pontus which had been celebrated by the altars of Bellona[12] and the miracles of Gregory [13] After a mission of twenty seven years Sylvanus who had retired from the tolerating government of the Arabs, fell a sacrifice to Roman persecution The laws of the pious emperors which seldom touched the lives of less odious heretics proscribed without mercy or disguise the tenets the books and the persons of the Montanists and Manichæans the books were delivered to the flames and all who should presume to secrete such writings, or to profess such opinions, were devoted to an ignominious death [14] A Greek minister, armed with legal and military powers, appeared at Colonia to strike the shepherd and to reclaim if possible the lost sheep By a refinement of cruelty Simeon placed the unfortunate Sylvanus before a line of his disciples who were commanded as the price of their pardon and the proof of their repentance to massacre their spiritual father They turned aside from the impious office the stones dropped from their filial hands and of the whole number only one executioner could be found a new David as he is styled by the Catholics who boldly overthrew the giant of heresy This apostate, Justus was his name again deceived and betrayed his unsuspecting brethren and a new conformity to the acts of St Paul may be found in the conversion of Simeon like the apostle he embraced the doctrine which he had been sent to persecute renounced his honours and fortunes and acquired among the Paulicians the fame of a missionary and a martyr They were not ambitious of martyrdom [15] but in a calamitous period of one hundred and fifty years their patience sustained whatever zeal could inflict and power was insufficient to eradicate the obstinate vegetation of fanaticism and reason

From the blood and ashes of the first victims a succession of teachers and congregations repeatedly arose amidst their foreign hostilities they found leisure for domestic quarrels they preached they disputed they suffered and the virtues the apparent virtues of Sergius in a pilgrimage of thirty three years are reluctantly confessed by the orthodox historians[16] The native cruelty of Justinian the Second was stimulated by a pious cause and he vainly hoped to extinguish in a single conflagration the name and memory of the Paulicians By their primitive simplicity their abhorrence of popular superstition the Iconoclast princes might have been reconciled to some erroneous doctrines but they themselves were exposed to the calumnies of the monks and they chose to be the tyrants, lest they be accused as the accomplices, of the Manichæans Such a reproach has sullied the clemency of Nicephorus who relaxed in their favour the severity of the penal statutes, nor will his character sustain the honour of a more liberal motive The feeble Michael the First the rigid Leo the Armenian were foremost in the *race of persecution but the prize must doubt*less be adjudged to the sanguinary devotion of Theodora, who restored the images to the Oriental church Her inquisitors explored the cities and mountains of the lesser Asia and the flatterers of the empress have affirmed that in a short reign one hundred thousand Paulicians were extirpated by the sword the gibbet or the flames. Her guilt or merit has perhaps been stretched beyond the measure of truth but if the account be allowed it must be presumed that many simple Iconoclasts were punished under a more odious name and that some who were driven from the church unwillingly took refug in the bosom of heresy

The most furious and desperate of rebels are the sectaries of a religion long persecuted and at length provoked In a holy cause they are no longer susceptible of fear or remorse the justice of their arms hardens them against the feelings of humanity and they revenge their fathers wron s on the children of their tyrants Such have been the Hussites of Bohemia and the Calvinists of France, and such in the ninth century were the Paulicians of Armenia and the adjacent provinces[17] They were first awakened to the massacre of a governor and bishop who exercised the Imperial mandate of converting or destroying the heretics and the deepest recesses of Mount Argæus protected their independence and revenge A more dangerous and consuming flame was kindled by the persecution of Theodora and the revolt of Carbeas a valiant Paulician, who commanded the guards of the general of the East. His father had been impaled by the Catholic inquisitors and religion or at least nature might justify his desertion and revenge Five thousand of his brethren were united by the same motives they renounced the allegiance of anti Christian Rome a Saracen emir introduced Carbeas to the caliph and the commander of the faithful extended his sceptre to the implacable enemy of the Greeks In the mountains between Siwas and Trebizond he founded or fortified the city of Tephrice[18] which is still occupied by a fierce and licentious people and the neighbouring hills were covered with the Paulician fugitives who now reconciled the use of the Bible and the sword During more than thirty years Asia was afflicted by the calamities of foreign and domestic war In their hostile inroads the disciples of St Paul were joined with those of Mohammed and the peaceful Christians, the aged parent and tender virgin who were delivered into barbarous servitude might justly accuse the intolerant spirit of their sovereign. So urgent was the mischief so intolerable the shame that even the dissolute Michael the son of Theodora was compelled to march in person against the Paulicians he was defeated under the walls of Samosata and the Roman emperor fled before the heretics whom his mother had condemned to the flames The Saracens fought under the same banners, but the victory was ascribed to Carbeas and the captive generals with more than a hundred tribunes, were either released by his avarice or tortured by his fanaticism. The valour and ambition of Chrysocheir[19] his successor embraced a wider circle of rapine and revenge. In alliance with his faithful Moslems, he boldly penetrated into the heart of Asia the troops of the frontier and the palace were repeatedly overthrown the edicts of persecution were answered by the pillage of Nice and Nicomedia, of Ancyra and Ephesus nor could the apostle St. John protect from violation his city and sepulchre The cathedral of Ephesus was turned into a stable for mules and horses and the Paulicians vied with the Saracens in their contempt and abhorrence of images and relics It is not unpleasing to observe the triumph of rebellion over the same despotism which has disdained the prayers of an injured people The emperor Basil, the Macedonian, was reduced to sue for peace to offer a ransom for the captives, and to request, and breathed in the Western world In the state in the church and even in the cloister, a latent succession was preserved of the disciples of St. Paul who protested against the tyranny of Rome embraced the Bible as the rule of faith and purified their creed from all the visions of the Gnostic theology The struggles of Wickliff in England of Huss in Bohemia, were premature and ineffectual but the names of Zuinglius Luther, and Calvin are pronounced with gratitude as the deliverers of nations

A philosopher who calculates the degree of their merit and the value of their reformation, will prudently ask from what articles of faith above or against our reason they have enfranchised the Christians for such enfranchisement is doubtless a benefit so far as it may be compatible with truth and piety After a fair discussion we shall rather be surprised by the timidity than candalised by the freedom of our first reformers [52] With the Jews they adopted the belief and defence of all the Hebrew Scriptures with all their prodigies, from the garden of Eden to the visions of the prophet Daniel and they were bound like the Catholics to justify against the Jews the abolition of a divine law In the great mysteries of the Trinity and Incarnation the reformers were severely orthodox they freely adopted the theology of the four or the six first councils and with the Athanasian creed they pronounced the eternal damnation of all who did not believe the Catholic faith Transubstantiation the invisible change of the bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ is a tenet that may defy the power of argument and pleasantry, but instead of con ulting the evidence of their senses of their sight, their feeling and their taste the first Protestants were entangled in their own scruples and awed by the words of Jesus in the institution of the sacrament Luther maintained a corporeal and Calvin a real presence of Christ in the eucharist and the opinion of Zuinglius that it is no more than a spiritual communion a simple memorial has slowly prevailed in the reformed churches [53] But the loss of one mystery was amply compensated by the stupendous doctrines of original sin redemption, faith, grace and predestination which have been strained from the epistles of St Paul These subtle questions had most as suredly been prepared by the fathers and schoolmen but the final improvement and popular use may be attributed to the first reformers who enforced them as the absolute and essential terms of salvation Hitherto the weight of supernatural belief inclines against the Protestants and many a sober Christian would rather admit that a wafer is God than that God is a cruel and capricious tyrant

Yet the services of Luther and his rivals are solid and important and the philosopher must own his obligations to these fearless enthusiasts [54] I By their hands the lofty fabric of superstition from the abuse of indulgences to the intercession of the Virgin, has been levelled with the ground Myriads of both sexes of the monastic profession were restored to the liberty and labours of social life A hierarchy of saints and angels of imperfect and subordinate deities were stripped of their temporal power, and reduced to the enjoyment of celestial happiness their images and relics were banished from the church, and the credulity of the people was no longer nourished with the daily repetition of miracles and visions The imitation of paganism was supplied by a pure and spiritual worship of prayer and thanksgiving the most worthy of man the least unworthy of the Deity It only remains to observe whether such sublime simplicity be consistent with popular devotion whether the vulgar in the absence of all visible objects will not be inflamed by enthusiasm or insensibly subside in languor and indifference II The chain of authority was broken which restrains the bigot from thinking as he pleases and the slave from speaking as he thinks the popes fathers and councils were no longer the supreme and infallible judges of the world and each Christian was taught to acknowledge no law but the Scriptures no interpreter but his own conscience This freedom however, was the consequence rather than the design of the Reformation The patriot reformers were ambitious of succeeding the tyrants whom they had dethroned They imposed with equal rigour their creeds and confessions they asserted the right of the magistrate to punish heretics with death The pious or personal animosity of Calvin proscribed in Servetus[55] the guilt of his own rebellion [56] and the flames of Smithfield in which he was afterwards consumed had been kindled for the Anabaptists by the zeal of Cranmer [57] The nature of the tiger was the same but he was gradually deprived of his teeth and fangs A spiritual and temporal kingdom was possessed by the Roman pontiff the Protestant doctors were subjects of a humble rank without revenue or jurisdiction His decrees were consecrated by the antiquity of the Catholic church their arguments and disputes were submitted to the people and their appeal to private judgment was accepted beyond their wishes by curiosity and enthusiasm Since the days of Luther and Calvin a secret reformation has been silently working in the bosom of the reformed churches many weeds of prejudice were eradicated and the disciples of Erasmus[88] diffused a spirit of freedom and moderation The liberty of conscience has been claimed as a common benefit an inalienable right[89] the free governments of Holland[90] and England[91] introduced the practice of toleration and the narrow allowance of the laws has been enlarged by the prudence and humanity of the times In the exercise the mind has understood the limits of its powers and the words and shadows that might amuse the child can no longer satisfy his manly reason The volumes of controversy are overspread with cobwebs the doctrine of a Protestant church is far removed from the knowledge or belief of its private members and the forms of orthodoxy the articles of faith are subscribed with a sigh or a smile by the modern clergy Yet the friends of Christianity are alarmed at the boundless impulse of inquiry and scepticism The predictions of the Catholics are accomplished the web of mystery is unravelled by the Armenians Arians and Socinians whose numbers must not be computed from their separate congregations and the pillars of Revelation are shaken by those men who preserve the name without the substance of religion who indulge the licence without the temper of philosophy[92]

CHAPTER LV

The Bulgarians Origin, Migrations, and Settlement of the Hungarians Their Inroads in the East and West The Monarchy of Russia Geography and Trade Wars of the Russians against the Greek Empire Conversion of the Barbarians

Under the reign of Constantine the grandson of Heraclius the ancient barrier of the Danube so often violated and so often restored was irretrievably swept away by a new deluge of barbarians Their progress was favoured by the caliphs their unknown and accidental auxiliaries the Roman legions were occupied in Asia and after the loss of Syria Egypt and Africa the Cæsars were twice reduced to the danger and disgrace of defending their capital against the Saracens If in the account of this interesting people I have deviated from the strict and original line of my undertaking the merit of the subject will hide my transgression or solicit my excuse In the East in the West in war in religion in science in their prosperity and in their decay the Arabians press themselves on our curiosity the first overthrow of the church and empire of the Greeks may be imputed to their arms and the disciples of Mohammed still hold the civil and religious sceptre of the Oriental world But the same labour would be unworthily bestowed on the swarms of savages who between the seventh and the twelfth century descended from the plains of Scythia in transient inroad or perpetual emigration[1] Their names are uncouth their origins doubtful their actions obscure their superstition was blind their valour brutal and the uniformity of their public and private lives was neither softened by innocence nor refined by policy The majesty of the Byzantine throne repelled and survived their disorderly attacks the greater part of these barbarians has disappeared without leaving any memorial of their existence and the despicable remnant continues and may long continue to groan under the dominion of a foreign tyrant. From the antiquities of I Bulgarians II Hungarians and III Russians I shall content myself with selecting such facts as yet deserve to be remembered The conquests of the IV NORMANS and the monarchy of the V TURKS will naturally terminate in the memorable Crusades to the Holy Land and the double fall of the city and empire of Constantine

I In his march to Italy Theodoric[2] the Ostrogoth had trampled on the arms of the Bulgarians. After this defeat the name and the nation are lost during a century and a half and it may be suspected that the same or a similar appellation was revived by strange colonies from the Borysthenes, the Tanais or the Volga. A king of the ancient Bulgaria[3] bequeathed to his five sons a last lesson of moderation and concord It was received as youth has ever received the counsels of age and experience the five princes buried their father, divided his subjects and cattle forgot his advice separated from each other, and wandered in quest of fortune, till we find the most adventurous in the heart of Italy under the protection of the exarch of Ravenna [4] But the stream of emigration was directed or impelled towards the capital The modern Bulgaria along the southern banks of the Danube was stamped with the name and image which it was retained to the present hour the new conquerors uccessively acquired by war or treaty, the Roman provinces of Dardania Thessaly, and the two Epirus [5] the ecclesiastical supremacy was translated from the native city of Justinian, and in their prosperous age the obscure town of Lychnidus or Achrida was honoured with the throne of a king and a patriarch [6] The unquestionable evidence of language attests the descent of the Bulgarians from the original stock of the Sclavonian, or more properly Slavonian, race,[7] and the kindred bands of Servians Bosnians Rascians Croatians Wallachians [8] etc followed either the standard or the example of the leading tribe From the Euxine to the Adriatic in the state of captives or subjects or allies or enemies of the Greek empire they overspread the land and the national appellation of the SLAVES[9] has been degraded by chance or malice from the signification of glory to that of servitude [10] Among these colonies the Chrobatians [11] or Croats who now attend the motions of an Austrian army, are the descendants of a mighty people the conquerors and sovereigns of Dalmatia The maritime cities and of these the infant republic of Ragusa implored the aid and instructions of the Byzantine court they were advised by the magnanimous Basil to reserve a small acknowledgment of their fidelity to the Roman empire, and to appease by an annual tribute the wrath of these irresistible barbarians The kingdom of Croatia was shared by eleven Zoupans or feudatory lords and their united forces were numbered at sixty thousand horse and one hundred thousand foot A long sea coast indented with capacious harbours covered with a string of islands and almost in sight of the Italian shores, disposed both the natives and strangers to the practice of navigation. The boats or brigantines of the Croats were constructed after the fashion of the old Liburnians one hundred and eighty vessels may excite the idea of a respectable navy but our seamen will smile at the allowance of ten or twenty or forty men for each of these ships of war They were gradually converted to the more honourable service of commerce yet the Sclavonian pirates were still frequent and dangerous, and it was not before the close of the tenth century that the freedom and sovereignty of the Gulf were effectually vindicated by the Venetian republic [12] The ancestors of these Dalmatian kings were equally removed from the use and abuse of navigation they dwelt in the White Croatia, in the inland regions of Silesia and Little Poland thirty days' journey according to the Greek computation from the sea of darkness

The glory of the Bulgarians[13] was confined to a narrow cope both of time and place In the ninth and tenth centuries they reigned to the south of the Danube, but the more powerful nations that had followed their emigration repelled all return to the north and all progress to the west. Yet in the obscure catalogue of their exploits they might boast an honour which had hitherto been appropriated to the Goths that of slaying in battle one of the successors of Augustus and Constantine The emperor Nicephorus had lost his fame in the Arabian he lost his life in the Sclavonian war In the first operations he advanced with boldness and success into the centre of Bulgaria and burnt the royal court which was probably no more than an edifice and village of timber But while he searched the spoil and refused all offers of treaty his enemies collected their spirits and their forces, the passes of retreat were insuperably barred and the trembling Nicephorus was heard to exclaim, 'Alas alas' unless we could assume the wings of birds we cannot hope to escape Two days he waited his fate in the inactivity of despair but on the morning of the third the Bulgarians surprised the camp and the Roman prince with the great officers of the empire were slaughtered in their tents The body of Valens had been saved from insult but the head of Nicephorus was exposed on a spear and his skull enchased with gold was often replenished in the feasts of victory The Greeks bewailed the dishonour of the throne but they acknowledged the just punishment of avarice and cruelty This savage cup was deeply tinctured with the manners of the Scythian wilderness but they were softened before the end of the same century by a peaceful intercourse with the Greeks the possession of a cultivated region and the introduction of the Christian worship The nobles of Bulgaria were educated in the schools and palace of Constantinople and Simeon [14] a youth of the royal line was instructed in the rhetoric of

Demosthenes and the logic of Aristotle He relinquished the profession of a monk for that of a king and warrior and in his reign of more than forty years Bulgaria assumed a rank among the civilised powers of the earth. The Greeks whom he repeatedly attacked derived a faint consolation from indulging themselves in the reproaches of perfidy and sacrilege. They purchased the aid of the pagan Turks but Simeon, in a second battle redeemed the loss of the first at a time when it was esteemed a victory to elude the arms of that formidable nation The Servians were overthrown made captive, and dispersed and those who visited the country before their restoration could discover no more than fifty vagrants without women or children who extorted a precarious subsistence from the chase On classic ground on the banks of the Achelous, the Greeks were defeated their horn was broken by the strength of the barbaric Hercules [15] He formed the siege of Constantinople and in a personal conference with the emperor Simeon imposed the conditions of peace They met with the most jealous precautions the royal galley was drawn close to an artificial and well fortified platform and the majesty of the purple was emulated by the pomp of the Bulgarian Are you a Christian? said the humble Romanus It is your duty to abstain from the blood of your fellow Christians Has the thirst of riches seduced you from the blessings of peace? Sheathe your sword open your hand, and I will satiate the utmost measure of your desires The reconciliation was sealed by a domestic alliance the freedom of trade was granted or restored the first honours of the court were secured to the friends of Bulgaria above the ambassadors of enemies or strangers [16] and her princes were dignified with the high and invidious title of Basileus or emperor But this friendship was soon disturbed after the death of Simeon the nations were again in arms his feeble successors were divided and extinguished and in the beginning of the eleventh century the second Basil who was born in the purple deserved the appellation of conqueror of the Bulgarians His avarice was in some measure gratified by a treasure of four hundred thousand pounds sterling (ten thousand pounds weight of gold) which he found in the palace of Lychnidus His cruelty inflicted a cool and exquisite vengeance on fifteen thousand captives who had been guilty of the defence of their country They were deprived of sight, but to one of each hundred a single eye was left, that he might conduct his blind century to the presence of their king Their king is said to have expired of grief and horror the nation was awed by this terrible example the Bulgarians were swept away from their settlements and circumscribed within a narrow province the surviving chiefs bequeathed to the children the advice of patience and the duty of revenge

II When the black swarm of Hungarians first hung over Europe about nine hundred years after the Christian era, they were mistaken by fear and superstition for the Gog and Magog of the Scriptures the signs and forerunners of the end of the world [17] Since the introduction of letters they have explored their own antiquities with a strong and laudable impulse of patriotic curiosity [18] Their rational criticism can no longer be amused with a vain pedigree of Attila and the Huns but they complain that their primitive records have perished in the Tartar war that the truth or fiction of their rustic songs is long since forgotten and that the fragments of a rude chronicle[19] must be painfully reconciled with the contemporary though foreign intelligence of the Imperial geographer [20] Magyar is the national and oriental denomination of the Hungarians but among the tribes of Scythia they are distinguished by the Greeks under the proper and peculiar name of Turks as the descendants of that mighty people who had conquered and reigned from China to the Volga The Pannonian colony preserved a correspondence of trade and amity with the eastern Turks on the confines of Persia and after a separation of three hundred and fifty years the missionaries of the king of Hungary discovered and visited their ancient country near the banks of the Volga They were hospitably entertained by a people of pagans and savages who still bore the name of Hungarians conversed in their native tongue recollected a tradition of their long lost brethren and listened with amazement to the marvellous tale of their new kingdom and religion The zeal of conversion was animated by the interest of consanguinity and one of the greatest of their princes had formed the generous though fruitless design of replenishing the solitude of Pannonia by this domestic colony from the heart of Tartary [21] From this primitive country they were driven to the West by the tide of war and emigration by the weight of the more distant tribes who at the same time were fugitives and conquerors Reason or fortune directed their course towards the frontiers of the Roman empire they halted in the usual

stations along the banks of the great rivers and in the territories of Moscow Kiow, and Moldavia some vestiges have been discovered of their temporary residence In this long and various peregrination they could not always escape the dominion of the stronger, and the purity of their blood was improved or sullied by the mixture of a foreign race, from a motive of compulsion or choice several tribes of the Chazars were associated to the standard of their ancient vassals introduced the use of a second language and obtained by their superior renown the most honourable place in the front of battle The military force of the Turks and their allies marched in seven equal and artificial divisions each division was formed of thirty thousand eight hundred and fifty seven warriors and the proportion of women, children, and servants supposes and requires at least a million of emigrants Their public counsels were directed by seven vayvods, or hereditary chiefs but the experience of discord and weakness recommended the more simple and vigorous administration of a single person The sceptre which had been declined by the modest Lebedias was granted to the birth or merit of Almus and his son Arpad, and the authority of the supreme khan of the Chazars confirmed the engagement of the prince and people of the people to obey his commands of the prince to consult their happiness and glory

With this narrative we might be reasonably content if the penetration of modern learning had not opened a new and larger prospect of the antiquities of nations The Hungarian language stands alone and as it were insulated among the Sclavonian dialects but it bears a close and clear affinity to the idioms of the Fennic race [2] of an obsolete and savage race which formerly occupied the northern regions of Asia and Europe The genuine appellation of Ugri or Igours is found on the western confines of China [23] their migration to the banks of the Irtish is attested by Tartar evidence [24] a similar name and language are detected in the southern parts of Siberia [25] and the remains of the Fennic tribes are widely, though thinly, scattered from the sources of the Oby to the shores of Lapland [26] The consanguinity of the Hungarians and Laplanders would display the powerful energy of climate on the children of a common parent the lively contrast between the bold adventurers who are intoxicated with the wines of the Danube and the wretched fugitives who are immersed beneath the snows of the polar circle Arms and freedom have ever been the ruling though too often the unsuccessful passion of the Hungarians who are endowed by nature with a vigorous constitution of soul and body [7] Extreme cold has diminished the stature and congealed the faculties of the Laplanders and the Arctic tribes alone among the sons of men are ignorant of war and unconscious of human blood a happy ignorance if reason and virtue were the guardians of their peace [128]

It is the observation of the Imperial author of the Tactics [29] that all the Scythian hordes resembled each other in their pastoral and military life, that they all practised the same means of subsistence and employed the same instruments of destruction But he adds that the two nations of Bulgarians and Hungarians were superior to their brethren and similar to each other in the improvements however rude of their discipline and government their visible likeness determines Leo to confound his friends and enemies in one common description and the picture may be heightened by some strokes from their contemporaries of the tenth century Except the merit and fame of military prowess all that is valued by mankind appeared vile and contemptible to these barbarians whose native fierceness was stimulated by the consciousness of numbers and freedom The tents of the Hungarians were of leather, their garments of fur they shaved their hair and scarified their faces in speech they were slow in action prompt in treaty perfidious and they shared the common reproach of barbarians too ignorant to conceive the importance of truth too proud to deny or palliate the breach of their most solemn engagements Their simplicity has been praised, yet they abstained only from the luxury they had never known whatever they saw they coveted their desires were insatiate and their sole industry was the hand of violence and rapine By the definition of a pastoral nation I have recalled a long description of the economy the warfare and the government that prevail in that state of society I may add that to fishing as well as to the chase the Hungarians were indebted for a part of their subsistence and since they seldom cultivated the ground they must at least in their new settlements have sometimes practised a slight and unskilful husbandry In their emigrations perhaps in their expeditions the host was accompanied by thousands of sheep and oxen which increased the cloud of formidable dust and afforded a constant and wholesome supply of milk and animal food A plentiful command of forage

was the first care of the general and if the flocks and herds were secure of their pastures the hardy warrior was alike insensible of dan ger and fatigue The confusion of men and cat tle that overspread the country exposed their camp to a nocturnal surprise had not a still wider circuit been occupied by their light caval ry perpetually in motion to discover and delay the approach of the enemy After some experi ence of the Roman tactics they adopted the use of the sword and spear the helmet of the sol dier and the iron breastplate of his steed but their native and deadly weapon was the Tartar bow from the earliest infancy their children and servants were exercised in the double science of archery and horsemanship their arm was strong their aim was sure and in the most rapid career they were taught to throw them selves backwards and to shoot a volley of arrows into the air In open combat, in secret ambush in flight or pursuit they were equally formidable an appearance of order was main tained in the foremost ranks but their charge was driven forwards by the impatient pressure of succeeding crowds They pursued headlong and rash with loosened reins and horrific out cries but, if they fled with real or dissembled fear the ardour of a pursuing foe was checked and chastised by the same habits of irregular speed and sudden evolution In the abuse of victory they astonished Europe yet smarting from the wounds of the Saracen and the Dane mercy they rarely asked and more rarely be stowed both sexes were accused as equally inaccessible to pity and their appetite for raw flesh might countenance the popular tale that they drank the blood and feasted on the hearts of the slain. Yet the Hungarians were not de void of those principles of justice and humanity which nature has implanted in every bosom. The licence of public and private injuries was restrained by laws and punishments and in the security of an open camp theft is the most tempting and most dangerous offence Among the barbarians there were many whose spon taneous virtue supplied their laws and corrected their manners who performed the duties and sympathized with the affections of social life

After a long pilgrimage of flight or victory the Turkish hordes approached the common limits of the French and Byzantine empires Their first conquests and final settlements ex tended on either side of the Danube above Vienna below Belgrade and beyond the mea sure of the Roman province on the modern kingdom of Hungary [13] That ample and fertile land was loosely occupied by the Moravians a Sclavonian name and tribe which were driven by the invaders into the compass of a narrow province Charlemagne had stretched a vague and nominal empire as far as the edge of Tran sylvania but, after the failure of his legitimate line the dukes of Moravia forgot their obedi ence and tribute to the monarchs of Oriental France The bastard Arnulph was provoked to invite the arms of the Turks they rushed through the real or figurative wall which his indiscretion had thrown open and the king of Germany has been justly reproached as a traitor to the civil and ecclesiastical society of the Christians During the life of Arnulph the Hungarians were checked by gratitude or fear but in the infancy of his son Lewis they discov ered and invaded Bavaria and such was their Scythian speed that in a single day a circuit of fifty miles was stripped and consumed In the battle of Augsburg the Christians maintained their advantage till the seventh hour of the day they were deceived and vanquished by the flying stratagems of the Turkish cavalry The conflagration spread over the provinces of Bavaria Swabia and Franconia and the Hun garians[31] promoted the reign of anarchy by forcing the stoutest barons to discipline their vassals and fortify their castles

The origin of walled towns is ascribed to their calamitous period nor could any distance be secure against an enemy who almost at the same instant, laid in ashes the Helvetian monas tery of St. Gall and the city of Bremen on the shores of the northern ocean Above thirty years the Germanic empire or kingdom, was subject to the ignominy of tribute and resis tance was disarmed by the menace the serious and effectual menace of dragging the women and children into captivity and of slaughtering the males above the age of ten years I have neither power nor inclination to follow the Hungarians beyond the Rhine but I must ob serve with surprise that the southern provinces of France were blasted by the tempest and that Spain behind her Pyrenees was aston ished at the approach of these formidable stran gers [32] The vicinity of Italy had tempted their early inroads but from their camp on the Brenta they beheld with some terror the ap parent strength and populousness of the new discovered country They requested leave to retire their request was proudly rejected by the Italian king and the lives of twenty thousand Christians paid the forfeit of his obstinacy and rashness Among the cities of the West the royal

Pavia was conspicuous in fame and splendour, and the pre eminence of Rome itself was only derived from the relics of the apostles The Hungarians appeared Pavia was in flames forty three churches were consumed and, after the massacre of the people they spared about two hundred wretches who had gathered some bushels of gold and silver (a vague exaggeration) from the smoking ruins of their country In these annual excursions from the Alps to the neighbourhood of Rome and Capua the churches that yet escaped resounded with a fearful litany 'Oh, save and deliver us from the arrows of the Hungarians!' But the saints were deaf or inexorable and the torrent rolled forwards till it was stopped by the extreme land of Calabria [33] A composition was offered and accepted for the head of each Italian subject and ten bushels of silver were poured forth in the Turkish camp But falsehood is the natural antagonist of violence and the robbers were defrauded both in the numbers of the assessment and the standard of the metal On the side of the East the Hungarians were opposed in doubtful conflict by the equal arms of the Bulgarians whose faith forbade an alliance with the pagans and whose situation formed the barrier of the Byzantine empire The barrier was overturned the emperor of Constantinople beheld the waving banners of the Turks and one of their boldest warriors presumed to strike a battle axe into the golden gate The arts and treasures of the Greeks diverted the assault but the Hungarians might boast in their retreat that they had imposed a tribute on the spirit of Bulgaria and the majesty of the Cæsars [34] The remote and rapid operations of the same campaign appear to magnify the power and numbers of the Turks but their courage is most deserving of praise since a light troop of three or four hundred horses would often attempt and execute the most daring inroads to the gates of Thessalonica and Constantinople At this disastrous era of the ninth and tenth centuries Europe was afflicted by a triple scourge from the North the East and the South the Norman the Hungarian and the Saracen sometimes trod the same ground of desolation and these savage foes might have been compared by Homer to the two lions growling over the carcase of a mangled stag [35]

The deliverance of Germany and Christendom was achieved by the Saxon princes Henry the Fowler and Otho the Great who in two memorable battles forever broke the power of the Hungarians [36] The valiant Henry was roused from a bed of sickness by the invasion of his country, but his mind was vigorous and his prudence successful 'My companions," said he on the morning of the combat 'maintain your ranks, receive on your bucklers the first arrows of the pagans and prevent their second discharge by the equal and rapid career of your lances They obeyed and conquered and the historical picture of the castles of Merseburgh expressed the features or at least the character of Henry who in an age of ignorance, intrusted to the finer arts the perpetuity of his name [37] At the end of twenty years the children of the Turks who had fallen by his sword invaded the empire of his son and their force is defined in the lowest estimate at one hundred thousand horse They were invited by domestic faction, the gates of Germany were treacherously unlocked and they spread far beyond the Rhine and the Meuse into the heart of Flanders But the vigour and prudence of Otho dispelled the conspiracy the princes were made sensible that unless they were true to each other their religion and country were irrecoverably lost and the national powers were reviewed in the plains of Augsburg They marched and fought in eight legions according to the division of provinces and tribes the first second and third were composed of Bavarians the fourth of Franconians the fifth of Saxon under the immediate command of the monarch the sixth and seventh consisted of Swabians and the eighth legion of a thousand Bohemians closed the rear of the host The resources of discipline and valour were fortified by the arts of superstition which on this occasion may deserve the epithets of generous and salutary The soldiers were purified with a fast the camp was blessed with the relics of saints and martyrs and the Christian hero girded on his side the sword of Constantine grasped the invincible spear of Charlemagne and waved the banner of St Maurice the prefect of the Thebæan legion But his firmest confidence was placed in the holy lance [38] whose point was fashioned of the nails of the cross and which his father had extorted from the king of Burgundy by the threats of war and the gift of a province The Hungarians were expected in the front they secretly passed the Lech a river of Bavaria that falls into the Danube turned the rear of the Christian army plundered the baggage and disordered the legions of Bohemia and Swabia The battle was restored by the Franconians whose duke the valiant Conrad was pierced with an arrow as he rested from his fatigues, th Saxons fought ur der the eyes of their king and his victory surpassed in merit and importance the triumphs of the last two hundred years The loss of the Hungarians was still greater in the flight than in the action they were encompassed by the rivers of Bavaria and their past cruelties excluded them from the hope of mercy Three captive princes were hang d at Ratisbon the multitude of prisoners was slain or mutilated and the fugitives who presumed to appear in the face of their country were condemned to everlasting poverty and disgrace[60] Yet the spirit of the nation was humbled and the most accessible passes of Hungary were fortified with a ditch and rampart Adversity suggested the counsels of moderation and peace the robbers of the West acquiesced in a sedentary life and the next generation was taught, by a discerning prince, that far more might be gained by multiplying and exchanging the produce of a fruitful soil The native race, the Turkish or Fennic blood was mingled with new colonies of Scythian or Sclavonian origin[61] many thousands of robust and industrious captives had been imported from all the countries of Europe[62] and after the marriage of Geisa with a Bavarian princess, he bestowed honours and estates on the nobles of Germany[63] The son of Geisa was invested with the regal title and the house of Arpad reigned three hundred years in the kingdom of Hungary But the freeborn barbarians were not dazzled by the lustre of the diadem and the people asserted their indefeasible right of choosing deposing and punishing the hereditary servant of the state

III The name of RUSSIANS[64] was first divulged in the ninth century by an embassy from Theophilus, emperor of the East to the emperor of the West Lewis the son of Charlemagne The Greeks were accompanied by the envoys of the great duke or chagan or czar of the Russians. In their journey to Constantinople they had traversed many hostile nations, and they hoped to escape the dangers of their return by requesting the French monarch to transport them by sea to their native country A closer examination detected their origin they were the brethren of the Swedes and Normans, whose name was already odious and formidable in France and it might justly be apprehended that these Russian strangers were not the messengers of peace but the emissaries of war They were detained while the Greeks were dismissed and Lewis expected a more satisfactory account, that he might obey the laws of hospitality or prudence according to the interest of both empires[65] This Scandinavian origin of the people or at least the princes of Russia may be confirmed and illustrated by the national annals[66] and the general history of the North. The Normans who had so long been concealed by a veil of impenetrable darkness suddenly burst forth in the spirit of naval and military enterprise The vast and as it is said the populous, regions of Denmark Sweden and Norway were crowded with independent chieftains and desperate adventurers who sighed in the laziness of peace and smiled in the agonies of death Piracy was the exercise the trade the glory and the virtue of the Scandinavian youth Impatient of a bleak climate and narrow limits they started from the banquet grasped their arms, sounded their horn ascended the vessels and explored every coast that promised either spoil or settlement The Baltic was the first scene of their naval achievements they visited the eastern shores the silent residence of Fennic and Sclavonian tribes and the primitive Russians of the lake Ladoga paid a tribute the skins of white squirrels to these strangers, whom they saluted with the title of Varangians[66] or Corsairs Their superiority in arms discipline and renown commanded the fear and reverence of the natives In their wars against the more inland savages the Varangians condescended to serve as friends and auxiliaries and gradually by choice or conquest obtained the dominion of a people whom they were qualified to protect Their tyranny was expelled their valour was again recalled till at length Ruric a Scandinavian chief became the father of a dynasty which reigned above seven hundred years His brothers extended his influence the example of service and usurpation was imitated by his companions in the southern provinces of Russia and their establishments by the usual methods of war and assassination were cemented into the fabric of a powerful monarchy

As long as the descendants of Ruric were considered as aliens and conquerors they ruled by the sword of the Varangians distributed estates and subjects to their faithful captains, and supplied their numbers with fresh streams of adventurers from the Baltic coast.[67] But when the Scandinavian chiefs had struck a deep and permanent root into the soil they mingled with the Russians in blood religion and language and the first Waladimir had the merit of delivering his country from these foreign mercenaries They had seated him on the throne his riches were insufficient to satisfy their demands but they listened to his pleasing advice, that they should seek not a more grateful but a more wealthy, master that they should embark for Greece where, instead of the skins of squirrels silk and gold would be the recompense of their service At the same time the Russian prince admonished his Byzantine ally to disperse and employ, to recompense and restrain these impetuous children of the North Contemporary writers have recorded the introduction, name, and character of the Varangians each day they rose in confidence and esteem the whole body was assembled at Constantinople to perform the duty of guards and their strength was recruited by a numerous band of their countrymen from the island of Thule On this occasion the vague appellation of Thule is applied to England, and the new Varangians were a colony of English and Danes who fled from the yoke of the Norman conqueror The habits of pilgrimage and piracy had approximated the countries of the earth these exiles were entertained in the Byzantine court and they preserved till the last age of the empire, the inheritance of spotless loyalty and the use of the Danish or English tongue With their broad and double edged battle axes on their shoulders they attended the Greek emperor to the temple, the senate and the hippodrome, he slept and feasted under their trusty guard and the keys of the palace the treasury, and the capital, were held by the firm and faithful hands of the Varangians [48]

In the tenth century the geography of Scythia was extended far beyond the limits of ancient knowledge and the monarchy of the Russians obtains a vast and conspicuous place in the map of Constantine [49] The sons of Ruric were masters of the spacious province of Wolodomir, or Moscow and if they were confined on that side by the hordes of the East their Western frontier in those early days was enlarged to the Baltic Sea and the country of the Prussians Their northern reign ascended above the sixtieth degree of latitude over the Hyperborean regions which fancy had peopled with monsters, or clouded with eternal darkness To the south they followed the course of the Borysthenes and approached with that river the neighbourhood of the Euxine Sea The tribes that dwelt or wandered in this ample circuit were obedient to the same conqueror and insensibly blended into the same nation The language of Russia is a dialect of the Sclavonian, but in the tenth century these two modes of speech were different from each other, and as the Sclavonians prevailed in the South it may be presumed that the original Russians of the North the primitive subjects of the Varangian chief were a portion of the Fennic race With the emigration union or dissolution of the wandering tribes the loose and indefinite picture of the Scythian desert has continually shifted But the most ancient map of Russia affords some places which still retain their name and position, and the two capitals Novogorod[50] and Kiow,[51] are coeval with the first age of the monarchy Novogorod had not yet deserved the epithet of great nor the alliance of the Hanseatic League, which diffused the streams of opulence and the principles of freedom Kiow could not yet boast of three hundred churches an innumerable people and a degree of greatness and splendour which was compared with Constantinople by those who had never seen the residence of the Cæsars In their origin the two cities were no more than camps or fairs the most convenient stations in which the barbarians might assemble for the occasional business of war or trade. Yet even these assemblies announce some progress in the arts of society, a new breed of cattle was imported from the southern provinces, and the spirit of commercial enterprise pervaded the sea and land from the Baltic to the Euxine from the mouth of the Oder to the port of Constantinople In the days of idolatry and barbarism the Sclavonic city of Julin was frequented and enriched by the Normans, who had prudently secured a free mart of purchase and exchange [52] From this harbour at the entrance of the Oder the corsair or merchant sailed in forty three days to the eastern shores of the Baltic the most distant nations were intermingled and the holy groves of Curland are said to have been decorated with Grecian and Spanish gold [53] Between the sea and Novogorod an easy intercourse was discovered in the summer, through a gulf a lake and a navigable river in the winter season over the hard and level surface of boundless snows From the neighbourhood of that city the Russians descended the streams that fall into the Borysthenes their canoes of a single tree were laden with slaves of every age furs of every species, the spoil of their beehives and the hides of their cattle and the whole produce of the North was collected and discharged in the magazines of Kiow The month of June was the ordinary season of the departure of the fleet the timber of the canoes was framed into the oars and benches of the more solid and capacious boats and they proceeded without obstacle down the Borysthenes as far as the seven or thirteen ridges of rocks which traverse the bed and precipitate the waters of the river At the more shallow falls it was sufficient to lighten the vessels but the deeper cataracts were impassable and the mariners who dragged their vessels and their slaves six miles over land were exposed in this toilsome journey to the robbers of the desert.[54] At the first island below the falls, the Russians celebrated the festival of their escape at a second near the mouth of the river they repaired their shattered vessels for the longer and more perilous voyage of the Black Sea. If they steered along the coast, the Danube was accessible with a fair wind they could reach in thirty six or forty hours the opposite shores of Anatolia and Constantinople admitted the annual visit of the strangers of the north They returned at the stated season with a rich cargo of corn wine and oil the manufactures of Greece and the spices of India. Some of their countrymen resided in the capital and provinces and the national treaties protected the persons effects and privileges of the Russian merchant[55]

But the same communication which had been opened for the benefit, was soon abused for the injury of mankind In a period of one hundred and ninety years the Russians made four attempts to plunder the treasures of Constantinople the event was various but the motive the means and the object were the same in these naval expeditions[56] The Russian traders had seen the magnificence and tasted the luxury of the city of the Cæsars A marvellous tale and a scanty supply excited the desires of their savage countrymen they envied the gifts of nature which their climate denied they coveted the works of art which they were too lazy to imitate and too indigent to purchase the Varangian princes unfurled the banners of piratical adventure and their bravest soldiers were drawn from the nations that dwelt in the northern isles of the ocean[57] The image of their naval armaments was revived in the last century in the fleets of the Cosacks which issued from the Borysthenes to navigate the same seas for a similar purpose[58] The Greek appellation of monoxyla or single canoes might be justly applied to the bottom of their vessels It was scooped out of the long stem of a beech or willow but the slight and narrow foundation was raised and continued on either side with planks, till it attained the length of sixty and the height of about twelve feet These boats were built without a deck but with two rudders and a mast to move with sails and oars and to contain from forty to seventy men with their arms and provisions of fresh water and salt fish The first trial of the Russians was made with two hundred boats but when the national force was exerted they might arm against Constantinople a thousand or twelve hundred vessels Their fleet was not much inferior to the royal navy of Agamemnon but it was magnified in the eyes of fear to ten or fifteen times the real proportion of its strength and numbers Had the Greek emperors been endowed with foresight to discern and vigour to prevent perhaps they might have sealed with a maritime force the mouth of the Borysthenes Their indolence abandoned the coast of Anatolia to the calamities of a piratical war which after an interval of six hundred years, again infested the Euxine but as long as the capital was respected the sufferings of a distant province escaped the notice both of the prince and the historian The storm, which had swept along from the Phasis and Trebizond at length burst on the Bosphorus of Thrace a strait of fifteen miles in which the rude vessels of the Russian might have been stopped and destroyed by a more skilful adversary In their first enterprise[59] under the princes of Kiow they passed without opposition and occupied the port of Constantinople in the absence of the emperor Michael the son of Theophilus Through a crowd of perils he landed at the palace stairs and immediately repaired to a church of the Virgin Mary[60] By the advice of the patriarch her garment a precious relic, was drawn from the sanctuary and dipped in the sea and a seasonable tempest which determined the retreat of the Russians was devoutly ascribed to the mother of God[61] The silence of the Greeks may inspire some doubt of the truth or at least of the importance of the second attempt by Oleg the guardian of the sons of Ruric[62] A strong barrier of arms and fortifications defended the Bosphorus they were eluded by the usual expedient of drawing the boats over the isthmus and this simple operation is described in the national chronicles as if the Russian fleet had sailed over dry land with a brisk and favourable gale The leader of the third armament, Igor the son of Ruric, had chosen a moment of weakness and decay, when the naval powers of the empire were employed against the Saracens But if courage be not wanting the instruments of defence are seldom deficient Fifteen broken and decayed galleys were boldly launched against the enemy, but instead of the single tube of Greek fire usually planted on the prow the sides and stern of each vessel were abundantly supplied with that liquid combustible The engineers were dexterous the weather was propitious, many thousand Russians who chose rather to be drowned that burnt leaped into the sea and those who escaped to the Thracian shore were inhumanly slaughtered by the peasants and soldiers Yet one third of the canoes escaped into shallow water and the next spring Igor was again prepared to retrieve his disgrace and claim his revenge [63] After a long peace Jaroslaus the great grandson of Igor resumed the same project of a naval invasion A fleet under the command of his son was repulsed at the entrance of the Bosphorus by the same artificial flames But in the rashness of pursuit the vanguard of the Greeks was encompassed by an irresistible multitude of boats and men their provision of fire was probably exhausted and twenty four galleys were either taken sunk or destroyed [64]

Yet the threats or calamities of a Russian war were more frequently diverted by treaty than by arms In these naval hostilities every disadvantage was on the side of the Greeks their savage enemy afforded no mercy his poverty promised no spoil his impenetrable retreat deprived the conqueror of the hopes of revenge and the pride or weakness of empire indulged an opinion that no honour could be gained or lost in the intercourse with barbarians At first, their demands were high and inadmissible three pounds of gold for each soldier or mariner of the fleet the Russian youth adhered to the design of conquest and glory but the counsels of moderation were recommended by the hoary sages 'Be content they said, 'with the liberal offers of Cæsar is it not far better to obtain without a combat the possession of gold silver silks and all the objects of our desires? Are we sure of victory? Can we conclude a treaty with the sea? We do not tread on the land, we float on the abyss of water and a common death hangs over our heads [65] The memory of these Arctic fleets that seemed to descend from the polar circle left a deep impression of terror on the Imperial city By the vulgar of every rank it was asserted and believed that an equestrian statue in the square of Taurus was secretly inscribed with a prophecy, how the Russians in the last days should become masters of Constantinople [66] In our own time, a Russian armament instead of sailing from the Borysthenes has circumnavigated the continent of Europe and the Turkish capital has been threatened by a squadron of strong and lofty ships of war each of which, with its naval science and thundering artillery, could have sunk or scattered a hundred canoes such as those of their ancestors. Perhaps the present generation may yet behold the accomplishment of the prediction of a rare prediction of which the style is unambiguous and the date unquestionable

By land the Russians were less formidable than by sea and as they fought for the most part on foot their irregular legions must often have been broken and overthrown by the cavalry of the Scythian hordes Yet their growing towns however slight and imperfect presented a shelter to the subject and a barrier to the enemy the monarchy of Kiow till a fatal partition, assumed the dominion of the North and the nations from the Volga to the Danube were subdued or repelled by the arms of Swatoslaus [67] the son of Igor the son of Oleg the son of Ruric The vigour of his mind and body was fortified by the hardships of a military and savage life Wrapped in a bear skin Swatoslaus usually slept on the ground his head reclining on a saddle his diet was coarse and frugal and like the heroes of Homer [68] his meat (it was often horse flesh) was broiled or roasted on the coals The exercise of war gave stability and discipline to his army and it may be presumed that no soldier was permitted to transcend the luxury of his chief By an embassy from Nicephorus the Greek emperor, he was moved to undertake the conquest of Bulgaria and a gift of fifteen hundred pounds of gold was laid at his feet to defray the expense or reward the toils of the expedition An army of sixty thousand men was assembled and embarked they sailed from the Borysthenes to the Danube their landing was effected on the Mæsian shore and after a sharp encounter, the swords of the Russians prevailed against the arrows of the Bulgarian horse The vanquished king sunk into the grave his children were made captive and his dominions as far as Mount Hæmus were subdued or ravaged by the northern invaders But instead of relinquishing his prey and performing his engagements the Varangian prince was more disposed to advance than to retire and had his ambition been crowned with success the seat of empire in that early period might have been transferred to a more temperate and fruitful climate Swatoslaus enjoyed and acknowledged the advantages of his new position in which he could unite by exchange or rapine the various pro ductions of the earth By an easy navigation he might draw from Russia the native commodi ties of furs wax and hydromel Hungary supplied him with a breed of horses and the spoils of the West and Greece abounded with gold silver and the foreign luxuries which his poverty had affected to disdain The bands of Patzinacites Chazars and Turks repaired to the standard of victory and the ambassador of Nicephorus betrayed his trust assumed the pur ple and promised to share with his new allies the treasures of the Eastern world From the banks of the Danube the Russian prince pur sued his march as far as Adrianople a formal summons to evacuate the Roman province was dismissed with contempt and Swatoslaus fiercely replied that Constantinople might soon expect the presence of an enemy and a master

Nicephorus could no longer expel the mis chief which he had introduced but his throne and wife were inherited by John Zimisces [69] who in a diminutive body possessed the spirit and abilities of a hero The first victory of his lieutenants deprived the Russians of their for eign allies twenty thousand of whom were either destroyed by the sword or provoked to revolt or tempted to desert Thrace was deliv ered but seventy thousand barbarians were still in arms and the legions that had been recalled from the new conquests of Syria pre pared with the return of the spring to march under the banners of a warlike prince who declared himself the friend and avenger of the injured Bulgaria The passes of Mount Hæmus had been left unguarded they were instantly occupied the Roman vanguard was formed of the immortals (a proud imitation of the Persian style) the emperor led the main body of ten thousand five hundred foot and the rest of his forces followed in slow and cautious array with the baggage and military engines The first ex ploit of Zimisces was the reduction of Mar cianopolis or Peristhlaba [70] in two days the trumpets sounded the walls were scaled eight thousand five hundred Russians were put to the sword and the sons of the Bulgarian king were rescued from an ignominious prison and in vested with a nominal diadem After these repeated losses Swatoslaus retired to the strong post of Dristra, on the banks of the Danube and was pursued by an enemy who alternately em ployed the arms of celerity and delay The Byzantine galleys ascended the river the le gions completed a line of circumvallation and the Russian prince was encompassed assaulted and famished in the fortifications of the camp and city Many deeds of valour were per formed several desperate sallies were attempt ed nor was it till after a siege of sixty five days that Swatoslaus yielded to his adverse fortune. The liberal terms which he obtained announce the prudence of the victor who respected the valour and apprehended the despair of an un conquered mind The great duke of Russia bound himself by solemn imprecations to relinquish all hostile designs a safe passage was opened for his return the liberty of trade and navigation was restored a measure of corn was distributed to each of his soldiers and the allowance of twenty two thousand measures attests the loss and the remnant of th barbar ians After a painful voyage they again reached the mouth of the Borysthenes but their provi sions were exhausted the season was unfavour able they passed the winter on the ice and be fore they could prosecute their march Swatos laus was surprised and oppressed by the neigh bouring tribes with whom the Greeks enter tained a perpetual and useful correspondence.[71] Far different was the return of Zimisces who was received in his capital like Camillus or Ma rius, the saviours of ancient Rome But the merit of the victory was attributed by the pious em peror to the mother of God and the image of the Virgin Mary with the divine infant in her arms was placed on a triumphal car adorned with the spoils of war and the ensigns of Bul garian royalty Zimisces made his public entry on horseback the diadem on his head a crown of laurel in his hand and Constantinople was astonished to applaud the martial virtues of her sovereign [72]

Photius of Constantinople a patriarch whose ambition was equal to his curiosity congratu lates himself and the Greek church on the con version of the Russians [73] Those fierce and bloody barbarians had been persuaded by the voice of reason and religion to acknowledge Jesus for their God the Christian missionaries for their teachers and the Romans for their friends and brethren His triumph was tran sient and premature In the various fortune of their piratical adventures, some Russian chiefs might allow themselves to be sprinkled with the waters of baptism and a Greek bishop with the name of metropolitan might administer the sacraments in the church of Kiow to a congre gation of slaves and natives But the seed of the Gospel was sown on a barren soil many were the apostates, the converts were few and the

baptism of Olga may be fixed as the era of Russian Christianity [74] A female, perhaps of the basest origin, who could revenge the death and assume the sceptre of her husband Igor, must have been endowed with those active virtues which command the fear and obedience of barbarians In a moment of foreign and domestic peace she sailed from Kiow to Constantinople, and the emperor Constantine Porphyrogenitus has described with minute diligence, the ceremonial of her reception in his capital and palace The steps, the titles the salutations the banquet, the presents were exquisitely adjusted to gratify the vanity of the stranger with due reverence to the superior majesty of the purple [75] In the sacrament of baptism she received the venerable name of the empress Helena and her conversion might be preceded or followed by her uncle two interpreters sixteen damsels of a higher and eighteen of a lower rank, twenty two domestics or ministers and forty four Russian merchants who composed the retinue of the great princess Olga After her return to Kiow and Novogorod she firmly persisted in her new religion but her labours in the propagation of the Gospel were not crowned with success and both her family and nation adhered with obstinacy or indifference to the gods of their fathers Her son Swatoslaus was apprehensive of the scorn and ridicule of his companions and her grandson Wolodomir devoted his youthful zeal to multiply and decorate the monuments of ancient worship The savage deities of the North were still propitiated with human sacrifices in the choice of the victim a citizen was preferred to a stranger, a Christian to an idolater and the father who defended his son from the sacerdotal knife was involved in the same doom by the rage of a fanatic tumult Yet the lessons and example of the pious Olga had made a deep though secret impression on the minds of the prince and people the Greek missionaries continued to preach, to dispute and to baptise and the ambassadors or merchants of Russia compared the idolatry of the woods with the elegant superstition of Constantinople They had gazed with admiration on the dome of St Sophia the lively pictures of saints and martyrs the riches of the altar the number and vestments of the priests the pomp and order of the ceremonies they were edified by the alternate succession of devout silence and harmonious song, nor was it difficult to persuade them that a choir of angels descended each day from heaven to join in the devotion of the Christians [76] But the conversion of Wolodomir was determined, or hastened by his desire of a Roman bride At the same time, and in the city of Cherson the rites of baptism and marriage were celebrated by the Christian pontiff the city he restored to the emperor Basil, the brother of his spouse but the brazen gates were transported as it is said to Novogorod, and erected before the first church as a trophy of his victory and faith [77] At his despotic command Peroun the god of thunder whom he had so long adored was dragged through the streets of Kiow and twelve sturdy barbarians battered with clubs the misshapen image, which was indignantly cast into the waters of the Borysthenes The edict of Wolodomir had proclaimed that all who should refuse the rites of baptism would be treated as the enemies of God and their prince, and the rivers were constantly filled with many thousands of obedient Russians who acquiesced in the truth and excellence of a doctrine which had been embraced by the great duke and his boyars In the next generation the relics of paganism were finally extirpated but as the two brothers of Wolodomir had died without baptism their bones were taken from the grave and sanctified by an irregular and posthumous sacrament

In the ninth, tenth and eleventh centuries of the Christian era the reign of the Gospel and of the church was extended over Bulgaria Hungary Bohemia Saxony, Denmark Norway Sweden Poland and Russia [78] The triumphs of apostolic zeal were repeated in the iron age of Christianity and the northern and eastern regions of Europe submitted to a religion more different in theory than in practice from the worship of their native idols A laudable ambition excited the monks both of Germany and Greece to visit the tents and huts of the barbarians poverty hardships and dangers were the lot of the first missionaries their courage was active and patient their motive pure and meritorious, their present reward consisted in the testimony of their conscience and the respect of a grateful people but the fruitful harvest of their toils was inherited and enjoyed by the proud and wealthy prelates of succeeding times The first conversions were free and spontaneous a holy life and an eloquent tongue were the only arms of the missionaries but the domestic fables of the pagans were silenced by the miracles and visions of the strangers and the favourable temper of the chiefs was accelerated by the dictates of vanity and interest. The leaders of nations, who were

saluted with the titles of kings and saints,[79] held it lawful and pious to impose the Catholic faith on their subjects and neighbours the coast of the Baltic, from Holstein to the gulf of Finland was invaded under the standard of the cross and the reign of idolatry was closed by the conversion of Lithuania in the fourteenth century Yet truth and candour must acknowledge that the conversion of the North imparted many temporal benefits both to the old and the new Christians The rage of war inherent to the human species, could not be healed by the evangelic precepts of charity and peace and the ambition of Catholic princes has renewed in every age the calamities of hostile contention. But the admission of the barbarians into the pale of civil and ecclesiastical society delivered Europe from the depredations by sea and land of the Normans the Hungarians and the Russians who learned to spare their brethren and cultivate their possessions [80] The establishment of law and order was promoted by the influence of the clergy and the rudiments of art and science were introduced into the savage countries of the globe. The liberal piety of the Russian princes engaged in their service the most skilful of the Greeks to decorate the cities and instruct the inhabitants the dome and the paintings of St. Sophia were rudely copied in the churches of Kiow and Novogorod the writings of the fathers were translated into the Sclavonic idiom and three hundred noble youths were invited or compelled to attend the lessons of the college of Jaroslaus It should appear that Russia might have derived an early and rapid improvement from her peculiar connection with the church and state of Constantinople which in that age so justly despised the ignorance of the Latins But the Byzantine nation was servile solitary and verging to a hasty decline after the fall of Kiow the navigation of the Borysthenes was forgotten the great princes of Wolodomir and Moscow were separated from the sea and Christendom and the divided monarchy was oppressed by the ignominy and blindness of Tartar servitude [81] The Sclavonic and Scandinavian kingdoms which had been converted by the Latin missionaries, were exposed it is true, to the spiritual jurisdiction and temporal claims of the popes [82] but they were united in language and religious worship with each other and with Rome they imbibed the free and generous spirit of the European republic, and gradually shared the light of knowledge which arose on the western world

THE three great nations of the world the Greeks the Saracens and the Franks encountered each other on the theatre of Italy [1] The southern provinces which now compose the kingdom of Naples were subject, for the most part, to the Lombard dukes and princes of Beneventum —so powerful in war that they checked for a moment the genius of Charlemagne—so liberal in peace that they maintained in their capital an academy of thirty two philosophers and grammarians The division of this flourishing state produced the rival principalities of Benevento Salerno and Capua and the thoughtless ambition or revenge of the competitors invited the Saracens to the ruin of their common inheritance. During a calamitous period of two hundred years Italy was exposed to a repetition of wounds which the invaders were not capable of healing by the union and tranquillity of a perfect conquest. Their frequent and almost annual squadrons issued from the port of Palermo and were entertained with too much indulgence by the Christians of Naples the more formidable fleets were prepared on the African coast and even the Arabs of Andalusia were sometimes tempted to assist or oppose the Moslems of an adverse sect. In the revolution of human events a new ambuscade was concealed in the Caudine forks the fields of Cannæ were bedewed a second

baptism of Olga may be fixed as the era of Russian Christianity [74] A female, perhaps of the basest origin who could revenge the death and assume the sceptre of her husband Igor, must have been endowed with those active virtues which command the fear and obedience of barbarians In a moment of foreign and domestic peace she sailed from Kiow to Constantinople, and the emperor Constantine Porphyrogenitus has described with minute diligence, the ceremonial of her reception in his capital and palace The steps the titles the salutations, the banquet the presents were exquisitely adjusted to gratify the vanity of the stranger, with due reverence to the superior majesty of the purple [75] In the sacrament of baptism she received the venerable name of the empress Helena and her conversion might be preceded or followed by her uncle two interpreters sixteen damsels of a higher and eighteen of a lower rank, twenty two domestics or ministers and forty four Russian merchants who composed the retinue of the great princess Olga After her return to Kiow and Novogorod she firmly persisted in her new religion but her labours in the propagation of the Gospel were not crowned with success, and both her family and nation adhered with obstinacy or indifference to the gods of their fathers Her son Swatoslaus was apprehensive of the scorn and ridicule of his companions, and her grandson Wolodomir devoted his youthful zeal to multiply and decorate the monuments of ancient worship The savage deities of the North were still propitiated with human sacrifices in the choice of the victim a citizen was preferred to a stranger, a Christian to an idolater and the father who defended his son from the sacerdotal knife was involved in the same doom by the rage of a fanatic tumult Yet the lessons and example of the pious Olga had made a deep though secret, impression on the minds of the prince and people the Greek missionaries continued to preach to dispute and to baptise and the ambassadors or merchants of Russia compared the idolatry of the woods with the elegant superstition of Con tantinople They had gazed with admiration on the dome of St Sophia the lively pictures of saints and martyrs the riches of the altar the number and vestments of the priests the pomp and order of the ceremonies they were edified by the alternate succession of devout silence and harmonious song nor was it difficult to persuade them that a choir of angels descended each day from heaven to join in the devotion of the Christians [76] But the conversion of Wolodomir was determined, or hastened by his desire of a Roman bride At the same time, and in the city of Cherson, the rites of baptism and marriage were celebrated by the Christian pontiff the city he restored to the emperor Basil, the brother of his spouse but the brazen gates were transported, as it is said to Novogorod and erected before the first church as a trophy of his victory and faith [77] At his despotic command, Peroun the god of thunder whom he had so long adored was dragged through the streets of Kiow and twelve sturdy barbarians battered with clubs the misshapen image which was indignantly cast into the waters of the Borysthenes The edict of Wolodomir had proclaimed that all who should refuse the rites of baptism would be treated as the enemies of God and their prince, and the rivers were constantly filled with many thousands of obedient Russians who acquiesced in the truth and excellence of a doctrine which had been embraced by the great duke and his boyars In the next generation the relics of paganism were finally extirpated but as the two brothers of Wolodomir had died without baptism their bones were taken from the grave and sanctified by an irregular and posthumous sacrament

In the ninth tenth and eleventh centuries of the Christian era the reign of the Gospel and of the church was extended over Bulgaria, Hungary, Bohemia Saxony Denmark Norway Sweden Poland and Russia [78] The triumphs of apostolic zeal were repeated in the iron age of Christianity and the northern and eastern regions of Europe submitted to a religion more different in theory than in practice from the worship of their native idols A laudable ambition excited the monks both of Germany and Greece to visit the tents and huts of the barbarians poverty, hardships and dangers were the lot of the first missionaries their courage was active and patient their motive pure and meritorious their present reward consisted in the testimony of their conscience and the respect of a grateful people but the fruitful harvest of their toils was inherited and enjoyed by the proud and wealthy prelates of succeeding times The first conversions were free and spontaneous a holy life and an eloquent tongue were the only arms of the missionaries but the domestic fables of the pagans were silenced by the miracles and visions of the strangers and the favourable temper of the chiefs was accelerated by the dictates of vanity and interest. The leaders of nations, who were

saluted with the titles of kings and saints,[79] held it lawful and pious to impose the Catholic faith on their subjects and neighbours the coast of the Baltic from Holstein to the gulf of Finland was invaded under the standard of the cross and the reign of idolatry was closed by the con version of Lithuania in the fourteenth century Yet truth and candour must acknowledge that the conversion of the North imparted many temporal benefits both to the old and the new Christians The rage of war inherent to the human species could not be healed by the evangelic precepts of charity and peace and the ambition of Catholic princes has renewed in every age the calamities of hostile contention. But the admission of the barbarians into the pale of civil and ecclesiastical society delivered Europe from the depredations by sea and land, of the Normans the Hungarians and the Russians who learned to spare their brethren and cultivate their possessions [80] The establishment of law and order was promoted by the influence of the clergy and the rudiments of art and science were introduced into the savage countries of the globe. The liberal piety of the Russian princes engaged in their service the most skilful of the Greeks to decorate the cities and instruct the inhabitants the dome and the paintings of St. Sophia were rudely copied in the churches of Kiow and Novogorod the writings of the fathers were translated into the Sclavonic idiom and three hundred noble youths were invited or compelled to attend the lessons of the college of Jaroslaus It should appear that Russia might have derived an early and rapid improvement from her peculiar connection with the church and state of Con stantinople which in that age so justly despised the ignorance of the Latins But the Byzantine nation was servile solitary and verging to a hasty decline after the fall of Kiow the naviga tion of the Borysthenes was forgotten the great princes of Wolodomir and Moscow were sepa rated from the sea and Christendom and the divided monarchy was oppressed by the ig nominy and blindness of Tartar servitude [81] The Sclavonic and Scandinavian kingdoms, which had been converted by the Latin mis sionaries, were exposed it is true to the spiri tual jurisdiction and temporal claims of the popes [82] but they were united in language and religious worship with each other and with Rome they imbibed the free and generous spirit of the European republic and gradually shared the light of knowledge which arose on the western world

THE three great nations of the world the Greeks the Saracens and the Franks en countered each other on the theatre of Italy [1] The southern provinces which now com pose the kingdom of Naples, were subject, for the most part to the Lombard dukes and princes of Beneventum[2]—so powerful in war that they checked for a moment the genius of Charlemagne—so liberal in peace that they maintained in their capital an academy of thirty two philosophers and grammarians The division of this flourishing state produced the rival principalities of Benevento Salerno and Capua and the thoughtless ambition or re venge of the competitors invited the Saracens to the ruin of their common inheritance During a calamitous period of two hundred years Italy was exposed to a repetition of wounds which the invaders were not capable of healing by the union and tranquillity of a perfect conquest. Their frequent and almost annual squadrons issued from the port of Palermo and were en tertained with too much indulgence by the Christians of Naples the more formidable fleets were prepared on the African coast and even the Arabs of Andalusia were sometimes tempted to assist or oppose the Moslems of an adverse sect. In the revolution of human events a new ambuscade was concealed in the Caudine forks the fields of Cannæ were bedewed a second time with the blood of the Africans, and the so ereign of Rome again attacked or defended the walls of Capua and Tarentum A colony of Saracens had been planted at Bari which com mands the entrance of the Adriatic Gulf and their impartial depredations provoked the re sentment and conciliated the union of the two emperors An offensive alliance was concluded between Basil the Macedonian the first of his race and Lewis the great grandson of Charle magne,[3] and each party supplied the deficien cies of his associate It would have been impru dent in the Byzantine monarch to transport his stationary troops of Asia to an Italian cam paign and the Latin arms would have been in sufficient if his superior navy had not occupied the mouth of the Gulf The fortress of Bari was invested by the infantry of the Franks and by the cavalry and galleys of the Greeks and after a defence of four years the Arabian emir sub mitted to the clemency of Lewis who com manded in person the operations of the siege This important conquest had been achieved by the concord of the East and West but their re cent amity was soon embittered by the mutual complaints of jealousy and pride The Greeks assumed as their own the merit of the conquest and the pomp of the triumph extolled the greatness of their powers and affected to deride the intemperance and sloth of the handful of barbarians who appeared under the banners of the Carlovingian prince His reply is expressed with the eloquence of indignation and truth

We confess the magnitude of your prepara tions ' says the great grandson of Charlemagne ' Your armies were indeed as numerous as a cloud of summer locusts who darken the day flap their wings and after a short flight tum ble weary and breathless to the ground Like them ye sunk after a feeble effort ye were van quished by your own cowardice and withdrew from the scene of action to injure and despoil our Christian subjects of the Sclavonian coast We were few in number and why were we few? because, after a tedious expectation of your ar rival I had dismissed my host and retained only a chosen band of warriors to continue the blockade of the city If they indulged their hos pitable feasts in the face of danger and death did these feasts abate the vigour of their enter prise? Is it by your fasting that the walls of Bari have been overturned? Did not these valiant Franks, diminished as they were by languor and fatigue intercept and vanquish the three most powerful emirs of the Saracens? and did not their defeat precipitate the fall of the city? Bari is now fallen Tarentum trembles Calabria will be delivered and, if we command the sea the island of Sicily may be rescued from the hands of the infidels My brother (a name most offensive to the vanity of the Greek) ac celerate your naval succours respect your al lies and distrust your flatterers '[4]

These lofty hopes were soon extinguished by the death of Lewis, and the decay of the Car lovingian house and whoever might deserve the honour the Greek emperors Basil and his son Leo secured the advantage of the reduc tion of Bari The Italians of Apulia and Cala bria were persuaded or compelled to acknowl edge their supremacy and an ideal line from Mount Garganus to the bay of Salerno leaves the far greater part of the kingdom of Naples under the dominion of the Eastern empire Be yond that line the dukes or republics of Amalfi[5] and Naples who had never forfeited their vol untary allegiance rejoiced in the neighbour hood of their lawful sovereign and Amalfi was enriched by supplying Europe with the produce and manufactures of Asia But the Lombard princes of Benevento, Salerno, and Capua[6] were reluctantly torn from the communion of the Latin world and too often violated their oaths of servitude and tribute The city of Bari rose to dignity and wealth as the metropolis of the new theme or province of Lombardy the title of patrician and afterwards the singular name of Catapan [7] was assigned to the supreme governor and the policy both of the church and state was modelled in exact subordination to the throne of Constantinople As long as the sceptre was disputed by the princes of Italy their efforts were feeble and adverse and the Greeks resisted or eluded the forces of Germany which descended from the Alps under the Im perial standard of the Othos The first and greatest of those Saxon princes was compelled to relinquish the siege of Bari the second after the loss of his stoutest bishops and barons es caped with honour from the bloody field of Crotona On that day the scale of war was turned against the Franks by the valour of the Saracens[8] These corsairs had indeed been driv en by the Byzantine fleets from the fortresses and coasts of Italy but a sense of interest was more prevalent than superstition or resentment and the caliph of Egypt had transported forty thousand Moslems to the aid of his Christian ally The successors of Basil amused themselves with the belief that the conquest of Lombardy had been achieved and was still preserved by the justice of their laws the virtues of their min isters, and the gratitude of a people whom they had rescu d from anarchy and oppression A series of rebellions might dart a ray of truth into the palace of Constantinople and the illusions of flattery were dispelled by the easy and rapid success of the Norman ad venturers

The revolution of human affairs had produced in Apulia and Calabria a melancholy contrast between the age of Pythagoras and the tenth century of the Christian era At the former period the coast of Great Greece (as it was then styled) was planted with free and opulent cities these cities were peopled with soldiers, artists, and philosophers and the military strength of Tarentum, Sybaris or Crotona was not inferior to that of a powerful kingdom At the second era these once flourishing provinces were clouded with ignorance impoverished by tyranny and depopulated by barbarian war nor can we severely accuse the exaggeration of a contemporary that a fair and ample district was reduced to the same desolation which had covered the earth after the general deluge[9] Among the hostilities of the Arabs the Franks and the Greeks in the southern Italy I shall select two or three anecdotes expressive of their national manners 1 It was the amusement of the Saracens to profane as well as to pillage the monasteries and churches At the siege of Salerno a Musulman chief spread his couch on the communion table and on that altar sacrificed each night the virginity of a Christian nun As he wrestled with a reluctant maid a beam in the roof was accidentally or dexterously thrown down on his head and the death of the lustful emir was imputed to the wrath of Christ which was at length awakened to the defence of his faithful spouse[10] The Saracens besieged the cities of Beneventum and Capua after a vain appeal to the successors of Charlemagne, the Lombards implored the clemency and aid of the Greek emperor[11] A fearless citizen dropped from the walls passed the intrenchments accomplished his commission, and fell into the hands of the barbarians as he was returning with the welcome news They commanded him to assist their enterprise and deceive his countrymen with the assurance that wealth and honours should be the reward of his falsehood and that his sincerity would be punished with immediate death. He affected to yield, but as soon as he was conducted within hearing of the Christians on the rampart Friends and brethren he cried with a loud voice be bold and patient maintain the city your sovereign is informed of your distress and your deliverers are at hand I know my doom and commit my wife and children to your gratitude. The rage of the Arabs confirmed his evidence and the self-devoted patriot was transpierced with a hundred spears. He deserves to live in the memory of the virtuous but the repetition of the same story in ancient and modern times may sprinkle some doubts on the reality of this generous deed[12] 3 The recital of the third incident may provoke a smile amidst the horrors of war Theobald marquis of Camerino and Spoleto[13] supported the rebels of Beneventum and his wanton cruelty was not incompatible in that age with the character of a hero His captives of the Greek nation or party were castrated without mercy and the outrage was aggravated by a cruel jest that he wished to present the emperor with a supply of eunuchs the most precious ornaments of the Byzantine court The garrison of a castle had been defeated in a sally and the prisoners were sentenced to the customary operation. But the sacrifice was disturbed by the intrusion of a frantic female who with bleeding cheeks dishevelled hair and importunate clamours compelled the marquis to listen to her complaint. Is it thus she cried "ye magnanimous heroes that ye wage war against women against women who have never injured ye and whose only arms are the distaff and the loom? Theobald denied the charge, and protested that since the Amazons he had never heard of a female war And how she furiously exclaimed can you attack us more directly how can you wound us in a more vital part than by robbing our husbands of what we most dearly cherish the source of our joys and the hope of our posterity? The plunder of our flocks and herds I have endured without a murmur but this fatal injury this irreparable loss subdues my patience and calls aloud on the justice of heaven and earth. A general laugh applauded her eloquence the savage Franks inaccessible to pity were moved by her ridiculous yet rational despair and with the deliverance of the captives she obtained the restitution of her effects As she returned in triumph to the castle she was overtaken by a messenger to inquire in the name of Theobald what punishment should be inflicted on her husband were he again taken in arms? Should such she answered without hesitation be his guilt and misfortune he has eyes, and a nose and hands and feet. These are his own and these he may deserve to forfeit by his personal offences But let my lord be pleased to spare what his little
